

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. ELLA AMSBARY, Respt.,
v.
GRAYS HARBOR RAILWAY & LIGHT COMPANY, Appt..

Evidence — reproduction of conditions — sufficiency.

1. Substantial reproduction of conditions is sufficient to render admissible evidence of the result of experiments upon the question how far from a street car a person lying beside the track could be seen.

— similarity of conditions of experiments.

2. Upon the question how far a man struck by a street car when lying on the ground beside the track could have been seen by the motorman, evidence is admissible of the similarity of circumstances under which the experiment to test that question was carried on, to those attending the accident.

— discretion as to admission.

3. The question of admissibility of proof of similarity of conditions attending an accident and experiments is not a matter of discretion with the court.

— experiment — length of view of person beside track.

4. The result of experiments under similar conditions is admissible in evidence upon the question how far away the motorman in charge of a street car could see a person lying on the ground beside the track.

Appeal — exclusion of evidence of experiments — discretion.

5. The exclusion by a trial court of evidence of experiments, although largely discretionary, may be reviewed on appeal.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Superior Court for Chehalis County (Sheeks, J.) in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for the death of her husband alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Bridges & Bruener for appellant.

Messrs. A. Emerson Cross and Hugo Metzler, for respondent:

While it might not be error for the trial court to admit evidence of experiments, it does not create error for the trial court to exclude it.

Parker, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff seeks recovery of damages which she claims resulted to her from the death of her husband, caused by the negligence of the defendant in the operation of one of its street cars. A trial before the court and a jury resulted in verdict and judgment against the defendant, from which it has appealed.

Appellant operates a street railway in and between Aberdeen and Cosmopolis. On October 10, 1912, at 7:25 in the evening, respondent's husband, having fallen "in a heaped-up condition," as expressed by a witness, near the westerly rail of appellant's track leading from Aberdeen to Cosmopolis, was struck on his head by the lower step of one of appellant's cars, resulting in his death soon after. He was seen to fall in that position a few minutes before being struck by the car. The evidence indicates that he was very much under the influence of intoxicating liquor at the time. Whether his fall was caused by his intoxication or by one of his fits, which the evidence indicates he was in some degree subject to, is not clear; nor is it certain as to whether he was unconscious or unable, of his own volition, to extricate himself from his dangerous position before he was struck by the car.

There is apparently no uncertainty as to the time being 7:25 in the evening, since this was readily ascertainable by the regular running time of the particular car. It also seems certain that darkness had come some time before the accident occurred, and that the only light of any consequence was from the headlight of the car and comparatively small electric lights at street crossings some 300 feet apart. The accident occurred about midway between two of these street lights. The car was running south on a straight, level track, for a distance of 670 feet, before striking deceased. A plank road runs along the westerly side of the street, parallel with the car track, with a space of 43 inches between them. This plank road is 24 inches higher than the track, the space between being nearly filled with sawdust, which slopes from near the surface of the plank road down to the ends of the ties of the track. The lower step of the car was 20 inches above the ties of the track, and extended about 25 inches out beyond the rails. From these facts it would seem that deceased's position by the side of the track can be determined with a considerable degree of accuracy.

The speed of the car when the motorman first saw deceased was from 13 to 15 miles per hour, which is not claimed to be an excessive rate of speed at that place. The motorman claims that he was not able to see deceased until within 30 feet of him, and that the car was stopped as quickly as possible thereafter. The car ran past deceased, after striking him, about two or three car lengths, before it could be brought to a stop. The motorman also claims that no portion of deceased's body was upon the track before being struck by the car. The ties of the track were not planked or graded over so as to make the space occupied by the track suitable for ordinary travel. Indeed, the street was not improved at all for ordinary travel, except by the plank road along which, evidently, all ordinary travel of the street proceeded. The neighborhood is an outlying district near the common corporate boundary of Aberdeen and Cosmopolis. The evidence tended to show that a person dressed as deceased was, and in his position at the side of the track, would not readily be seen by a motorman on an approaching car, even though such car were supplied with a strong headlight.

The principal claim of negligence made by counsel for respondent on the part of the motorman seems to be that he did not exercise due care in observing the track ahead of the car, and discover deceased at the side of the track in time to stop the car before striking him. We do not understand that there is any serious contention against the motorman's claim that he could not stop the car at the rate it was going within a distance of 30 feet, nor that the speed of the car was excessive at that place. For the purpose of corroborating the motorman and showing that he could not see the deceased until within such a short distance that the car could not be stopped before striking him, and for the purpose of showing the greatest distance at which the deceased could be seen from the approaching car, having in view deceased's peculiar situation, the color of his clothes, and the nature of the sloping sawdust upon which he rested, counsel for appellant offered testimony of witnesses to an experiment had after the accident occurred, under substantially the same conditions as at the time of the accident. This offer of proof was rejected by the trial court, which ruling is claimed to be erroneous by counsel for appellant, entitling it to a new trial. A witness who had arrived at the place of the accident soon after it occurred, while deceased lay upon the plank road, very near where he had been struck by the car, was upon the witness stand when the offer of proof was made by appellant's counsel as follows:

Q. Suppose that a man during the night where it was dark, a man was crouched down between the plank roadway there and the rail, nearest rail, and he was crouched so that the lower step of the car would hit him in the head and he was dressed in dark clothes. . . . I will ask you if it would be difficult for a motorman to see a man under the circumstances I have named.

A. It would be, it would be rather difficult.

Q. Did you recently make a dummy man?

A. I did. . . .

Q. About how long ago was that?

A. A little over two weeks ago.

Q. I will ask you whether or not you placed that dummy between the plank roadway and the nearest rail of the car track at about the location that you saw this man at the time of his injury.

Mr. Cross: Same objection.

Court: I sustain the objection.

Mr. Bridges: In order that we may dispose of this matter now I would like to make an offer. . . . We offer to show by this witness that he, about two weeks ago, made a dummy in the form of a man, dressed as the deceased was dressed and that after night on an occasion substantially the same as the night of the injury he took this dummy and placed it on the sawdust between the railroad track and the plank roadway in the position and location that the deceased was at the time of his injury, and that after that was done, a car, the same car that was run at the time of the injury to the deceased, was started from Aberdeen: that witnesses occupied a position in the front portion of the car with the motorman with certain information given them concerning the dummy, given them in advance, and that they were on the car in front with the motorman, the motorman being the same motorman that was driving the same car which was in the same condition as it was at the time of the accident, and we offer to prove by this and other witnesses the result of that investigation, the result of what happened there,—we offer to prove it by this and other witnesses, parties who were standing with the motorman looking through the motorman's window as to what they could see and when, if at all, they did see this dummy object. We offer to show that the conditions were the same as at the time of the injury.

Mr. Cross: Objected to as incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial.

Court: I will sustain the objection.

Mr. Bridges: Exception.

Mr. Bridges: Such would be your honor's ruling if those witnesses whom I have mentioned were called?

Court: I presume so.

Mr. Bridges: I don't want to keep them here if that is the situation.

Court: Yes.

Mr. Bridges: Exception.

This experiment occurred two weeks before the trial, and eight months after the accident. The ruling of the trial court, and argument of counsel for respondent in support thereof, do not point to any theory upon which the correctness of the ruling is rested other than the seeming assumption on the part of the trial court and counsel that there was an insufficient similarity of conditions attending the accident and the experiment, the result of which was proposed to be shown. Plainly, the language of the offer was not deficient in that regard. It may be that, had counsel for appellant been permitted to proceed, there would have been a failure to show such substantial similarity of conditions as to render testimony concerning the result of the accident admissible. On the other hand, the similarity of conditions might have been proven sufficiently to render testimony as to the result of the experiment admissible and very helpful to the jury in determining the question of the motorman's negligence in so far as his observation of the track ahead of the car is concerned. It seems quite clear to us that counsel for appellant were entitled to lay the foundation for offering testimony touching the result of the experiment. Yet, this is the very thing they were, by the ruling of the court, prevented from doing; which ruling seems to have no other foundation than the court's assumption that there was, in fact, no sufficient similarity of circumstances attending the accident and the experiment. The real error of the court lies in the fact that counsel for appellant were not permitted to introduce evidence touching this preliminary question; while the court, if the theory of counsel for respondent be correct, was apparently deciding the question of counsel's right to prove the result of the experiment. The court was not yet called upon to rule upon the admissibility of evidence touching the result of the experiment, and it seems clear that the offer of proof touching the preliminary question of similarity of conditions was material and relevant to that question.

Evidence—similarity of
experiments.

We are of the opinion that the ruling of the court was clearly erroneous in so far as it excluded proof of the preliminary question of similarity of conditions. In its final analysis, this would seem to be decisive of the real question here presented; but in view of the fact that a new trial must follow because of this error, we deem it proper to make some further observations.

Counsel for respondent invoke the general rule that the admission of evidence as to the result of experiments of this nature is within the discretion of the trial court, and argue that there has been no abuse of such discretion upon the trial of this case. It can hardly be seriously argued that this rule of judicial discretion is applicable to the admissibility of proof of similarity of conditions attending the accident and the experiment, in the same sense that it is applicable to the question of the sufficiency of such preliminary proof of similarity to render evidence of the experiment admissible. But counsel for respondent seem to argue that, because of the claimed involved conditions attending the accident, the court did not abuse its discretion in deciding, as counsel seem to assume, that it was impossible to reproduce such conditions with sufficient similarity to render evidence of the result of the experiment admissible. We are unable to see any other theory upon which the ruling of the court can be rested, in view of the fact that it declined to hear evidence upon the preliminary question of similarity of conditions. Counsel for respondent call our attention to Halverson v. Seattle Electric Co. 35 Wash. 600, 77 Pac. 1058, where the experiment involved was a demonstration to show the movement and swinging effect of a street car operated upon a curve. The court there stated the attempted proof of similarity of conditions, and its holding upon the trial court's exclusion of the evidence as to the result of the experiment, as follows:

"Appellant next contends that the court erred in refusing to permit certain witnesses to testify to the results of experiments made by them in running the same car upon which the accident occurred through the same curve. The witnesses showed that these experiments were made under different conditions from those existing at the time of the accident. They were made at a different time of day, when the electric current would have less load and, therefore, more power. The experiments were also made with no load upon the car, and upon a dry rail, while the car at the time of the accident was heavily loaded with passengers and the rails were wet. . . .

"The similarity of the circumstances and conditions must be left to the sound discretion of the trial court, and determined by him, subject to review only for abuse. Where the conditions and circumstances are so different or dissimilar as to probably bring about different results, as they evidently were in this case, it is not an abuse of discretion to exclude the results of the experiments."

Manifestly, we have no such situation here. Had counsel been permitted to proceed, it is true they might have failed in their proof of similarity of conditions, as in that case; but, clearly, had they proved similarity of conditions according to—experiment—length of view of person
beside track.
their offer, they would have been entitled to show the result of the experiment. Counsel for respondent also rely upon the decision of this court in Lasityr v. Olympia, 61 Wash. 651, 112 Pac. 752, where one of the questions involved was the quantity of light upon a certain portion of a sidewalk where an accident occurred. Aside from the citation and review of some authorities, the following is all that was there said upon the question presented:

"The appellant offered testimony tending to show that the lamp at the intersection of Fourth street and Columbia street on the night preceding the trial of this action was identical with the lamp at the same point on the night of the accident; that the voltage passing through the arc light system on the night of the accident was greater than the voltage on the night preceding the trial; and that on the night preceding the trial witnesses could readily read newspapers on the sidewalk at the place of the accident by the light of the lamp in question. The appellant further offered to prove by an electrical expert the quantity of light in candle power cast on the sidewalk at the place of the accident on a dark and cloudy night. These several offers were rejected, and the ruling of the court is assigned as error. Experiments made out of the presence of the court are competent evidence in a proper case, but before they can be admitted, it must appear that they were made under substantially the same conditions as existed at the time of the transaction in question, and the trial court is necessarily vested with a large discretion in determining the preliminary questions of fact upon which their admissibility depends.

"While we are not prepared to say that it would have been error to admit proof of these experiments, we do not think that the quantity of light given out by an arc light at all times and under all conditions is so certain and unvarying as to render the ruling of the court erroneous, or manifest an abuse of sound judicial discretion."

We do not think that case furnishes an answer to the problem here involved. That opinion furnishes us but little light upon the nature of the offer of proof there made. However, a reference to the original briefs in that case indicates that it consisted of an offer of the testimony of witnesses touching the fact that the electric light involved was located the same at the time of the accident as at the time of the experiment, and that it was supplied at both times with current of the same voltage, as shown by the records of the light company. But it does not appear that there was any testimony of witnesses offered who saw the light and its effect both at the time of the accident and at the time of the experiment. We deem it a sufficient comment upon that decision to say that, upon its face, it seems to indicate the extreme limit of the exercise of the trial court's discretion in excluding the offered evidence, and we do not regard it as controlling beyond its application to the particular facts there involved, and as a statement of the general rule of judicial discretion touching the admission of evidence of the result of experiments.

In view of the fact that the purpose of the experiment here involved was to determine the result of conditions similar to those existing at the time of the accident, with a view to having witnesses testify as to the greatest distance at which deceased could have been seen from an approaching car, it was only necessary that such conditions be substantially reproduced in so far as —reproduction

they related to that particular question. As is said in 1 Wigmore on Evidence, § 442: "This similarity need not be precise in every detail. It need include only those circumstances or conditions which might conceivably have some influence in affecting the result in question." Now, had counsel for appellant been permitted to prove, and been able to prove, substantial similarity of conditions according to this rule, it surely would have been an abuse of discretion on the part of the trial court to deny them the privilege of producing evidence in the form of testimony of witnesses who were present at the time of the experiment and thereby became enabled to testify as to the greatest distance at which the deceased could have been seen from the approaching car. Clearly, there is nothing inherent in the conditions indicated by this record that renders it impossible, or even improbable, that sufficient similarity of conditions could be reproduced to render admissible evidence of the result of the experiment.

Counsel for respondent seem to proceed upon the theory that a question of this nature is practically beyond review here because of the claimed large discretion vested in the trial court. A review of the authorities, however, will disclose many cases where trial courts have been reversed because of an abuse of their discretion in excluding such evidence. While, as we have already noticed, this is not the exact question before us, yet in view of what will likely occur upon new trial, we deem it appropriate to notice a few of the decisions bearing upon this question. In Gambrill v. Schooley, 95 Md. 260, 63 L.R.A. 427, 52 Atl. 509, involving an experiment as to the distance at which a human voice could be heard under certain conditions, the court said: "The nineteenth and twentieth exceptions relate to the exclusion of evidence offered by the defendant and by Sutton, a civil engineer, who had surveyed the premises where the alleged slanderous words were spoken, that there was no change in the topography or circumstances and that they had experimented with the voice to ascertain if the voice of a person standing where the defendant is said to have stood when the words charged were uttered, and speaking in a loud tone, could be heard by one standing where the plaintiff is said to have stood at that time and also where Brown and wife are said to have stood at the same time. The question was considered in Richardson v. State, 90 Md. 117, 44 Atl. 999, 15 Am. Crim. Rep. 222, and similar experiments as to the range and accuracy of vision were there held admissible, and that case was cited and relied on in the recent case of Keyser v. State, 95 Md. 96, 51 Atl. 1057. We think this evidence should have been received, the defense being that the words were not spoken."

The decision in Richardson v. State, 90 Md. 109, 44 Atl. 999, 15 Am. Crim. Rep. 222, referred to in this quotation, involved an experiment for the purpose of determining the ability of one person to see another under certain conditions. In Wilson v. State, — Tex. Crim. Rep. —, 36 S. W. 587, dealing with the problem of an experiment as to how distinctly the human voice could be heard under certain conditions, the court said: "Two theories are presented by the state: First, that the appellant intentionally killed Mrs. Ratliff; and, second, that with his malice aforethought he shot at the husband of Mrs. Ratliff, and accidentally killed his wife, the deceased. The testimony of one Hanson, taken before the examining court, was introduced in evidence by the state. He swore that he heard the appellant use certain words, speaking to the deceased, Mrs. Ratliff, at the time of the shooting; to wit, 'I will shoot through you. I will shoot you both.' It was admitted that Hanson was 100 yards away, and that the wind was blowing the sound from, and not towards, him. To test whether from his position he could have heard the words to which he testified, a number of persons went upon the ground on a day when conditions as to wind, etc., were the same, and under practically the same conditions. These parties were placed in the position of the witness Hanson and others at the well, at which point the shooting occurred, and the words ascribed to the appellant were spoken by those at the well in different ranges of voice from the lowest to the highest; and it was proposed to be proved by these parties, and appellant alleges could have been proved by them, that they did not hear such words so spoken at the well, at the position occupied by Hanson, and that their hearing was good, which proof was rejected, and appellant excepted. The question before us is, Is such testimony admissible? It was. This precise question was before the supreme court of Ohio in Smith v. State, 2 Ohio St. 511, and it was there held that such testimony was admissible. The question came before the supreme court of Tennessee in Byers v. Nashville, C. & St. L. R. Co. 94 Tenn. 345, 29 S. W. 128, and there such testimony was held admissible."

In Johnson v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 80 Kan. 456, 103 Pac. 90, dealing with an experiment touching the ability of persons to both see and hear under certain conditions, the court said: "A witness familiar with the topography of the region was asked if he had made tests to determine whether the noise of trains coming toward the cut from the southwest would be deadened by the cut and the surroundings to a man on the highway. An objection was sustained, and the plaintiff complains of the ruling. The evidence sought was competent upon proof that the place was the same, and that the test was made under the same or similar circumstances. The rule is thus stated in Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Townsend, 71 Kan. 524, 81 Pac. 205, 6 Ann. Cas. 191, approving an earlier statement made in Missouri P. R. Co. v. Moffatt, 56 Kan. 667, 44 Pac. 607, 11 Am. Neg. Cas. 554: 'If the conditions at the crossings were such that the statutory or ordinary signals were insufficient, then other and more effective warnings should have been given. It was competent to show by witnesses that had made a test at the same place, and under substantially similar circumstances, how far the whistle or bell of trains could be heard, and the effect of the cut and obstructions in deadening the sounds of approaching trains.' Page 526. The same rule is applicable to evidence offered to show that the smoke and steam from engines in the cut could not be seen at the crossing. The following question was asked of a witness familiar with the locality: 'State whether or not you ever made tests to ascertain whether the smoke and steam emitted by a train can be observed by a person standing in the highway over the culvert described about 36 feet east of the crossing, if the train is running fast, on a clear day, and wind is blowing from the north.' Atmospheric conditions, the coal used, the time of its application to the fire, and other circumstances, would affect the weight of such testimony, but would not make it incompetent. The result of tests or experiments made under proper conditions is often admissible as tending to prove a fact in issue. Gillett, Indirect & Collateral Ev. § 66; Innis v. The Senator, 4 Cal. 5, 60 Am. Dec. 577; Burg v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 90 Iowa, 106, 48 Am. St. Rep. 419, 57 N. W. 680; Brown v. Sioux City & P. R. Co. 94 Iowa, 309, 62 N. W. 737; State v. Asbell, 57 Kan. 398, 46 Pac. 770. In offering such testimony care should be observed to show that the tests were made within the rule stated as to place and circumstances, and the court will not allow the evidence unless these requirements are observed."

tions, as follows: "There are some difficulties attending the admission of this character of evidence. In the first place, in making an experiment some difficulty will be encountered in making it under the same conditions surrounding the original transaction, but it does not occur to us that that should be a reason why this character of testimony should be excluded. Of course, if the evidence regarding an experiment showed one made under circumstances and surroundings so dissimilar to the original transaction as that it would not shed any light upon it, there would be no error in its exclusion. See State v. Fletcher, 24 Or. 295, 33 Pac. 575. But if the evidence shows that the experiment was made under circumstances similar, or approximately similar, to those which surround the original transaction, and such experiment would serve to shed any light upon that transaction, we can see no reason for the exclusion of such experiment, although it might not have been made under exactly similar conditions, as attended the original transaction. The dissimilarity would not exclude, but would go to its weight before the jury. Another difficulty in connection with such testimony is that evidence of experiments made are collateral in their nature, and are liable to consume the time of the court in a trial of such collateral issues. It has been held, on this account, that the court will not stop a case in order that an experiment be made. People v. Levine, 85 Cal. 39, 24 Pac. 631, 22 Pac. 969. And it has been urged, as it is urged in this case, that the evidence was properly excluded; that such evidence is not admissible on account of the danger of fabrication. But in our opinion this furnishes no good reason for its exclusion. All evidence, we might say, can, under circumstances, be fabricated; but the liability of fabrication rarely, if ever, alone, furnishes a good reason for the exclusion of evidence. Upon principle and authority, this character of testimony, where the experiment appears to have been made under conditions similar, or nearly similar, to those which attended the original transaction, and where such experiments would tend to shed any light upon said original transaction, is admissible."

In every one of the above noticed cases, the trial court was reversed because of its rejection of offered evidence as to the result of experiments had under substantially similar conditions as attended the original occurrence. We have quoted only from those involving hearing and seeing, but the others are equally applicable in principle. Of the decisions wherein trial courts have been affirmed, in receiving such evidence, the following, to which many more might be added, are of interest: Boston Woven Hose & Rubber Co. v. Kendall, 178 Mass. 232, 51 L.R.A. 781, 86 Am. St. Rep. 478, 59 N. E. 657, 9 Am. Neg. Rep. 496; State v. Woodrow, 58 W. Va. 527, 2 L.R.A. (N.S.) 862, 112 Am. St. Rep. 1001, 52 S. E. 545, 6 Ann. Cas. 180; Tackman v. Brotherhood of American Yeoman, 132 Iowa, 64, 8 L.R.A. (N.S.) 974, 106 N. W. 350; Augusta R. & Electric Co. v. Arthur, 3 Ga. App. 513; Brooke v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 81 Iowa, 504, 47 N. W. 74; Burg v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 90 Iowa, 106, 48 Am. St. Rep. 419, 57 N. W. 680; Beckett v. Northwestern Masonic Aid Asso. 67 Minn. 298, 69 N. W. 923; Young v. Clark, 16 Utah, 42, 50 Pac. 832, 3 Am. Neg. Rep. 315.

While due care should be exercised by the trial court in seeing that substantial similarity of conditions is proven as a prerequisite to admitting the evidence as to the result of an experiment, care should also be exercised not to reject such evidence when it is manifest that it will tend to shed light upon the original transaction, especially when the real question is circumscribed by such narrow limits as in this case; it being simply as to the distance at which a person upon an approaching car could see deceased at the side of the track. It surely would not be very difficult to reproduce and show the similarity of conditions as to position and appearance of deceased by the track, as to the degree of natural darkness, and the quantity of artificial light present, and as to general surrounding conditions, to render the result of such an experiment of material aid to the jury in determining this, which became largely a controlling question in the case. It is worthy of note that the motorman's evidence stood alone upon this question. It was highly important that additional evidence thereon, if obtainable, should be presented to the jury.

We believe the authorities warrant the assertion that, while appellate courts will not lose sight of the general rule that the admission or rejection of evidence of the result of experiments is largely discretionary in a trial court, the exercise of such discretion will, upon appeal, be viewed somewhat more critically when such evidence is rejected than when it is received. This would seem to be so because of the fact that the admission or rejection of such evidence, in so many instances, has to do more with its weight than with its relevancy, strictly speaking.

Counsel for appellant contend that the trial court erred in giving certain instructions to the jury, and in refusing to give others which were requested, touching the claimed contributory negligence of deceased and the motorman's duty, in the light of the last clear chance doctrine. In view of the seeming uncertainty as to the mental condition in which deceased was just prior to being struck by the car, and the fact that, upon a new trial, more light may be thrown upon that question by the evidence, we deem it unnecessary to do more than refer counsel and the court to the recent decisions of this court in Herrick v. Washington Water Power Co. 75 Wash. 149, 48 L.R.A.(N.S.) 640, 134 Pac. 934; and Mosso v. E. H. Stanton Co. 75 Wash. 220, L.R.A. 1916A, 943, 134 Pac. 941. These decisions have both been rendered since the trial of this case, and we think will furnish all necessary light upon the questions involved in appellant's claim of error touching the instructions and requests therefor which are likely to arise upon a new trial. We therefore pass these claimed errors without discussion. We conclude that the judgment must be reversed, and appellant granted a new trial.

It is so ordered, and the cause remanded to the trial court for further proceedings.

NOTE.

The various questions involved in the reported case (AMSBARY v. GRAYS HARBOR R. & LIGHT CO. ante, 1) as to the extent to which the admissibility of evidence of experiments is affected by the degree of correspondence between the conditions under which the experiments were made and those attendant upon the occurrence to be investigated; and the extent to which the decision of the trial court on the question will be reviewed by the appellate court,—are dealt with in the annotation on page 18, post.

The reported case is of interest, not only as being a typical case of its kind, but also as the only case which expressly points out that while the admission of evidence of experiments is largely in the discretion of the trial court, such discretion does not extend to a refusal to hear evidence upon the preliminary question of similarity of conditions.

Other decisions as to the admissibility of experiments of the kind involved in the reported case may be found in subdivision II. of the annotation above referred to, under the catch line "Visibility," subcatch line,—"of persons on or near track."

v.
W. W. CARDWELL and Wife, Appts.

(— Or. —, 184 Pac. 261.)

Evidence — similarity of conditions.

1. The conditions in the experiment and in the transaction sought to be illustrated do not have to be exactly alike to warrant the admission of experimental evidence.

— as to delivery of hogs — witness's failure to see them.

2. Upon the question whether or not certain hogs were delivered in a butcher shop at a particular time, the bookkeeper may be permitted to testify that they could not have been so delivered without his seeing them, as a conclusion of fact.

Appeal — evidence of expert — absence of effect — influence on jury.

3. The admission of evidence of an expert having no logical effect in the case will not cause a reversal, on the theory that the jury, not being able to figure out for itself what benefit it is, would take it for granted that it was beneficial, since the witnesses would not otherwise have been called.

[See 2 R. C. L. 247.]

Evidence — experiment — loading hogs.

4. Upon the question whether or not a given number of hogs were delivered in a wagon loaded as claimed, evidence is admissible of experiments in loading hogs in wagons of similar dimensions.

Costs — mileage of unsubpoenaed witnesses.

5. The mileage within the state of witnesses voluntarily attending upon request, from another state, may be allowed as costs although they were not subpoenaed.

APPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Douglas County (Hamilton, J.) in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover the amount alleged to be due on a promissory note. Affirmed.

Statement by Bennett, J.:

This is a very remarkable and unusual case. The plaintiff sues upon a promissory note. The defendants admit the note, but claim to have paid the same by the delivery of thirty-six head of hogs, weighing 7,772½ pounds, at the market price of 15 cents per pound, amounting to the total of $1,165.87. The plaintiff denies this payment in toto, and denies that he ever received thirty-six hogs, or any hogs at all, from the defendant at the time in question, or upon the debt in question.

The defendant is corroborated in his claim that he delivered the hogs by his son and his wife, and by the testimony of two hired men, who testified that they helped to butcher the hogs and haul them to Roseburg and deliver them to plaintiff. In addition to this, the defendant's story is corroborated, to some extent, by the testimony of people who lived along the road between defendant's ranch and Roseburg, and who claimed to have seen him hauling hogs in the direction of Roseburg at about the time in question. The defendant claims to have delivered the hogs at plaintiff's butcher shop in Roseburg, just at noon, and at a time when the plaintiff himself was not actually present. He claims to have delivered the hogs to James Kookan and George Hoefling, who were employees of the plaintiff, working at the butcher shop in question. Defendant also testifies that one Andy Morgan, who was working for him at the time in his prune orchard, assisted in butchering the hogs, and rode with him on the wagon which he was driving to town, and helped to deliver the hogs to the plaintiff.

On the other hand, the plaintiff testified that he never received any hogs from the defendant on the debt, and plaintiff's books fail to show that any were received. Kooken and Hoefling, the two employees of plaintiff to whom defendant claims to have delivered the hogs, testify positively that no hogs were delivered. These witnesses are corroborated by Fred Neurither, who worked in the back of plaintiff's shop, and Alice Mann, the bookkeeper, and also by plaintiff's daughter, Florence Kohlhausen. All of these witnesses testified that no hogs were delivered by Cardwell. In addition to this testimony, the plaintiff, in this last trial, offered the testimony of Andy Morgan, one of the employees of the defendant at the time the hogs are alleged to have been butchered on his ranch, and whom, the defendant testified, assisted in the butchering and in transporting the hogs to Roseburg, and delivering them there to the plaintiff. This witness testified positively that he was at work at the defendant's ranch at the time in question, but that he did not assist in butchering any hogs there, or in transporting them to Roseburg, or delivering them to the plaintiff. In fact, he testified that no hogs were butchered at defendant's ranch at or about that time.

At the trial there was a verdict for the plaintiff. There are only two claims of error occurring at the trial, both of which refer to the admission of testimony.

When Alice Mann, plaintiff's bookkeeper, was on the stand, having testified to the particulars in regard to her presence at the shop that day, she was asked the following question:

Q. Now, would it be possible for thirty-six head of dressed hogs to have come into the shop, on the 1st day of March, 1917, or about that time, before you left on March 7th, and you not know it?

The objection to this question was overruled, and the witness answered:

A. It would be impossible for them to come, and me not see them when I came back. I would see even two or three hogs, and certainly could not overlook thirty-six.

This was one of the errors complained of. The other had reference to certain experiments as to the space occupied by hogs in the wagon. This will be noticed more particularly in the body of the opinion.

Messrs. Elbert B. Hermann and Rice & Orcutt, for appellants:

Evidence of an experiment whereby to test the truth of testimony that a certain thing occurred is not admissible where the conditions attending the alleged occurrence and the experiment are not shown to be similar.

Egan v. Finney, 42 Or. 599, 72 Pac. 133.

Bennett, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

We think there was no error in permitting the witness, Alice Mann, to testify as to whether or not the hogs could have been in the shop without her seeing them. This, of course, was in some sense a conclusion; but whether they could have been there and escaped her observation depended on a great number of small details—the general course of business, the place where hogs were hung, the arrangement of the building and position of windows and doors therein, her own position in the building, her own habits of observation and alertness of mind, and the extent to which she kept the business under her personal observation. These were all matters that could hardly have been accurately and fully reproduced to the jury. Under such circumstances, the witness is permitted to state her conclusion, which is treated as a conclusion of fact under the authorities.

Evidence—as to delivery of hogs—witness's failure to see them.

In Lawson on Expert and Opinion Evidence, p. 509, the author quotes with approval from the opinion in the case of Cavendish v. Troy, 41 Vt. 107, as follows: "Where the witness has had the means of personal observation, and the facts and circumstances which lead the mind of a witness to a conclusion are incapable of being detailed and described, so as to enable anyone but the observer himself to form an intelligent conclusion from them, the witness is often allowed to add his opinion, or the conclusion of his own mind."

In the Vermont case quoted from, the witness was being interrogated as to the residence of another party in a certain town, and was asked:

Q. From your opportunities of knowing, as you have now stated them, do you think it possible for Thomas to have lived in Jay that year, and you not have known it?

And the question was held proper.

In Rogers on Expert Testimony, p. 9, § 4, it is said: "Witnesses are allowed to express opinions based on facts within their personal observation, when the facts cannot be so described as to enable another to draw any intelligent conclusion therefrom."

It is also claimed that there was error in permitting the evidence of certain witnesses for the plaintiff in regard to experiments made by them in loading hogs in a wagon. The defendant had testified that the hogs delivered by him were carried in two wagons, twelve in a small or ordinary wagon, which, however, had a bed 16 inches longer than an ordinary wagon, and twenty-four of them in a large wagon with a rack. This rack, according to the testimony of the defendant, was 14 feet long and about the width of an ordinary wagon, and the rack on this wagon was 3 feet, 6 inches, high. There is a discrepancy between the testimony of this witness, as to the height of the wagon, and that of Dug Good, from whom the wagon was obtained, who testified that it was only 32, instead of 42, inches high. The testimony of the defendant is to the effect that the hogs were put in the wagon in layers, three in each layer, lengthwise across the bed of the wagon, and then others were piled in upon these in the most convenient way. According to the testimony of the defendant, the hogs taken in by him would average about 216 pounds in weight. The experiments made by the defendant were with an ordinary wagon, and the hogs weighed 219 pounds each, and the experiment was made with eight hogs.

In the matter of the experiment, there was no attempt to fill the wagon, which was only 29½ inches high, and the only effect of the testimony was to show about what space such hogs would occupy in a wagon. The testimony was to the effect that three such hogs could be laid lengthwise in a tier across the wagon. This was in accordance with the testimony of the defendant, who testified that the hogs transported were laid in the wagon in that way. The testimony was that two tiers of the hogs were 10½ feet long, and that each hog was 16 inches one way and 12 the other, and the three hogs in each row filled the bed up the full width, and when one hog was laid sideways across these, it filled the bed up to within 6 inches of the top. This testimony does not seem to have had much weight, and it probably did not influence the jury at all. Indeed, in some respects, as we have seen, it corroborated the testimony of defendant. If the large rack was 42 inches high, as testified by defendant, the testimony rather tended to show that twenty-four hogs could have been loaded in such a rack 14 feet long.

It is practically conceded in the brief of the learned attorney for the defendant that the evidence had no logical effect in the case; but it is urged that "the jury would naturally conclude that this evidence must be beneficial to the respondent, or he would not have called the witnesses, and, being unable to figure out for themselves what benefit it was, took it for granted that it was beneficial, and that these men would not have come in and testified unless their evidence was beneficial to the respondent."

We cannot assume that the jury were so lacking in intelligence as to be carried away and influenced by such artificial and illogical considerations. On the contrary, we must presume that they were men of ordinary and usual intelligence, and that they would decide the case according to the evidence, without reference, to the mere number of witnesses called by the respective parties.

Appeal—evidence of expert—absence
on jury.

The questions involved in this case were peculiarly for the jury, involving as they did so much of conflict in the direct testimony of the witnesses, and so many conflicting circumstances corroborating each side. The jury heard and saw the witnesses, and could compare their testimony and judge of their credibility. The case seems to have been fairly tried, as the record is unusually free even from claim of error. Even if we thought that the testimony as to the loading of these hogs was, on the whole, inadmissible, it would seem a trifling thing upon which to reverse a case which had otherwise been fairly tried. It is so unlikely and improbable that the evidence substantially affected the verdict, and it is so minor and unimportant in its character, we should hesitate to reverse the case upon that ground.

Besides, we think the evidence, so far as it went and so far as it had any effect at all, was admissible. It only went to the extent of showing what space in an ordinary wagon box eight hogs would fill. The hogs were practically the same size as the average of the hogs hauled by the defendant. The average of one lot was 215 pounds and a fraction over, and the other 219 pounds and a little over, or about 4 pounds' difference. This was about as close as was possible, and the wagon boxes were practically the same in width. The length of the wagon box, or its height, did not cut any figure so far as the experiment went, for it was not claimed that the hogs loaded on experiment filled the whole space of the wagon bed either as to length or height, so the only effect of the experiment was to show the space occupied by each hog, the number that could be put in a tier across the bed, and the length of two tiers of such hogs in the bed. For these measurements the conditions of the experiment were almost exactly similar with the conditions as to the hogs loaded by defendant. As we have already said, the evidence certainly did not go very far, and probably did not at all contradict the evidence of the defendant. Nevertheless, it might assist the jury somewhat, in arriving at a conclusion as to how many hogs could be loaded in such wagons, to know how much space would be taken by such a hog.

The conditions do not have to be, as we understand it, exactly alike, in order to sustain the admission of the experimental testimony. Such testimony is largely in the discretion of the court, and it is only necessary that the facts of the experiment be reasonably similar to those in the main contention, and not misleading in their character. In one of the Lake Labish Cases (Leonard v. Southern P. Co. 21 Or. 555, 15 L.R.A. 221, 28 Pac. 887), the defendant contended that the fall of the bridge and the ensuing wreck were caused by someone having placed a loose rail across the rail of the defendant's track. The plaintiff, in rebuttal, produced a loose rail at the trial, and a car wheel, and undertook to show by experiment that the marks on the loose rail introduced by defendant could not have been caused in that way. The conditions were not exactly the same. The bottom rail was loose, instead of being fast to the track, and the wheel offered in evidence was only 26 inches, whereas the wheel of the locomotive was 33 inches, in diameter. It was urged that the conditions were not sufficiently similar to justify the introduction of the experiment in evidence. Mr. Justice Lord, delivering the opinion of the court, said: "In all cases of this sort, very much must necessarily be left to the discretion of the trial court; but when it appears that the experiment or demonstration has been made under conditions similar to those existing in the case in issue, its discretion ought not to be interfered with."

In Davis v. State, 51 Neb. 301, 70 N. W. 984, there was a controversy as to whether or not the defendant could have unscrewed certain bolts, and drawn the spikes, and torn up the track with a monkey wrench and clawbar offered in evidence. The place in question was on a trestle, and the state was permitted to offer evidence as to experiments in tearing up a track at another place on the tracks of defendant, where the track ran along the ground and not on a trestle. The court held the evidence admissible, saying: "It was for the jury to consider the place where the displacement of the fixtures occurred, and the place where the experiment was made, and then to give such weight to the testimony of the state's witness who made the experiment as they thought it deserved."

In Sonoma County v. Stofen, 125 Cal. 32, 57 Pac. 681, the county treasurer, being sued for a balance of county money in his hands, claimed that he had been robbed of the money, and that the robber had knocked him down and left him unconscious, and locked him in the vault, where he remained for a number of hours. The vault was in his office, and was connected by doors with the sheriff's office in another part of the building. He claims to have kicked violently against the door after he became conscious, and made all the noise he could in that way. The state offered evidence of witnesses who had made experiments by kicking at the door in the vault, and the testimony of other witnesses, in the sheriff's office and other parts of the courthouse, who had heard the sound made in the vault. There had been some changes in the building, and it was not shown that the climatic or atmospheric conditions were the same. It was urged that the conditions were not sufficiently similar to justify the evidence of the experiment. The court held otherwise, saying: "Experimental evidence in corroboration or disproof depends for its value upon the fact that the experiment has been made when the conditions affecting the result are, as near as may be, identical with those existing at the time of and operating to produce the particular effect. An absolute identity is, of course, impossible; but a substantial identity must exist to give the evidence value. But this identity need not extend to nor be shown to exist as to conditions which could have had no causal operation upon the result."

The authorities are not very definite as to just how closely similar the conditions of the experiment must be to the facts in contention, in order to make the experiment admissible. We think, however, a fair statement of the rule would be that if the experiments are not likely to be misleading to the jury in any particular, and are under conditions similar, so that they would be of assistance to the jury in arriving at a correct verdict, the evidence is admissible.

We think the experiment in this case came within this rule. The hogs were practically of the same size as the average of those shipped by the defendant, and the wagon box was a standard wagon box in each case. These were the important conditions for this experiment, as far as it went. It is true that the wagons were not of the same length, but that fact was in no way misleading to the jury, for the difference was in evidence before them, and there was no attempt on the part of the plaintiff to show any more than the mere fact of how much space in length and in width the two tiers of hogs took and the height of such tiers. This was as far as the experiment went, and the length of the wagon box, or even its height, did not enter into the question at all. We think, therefore, the admission of the testimony in regard to these experiments was within the sound discretion of the court.

The only other question involved refers to the taxation of costs. The plaintiff in his cost bill included mileage for the witnesses Kooken, Hoefling, and Morgan from the place where they entered the state line. These witnesses resided out of the state of Oregon, one at Seattle, Washington, one at Pocatello, Idaho, and one in Massachusetts. They were not subpoenaed, but came as witnesses at the request of the plaintiff. It is stipulated that they actually traveled the miles claimed from the state line to Roseburg, the place where the trial was held. It is claimed on behalf of the defendant that, as these witnesses did not reside within the state of Oregon, and were not subject to subpoena in this state, and as the court did not and could not effectively order their personal attendance, the plaintiff is not entitled to recover mileage for such witnesses.

We think the question is concluded by the principles announced and the reasoning in the cases of Crawford v. Abraham, 2 Or. 166, and Egan v. Finney, 43 Or. 599, 72 Pac. 133. In the Crawford Case it is said: "Mileage will not be allowed for witnesses beyond the boundaries of the state."

It is also said in that case: "The attendance of witnesses may be procured by request of parties, or by agreement; and the party so liable may recover disbursements for proper mileage and attendance. The statutory means of compelling the attendance of witnesses is by subpoena duly served; but we are at a loss to see how any party can be injured in having to pay mileage and attendance merely for the witnesses of an adversary, who attends upon request or agreement, when the additional expense of officers' fees and mileage for issuing and serving of a subpoena, swelling largely the claim for disbursements, could do no more than procure the attendance of the witness."

In this case the witnesses might unquestionably have been subpoenaed at the state line and compelled to attend, and in that event it seems clear that they would have been entitled to their mileage, from the state line, and, as is said in the Crawford Case, the defendant could lose nothing by the fact that they were not regularly subpoenaed. In Egan v. Finney, supra, the court held that the witnesses in question were not properly subpoenaed. One of them had come a long distance from Baker county. The court said: "These witnesses attended, however, in pursuance of a request, and, as the court found that their testimony was 'material, relevant, and competent,' they are entitled to single mileage and per diem, if their oral examination was important and desirable. . . . The issue in this suit involving an inquiry as to angles, lines, courses, and distances, an examination of the transcript, in the light of the maps introduced in evidence, shows that the oral examination of these witnesses was important and desirable. They are, therefore, entitled to single mileage."

These decisions establish the rule that a party may recover single mileage for witnesses who reside in some other county of the state, where their oral testimony is desirable, even although they may not have been regularly subpoenaed or served with an order of the court, and it is fully established in the Egan Case, as we think, that the court may look to the whole record as to the necessity and desirableness of securing the attendance of the witnesses.

It is true that in neither of these cases does it appear that any of the witnesses resided outside of the boundaries of the state, but in this regard we cannot see any distinction between the case of a witness who resides in Baker county, and one who comes across the state line into Baker county from another state; in the latter case they are subject to a subpoena as soon as they cross the state line, and in neither case is the adverse party in any way prejudiced, or his costs increased, by the fact that they were not regularly subpoenaed and compelled to attend.

In this case, as we have already seen, it appears from the record that there was a very great conflict between the witnesses for the plaintiff and defendant on the vital point in the case. We think that, if there ever was a case where it was important and desirable that the witnesses should testify orally, so the jury could have an opportunity to observe them, and judge of their manner on the witness stand and of their credibility, this was such a case. We think, therefore, there was no error of the court in taxing single mileage for these witnesses from the state line to the place of the trial.

ANNOTATION.

Experimental evidence as affected by similarity or dissimilarity of conditions.

I. In general:

- a. The general rule, 18.
- b. Extent of permissible dissimilarity, 23.
- c. Review in appellate court, 24.
- d. Dissimilarity as affecting weight of evidence, 26.

II. Applications of the general rule, 26.

I. In general.

a. The general rule.

Notwithstanding the reluctance exhibited in some of the earlier cases to admit evidence of experiments on the ground that to do so is to permit a party to manufacture evidence in his own favor, and that if one experiment is permitted, others relating to the same subject must also be admitted on behalf of the opposite party, and innumerable issues be thus raised collateral to the main issue, permitting the suit to expand "like the banyan tree of India, whose branches drop shoots to the ground, which take root, and form new stalks, till the tree itself covers great space by its circumference,"—it has been very generally held that, subject to the condition presently to be discussed, experiments may be performed in the presence of the jury, or evidence be given of experiments performed out of court.

Obviously, the probative value of such experiments will depend upon the correspondence of the conditions under which they are performed to those attendant upon the occurrences to be investigated. If there is an exact correspondence of such conditions, the experiments will amount to a demonstration, and be conclusive upon the issue; but as such exact correspondence is ordinarily unattainable, allowance must be made for the dissimilarity of conditions in determining the probative force of the experiments. Such dissimilarity, however, may affect not merely the weight of the evidence, but its admissibility; and it is to a consideration of this aspect of the subject that this annotation is addressed.

The general rule, as stated in the cases below cited, is that to render experiments permissible, or to admit evidence of experiments made out of court, the conditions need not be identical with those existing at the time of the occurrence, but that it is sufficient if there is a substantial similarity.

Causal conditions and circumstances must first be shown to have been substantially reproduced at the experiment. Riggs v. Metropolitan Street R. Co. (1909) 216 Mo. 304, 115 S. W. 969.

Such a similarity of conditions must be made to appear as will insure a reasonably just and accurate comparison. Rowe v. Northport Smelting & Ref. Co. (1904) 35 Wash. 101, 76 Pac. 529.

In Vandalia R. Co. v. Duling (1915) 60 Ind. App. 332, 109 N. E. 70, it is said: "In order that evidence of such a character may be admissible, it is not essential that the conditions be exactly reproduced in all their details. If so reproduced, credible evidence of an experiment and its result would amount to demonstration, and would be conclusive on the issue involved. It is sufficient if the conditions under which the experiment was made are shown to have been substantially the same as those that existed in the transaction being investigated. If substantially the same, any departure goes to the weight rather than to the admissibility of the evidence."

In Sonoma County v. Stofen (1899) 125 Cal. 32, 57 Pac. 681, it is said: "Experimental evidence in corroboration or disproof depends for its value upon the fact that the experiment has been made when the conditions affecting the result are, as near as may be, identical with those existing at the time of and operating to produce the particular effect. An absolute identity is, of course, impossible, but a substantial identity must exist to give the evidence value. But this identity need not extend to nor be shown to exist as to conditions which could have had no causal operation upon the result."

The rule requires only substantial likeness. The fact that the evidence fails to show an entire likeness of circumstances in every respect will not, in all cases, render evidence of an experiment incompetent. If there be a general similarity, the lack of likeness in minor features goes to the weight of the evidence, and not to its admissibility. State v. Nowells (1907) 135 Iowa, 53, 109 N. W. 1016.

The measure of the permissible extent of variation of the conditions of the experiment from those of the occurrence, as stated by the courts, is whether such variation is liable to confuse or mislead the jury. See

Thus, in Hisler v. State (1906) 52 Fla. 30, 42 So. 692, the court said that "evidence of this kind should be received with caution and only be admitted when it is obvious to the court from the nature of the experiments that the jury will be enlightened rather than confused. In many instances, a slight change in the conditions under which the experiment is made will so distort the result as to wholly destroy its value as evidence, and make it harmful rather than helpful."

It has been held immaterial that the variations in the conditions are more favorable to the other party. Halverson v. Seattle Electric Co. (1904) 35 Wash. 600, 77 Pac. 1058.

But for an implication to the contrary, see Elgin, A. & S. Traction Co. v. Wilson (1905) 120 Ill. App. 371.

Whether it has a tendency to aid rather than to confuse the jury is not a question of law, but one of fact; so the question raised by an exception to the admission of such evidence is whether it was relevant to any issue in the case, not whether it would be likely to aid or confuse the jury. Healey v. Bartlett (1904) 73 N. H. 110, 59 Atl. 617, 6 Ann. Cas. 413.

If made under changed conditions, or in such circumstances that the experiments might be worthless or misleading, an objection to the testimony should specify these grounds of objection; and the mere objection to the evidence that it relates to an experiment not made in the presence of the accused is insufficient. Hicks v. State (1916) 146 Ga. 221, 91 S. E. 57.

Accordingly, the degree of similarity essential to the admissibility of evidence of an experiment will depend somewhat upon the purpose for which such evidence is sought to be introduced. A greater amount of latitude is permitted where the evidence is offered in rebuttal of evidence of experiments given on behalf of the other party. Thus, in Illinois C. R. Co. v. Burns (1889) 32 Ill. App. 196, an action brought to recover damages for the killing of plaintiff's horses by defendant's railroad train, where, as a part of the evidence for the defense, defendant had given the result of certain experiments made by placing a train in the position, as nearly as possible, of the one causing the injury, and detailing to the jury the opinion of those taking part therein as to how far away at certain points upon the track the horses could probably have been seen from the engine, it was held that there was no such abuse of discretion on the part of the trial court as to call for interference, in permitting plaintiff to prove in rebuttal the result of an experiment made by himself and others, after defendant's evidence upon the subject had been given, in which they had placed a man on a ladder in the track, intending thereby to raise his head to the same height as though he was standing in the cab of a locomotive, and then placing others in the ditch at a point where it was claimed the horses were, and giving to the jury the result of such observations, the court saying: "In so far as the experiments made failed to comply with the true condition of things at the time of the accident, the results obtained would not be as satisfactory and convincing to the jury as when all the conditions of the experiment were precisely like those existing at the time of the accident, and the jury should and doubtless did make allowance for these imperfect conditions. But to say that appellant may place an engine at a given point, and permit an engineer standing thereon to state to the jury at what distance horses at the side of the track could be observed, and deny to appellee the right to show the result of experiments made by himself or his witnesses, because he cannot place an engine at the point of observation, but is compelled to use something else to bring his line of vision as nearly as may be to the place the engineer would occupy, would not be in accordance with reason or justice."

So also, dissimilarity between the conditions of the experiment and those of the occurrence under investigation is not necessarily objectionable, where the evidence is introduced not for the purpose of showing how the event took place, but as showing the qualification of witnesses to give an opinion as to how the event took place. Thus, in People v. Thompson (1899) 122 Mich. 411, 81 N. W. 344, a prosecution for manslaughter against an engineer alleged to have negligently left unattended a boiler which exploded, killing a number of persons, it was held that evidence was properly admitted of the results of experiments made to ascertain within what time a given pressure of steam could be raised in a boiler by the use of oil as fuel, where the record did not show that it was contended or argued that because steam could, by the use of oil as fuel under one boiler, be raised in a given time, therefore it would have a like effect under the boiler which was in charge of defendant, but it appeared that the result of the experiments was given as showing the qualifications of the witnesses who testified as to the probable effect of the firing of the boiler in question, in the manner in which it was fired.

The fact that the attention of the person making the test is especially directed to the subject of the test may constitute a variance in the condition. See Ord v. Nash (1897) 50 Neb. 335, 69 N. W. 964, 1 Am. Neg. Rep. 110.

c. Review in appellate court.

The similarity of circumstances and conditions goes to the admissibility of the evidence, and must be determined by the court. Hisler v. State (1906) 52 Fla. 30, 42 So. 692; Spires v. State (1905) 50 Fla. 121, 39 So. 181, 7 Ann. Cas. 214.

The admission of evidence of experiments, or permitting them to be performed in court, is a matter peculiarly within the discretion of the trial judge, and this discretion will not be interfered with unless it be apparent that it has been abused.

But where such evidence is admitted over proper objection, and the rule as to similarity of circumstances and conditions attending the appearance and the experiment does not appear to have been complied with in admitting the evidence, the appellate court will review the ruling, and if error be found therein, and it does not appear from the whole record that no harm could have resulted to the defendant from the admission of such evidence, the error may cause a reversal of the judgment. Hisler v. State (1906) 52 Fla. 30, 42 So. 692.

It is not entirely within the discretion of the trial court to admit or exclude such evidence. While it is largely within its discretion to determine whether the testimony showed that the experiment was made under such conditions as to fairly illustrate the point in issue, yet, when it is shown that the conditions were essentially the same in both instances, the testimony should be admitted and its weight determined by the jury. Starr v. People (1900) 28 Colo. 184, 63 Pac. 299.

In AMSBARY v. GRAYS HARBOR R. & LIGHT CO. (reported herewith) ante, 1, it is said: "We believe the authorities warrant the assertion that, while appellate courts will not lose sight of the general rule that the admission or rejection of evidence of the result of experiments is largely discretionary in a trial court, the exercise of such discretion will, upon appeal, be viewed somewhat more critically when such evidence is rejected than when it is received. This would seem to be so because of the fact that the admission or rejection of such evidence, in so many instances, has to do more with its weight than with its relevancy, strictly speaking."

Where there is some ground of support for the action of the trial court in rejecting evidence of the result of experiments, its decision must stand. Wilson v. Chippewa Valley Electric R. Co. (1908) 135 Wis. 18, 114 N. W. 462, 115 N. W. 330.

The discretion of the trial court does not extend to a refusal to hear evidence upon the preliminary question of similarity of conditions. AMSBARY v. GRAYS HARBOR R. & LIGHT CO. (reported herewith) ante, 1.

There is no error in excluding evidence of an experiment where the matter on which it bears is of small consequence. Ulrich v. People (1878) 39 Mich. 245.

If the essential conditions under which the experiment or observation is made are substantially the same as those of the actual occurrence which is being investigated, any departure or minor variation goes to the weight rather than the admissibility of the evidence.

The rule is an abstract rule only, and its application varies with the particular circumstances of each case. Hence it is deemed desirable to trace the applications of the rule made by the court; and, for convenience in reference, these have been arranged and cross indexed with reference to the nature of the experiment and the point sought to be demonstrated thereby.

In Mayer v. Thompson-Hutchison Bldg. Co. (1897) 116 Ala. 634, 22 So. 859, 3 Am. Neg. Rep. 513, an action for injuries by one who was struck by a brick falling from the cornice of a building alleged to have been improperly constructed, it was held error to allow the defendant to prove that one or more persons stood with safety upon a cornice of the building, which was shown to have been constructed similarly to the one from which the brick fell.

In Decatur Car Wheel & Mfg. Co. v. Mehaffey (1900) 123 Ala. 242, 29 So. 646, an action for the death of one who was thrown from a hanging scaffold, it was held that the court erred in permitting the plaintiff to introduce evidence of tests made by certain witnesses upon the scaffold two years after the alleged accident, for the purpose of showing to what extent the scaffold could be made to swing or oscillate, where it appeared that at the time of such experiment the scaffold was not in the same condition as it was at the time of the accident, there being no braces upon it, whereas there were such braces at the time of the accident, to keep it steady.

In Daniels v. Stock (1913) 23 Colo. App. 529, 130 Pac. 1031, an action for damages on account of an alleged wound between the knee and ankle, which plaintiff claimed to have received while bathing in one of defendants' bathtubs in their public bathhouse, it was held that the trial court did not err in excluding the testimony of a witness, and a demonstration offered to be made by him in a bathtub, for the purpose of showing that it was impossible for a person to receive a scratch in the fore part of the leg between the knee and the ankle from a defect such as was alleged to have existed, there being no proof that the tub was exactly similar nor that the leg of the witness was sufficiently the same form as that of the plaintiff.

In an action for personal injuries received while shoveling coal into a tub, by means of which it was removed from a vessel, the plaintiff may demonstrate before the jury, with a model of the tub and with small pieces of coal and a pan, how the bucket operated when in use. Pennsylvania Coal Co. v. Kelly (1895) 156 Ill. 9, 40 N. E. 938.

In Smith v. Stover Mfg. Co. (1917) 205 Ill. App. 169, an action for injuries sustained by the tipping over of a heavy piece of machinery while being moved across a bridge about 10 feet long, made of six planks laid endways, in which plaintiff claimed that the single-wheel dolly upon which the front of the machine was supported bent down the plank on which it rested from 4 to 6 inches, causing its end to rise and so to strike a wheel of the rear dolly as it reached the end of the bridge, it was held that there was no error in excluding testimony that, while the bridge was in the same condition as on the day of the accident, witness took a machine exactly like the one in question and placed it on the bridge and took measurements as to the depression caused thereby, since an entire machine might be placed on the middle of the bridge without causing so much depression of any single plank as would the weight of one end of it thrown upon a single plank.

In Chicago City R. Co. v. Brecher (1904) 112 Ill. App. 106, an action to recover damages for the death of plaintiff's decedent, occasioned by the alleged negligence of defendant, it appeared that the deceased was riding on the front footboard of an engine when it came to a crossing of defendant's tracks, where, by reason of the unsafe condition of such tracks at the crossing, the weight of the engine caused them to sink down so that the footboard was caught by some portion of the track and crossing, and was thereby broken, and the deceased was thrown off and killed. It was held to be error to admit evidence of an experiment made on the following day, after the crossing had been filled and tamped, by running the same engine, equipped with a new footboard which was of the same height as was the old one, without cars attached, over the crossing and track, the speed of the engine upon the two occasions not being the same, and there being no evidence that the temperature at the time of the accident and of the experiment was the same.

In Chicago Folding Box Co. v. Schallawitz (1905) 118 Ill. App. 9, an action for injuries sustained by the starting up of a printing press while plaintiff was reaching down into it, it was held error to permit witnesses to testify that on the following morning before the power started they pulled out the brake and sat on a bench, and that the press started by itself, as obviously the conditions at the time of the experiment were not the same as at the time of the accident, plaintiff having been in contact with the press when he was hurt, so that he might have come in contact with the shifter in such a way as to shift the belt.

recover damages for personal injuries sustained by an operative in a laundry, the plaintiff testified that, after she had stopped a centrifugal clothes drier and put her hand in it to take out the clothes, the drier started by reason of the belt slipping from the loose to the fixed pulley, and that the starting lever flew back and hit her in the face. It was held that there was no abuse of discretion on the part of the trial court in excluding evidence that, with the clothes-drier belt and shifting lever in the same position as it was on the day of the accident and with a girl of the size of the plaintiff in the most exposed position, nearest to the belt and shifting lever, standing in the position naturally occupied by a person taking clothes out of the drier, and in the position the plaintiff said she occupied at the time of the accident, when the lever was thrown over it would not come within a foot or foot and a half of her head or body, inasmuch as the introduction of such evidence would have tended to collateral issues as to whether the girl, belt, and lever were in the same position as they were when the accident happened, and as to the fairness of the experiment.

In Emerson v. Chicago City R. Co. (1917) 203 Ill. App. 412, an action to recover damages for injuries sustained while alighting from a street car, it was held that a witness was properly permitted to testify that right after the accident he put his heel on the step of the car to see if it would catch on the plate, as plaintiff claimed her injury had been caused, and that it did.

In Chicago, St. L. & P. R. Co. v. Champion (1892) — Ind. —, 23 L.R.A. 861, 32 N. E. 874, an action by one whose hand, while he was attempting to make a coupling between two cars, one of which had been "kicked" down the track, was crushed through the alleged negligence of the brakeman on the moving car in releasing the brake when it was within from 6 to 8 inches of the other car, which, according to the plaintiff's theory, caused it to spring or jump forward, it was held that it was error to exclude evidence of an experiment made upon the siding on which the accident took place, by letting a car of the same kind as the one in use at the time of the injury down upon the siding by kicking it by an engine from about the same place from which the car was kicked at the time of the accident, and, when it was within 8 or 10 or 12 inches of the car to which it was to be coupled, letting off the brake in order to show that the car did not increase its speed. The court said: "The important fact sought to be established by the experiment was whether or not a car moving at a slow rate of speed down a slight incline, with the brakes set, would, when the brakes were suddenly loosed, jump or spring forward. If it would do so in one instance, it would, under ordinary conditions, repeat it every time the experiment was tried; for it would be the result of the operation of the laws of motion. The rate at which the car was moving, the suddenness with which the brakes were loosened, the degree of the inclination of the track, might affect the celerity of the movement, but would not affect the nature of the movement. If the question for investigation was the distance which it would jump, or the celerity of the movement, all these things might be important; but in determining whether it would or would not jump they are comparatively unimportant. In our opinion, the circumstances under which the experiment was made were sufficiently similar to the facts surrounding the happening of the accident to make it admissible in evidence for what it was worth, and for this error the judgment must be reversed." But upon a subsequent trial it was held by the appellate court in (1893) 9 Ind. App. 510, 53 Am. St. Rep. 358, 36 N. E. 221, rehearing denied in (1893) 9 Ind. App. 526, 58 Am. St. Rep. 369, 37 N. E. 21, that there was no error in the ruling of the trial court in excluding evidence of such experiment, on the ground that there was no offer to show that the track or car was in essentially the same condition, or whether the brake was tightly or loosely set, or whether the car was kicked hard or easy.

Evidence that within a few days of the day on which plaintiff's buggy was overturned the witness, while driving a sleigh, in attempting to pass the same obstruction in the road, was overturned at or near the same place where the appellant's buggy was overturned, is properly excluded as outside of and foreign to the issue. Ramsey v. Rushville & M. Gravel Road Co. (1882) 81 Ind. 394.

In Lake Erie & W. R. Co. v. Mugg (1892) 132 Ind. 168, 31 N. E. 564, an action for the alleged wrongful killing of a railway brakeman, in which some evidence was given of statements made by the deceased to the effect that at the time the injury occurred his boot froze to the rail and he was unable to pull his foot away, it was held that the evidence of a witness, who was present when the statement was claimed to have been made, that he went on the same day and experimented, and found that the weather had the same effect on his boots, was properly excluded, the time of day being different and the conditions as to warmth and moisture of the boot exposed not being shown to have been the same.

In LaPorte Carriage Co. v. Sullender (1904) — Ind. App. —, 71 N. E. 922, an action for personal injuries sustained by a person struck by flying particles of emery or metal thrown off an emery belt, it was held that evidence offered for the purpose of showing that particles of emery or metal would be thrown only in the direction in which the belt was moving, and that it would not throw particles at a right angle to the belt in the direction in which plaintiff was standing when hurt, was properly excluded, since, in the nature of things, the amount and size of particles and the direction in which and the force with which they would be thrown would depend upon a number of things, such as the character of the metal being polished, the manner in which it was held on the belt, the speed at which the belt was running, or the condition of the belt itself, no attempt being made to show that the experiments were based on conditions substantially the same as those existing at the time of the injury.

In Brooke v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. (1890) 81 Iowa, 504, 47 N. W. 74, an action to recover damages for personal injury to plaintiff's intestate while employed as a brakeman on defendant's railroad, based on the negligence of defendant in leaving a switch in a defective condition, whereby the decedent's foot was caught between the rails while making a coupling and he was thrown down and injured, it was held that a witness was properly permitted to testify as to experiments made by him in placing his own foot between the rails, showing where the foot would be caught and where not, the shoe that the decedent wore being before the jury and the witness who made the experiment being there, so that the relative sizes of the shoes worn by each could be known.

In Huggard v. Glucose Sugar Ref. Co. (1906) 132 Iowa, 724, 109 N. W. 475, an action to recover damages for injuries received by plaintiff while in defendant's employ, due to the fall of a piece of gas pipe from an upper story through an opening in the floor, in which one of the theories of the plaintiff was that the piece of pipe was in or upon a pile of bone dust upon the third floor, and that through the vibration of the building by wind, or the operation of the machinery, it was gradually moved toward the opening in the floor and fell through, it was held that there was no abuse of discretion on the part of the trial court in refusing to permit defendant to show the results of tests made by it as to the effect of vibrations upon a pile of bone dust and a piece of iron pipe for the purpose of showing that the pipe did not fall in the manner claimed, as the conditions of the accident manifestly could not be accurately reproduced.

In Langdon-Creasy Co. v. Rouse (1903) 139 Ky. 647, 72 S. W. 1113, Ann. Cas. 1912B, 292, an action by an employee against her employer for injury sustained in lighting a gasoline lamp, it was held that the trial court properly refused to allow a demonstration before the jury of the manner of filling and lighting the lamp, it not appearing that the lamp was in the same condition as when the accident occurred.

In an action for injuries received through stepping through a hole covered by a sack concealed with dust, evidence as to experiments made to show how a bag covered with dust would sag is not competent, where the hole over which the bag was placed was not shown to be of the same size as that through which plaintiff stepped. Security Cement & Lime Co. v. Bowers (1914) 124 Md. 11, 91 Atl. 834.

Evidence that experiments made after the explosion of a boiler, with similar machinery and with all conditions similar except the hinge, did not result in an explosion, is admissible for the purpose of showing that the explosion was caused by a defective hinge. Boston Woven Hose & Rubber Co. v. Kendall (1901) 178 Mass. 282, 51 L.R.A. 781, 86 Am. St. Rep. 478, 59 N. E. 657, 9 Am. Neg. Rep. 496.

In an action for personal injuries sustained while working upon a certain piece of machinery, there is no abuse of discretion on the part of the court in refusing to permit the defendant to operate the machine in the presence of the jury, who were allowed to examine the mill, it appearing that the machine had been altered considerably since the time of the accident. Kinney v. Folkerts (1891) 84 Mich. 616, 48 N. W. 283.

In an action by a brakeman for injuries claimed to have been occasioned by his alighting upon a projecting tie while swinging himself from the car to the ground, the plaintiff may properly be permitted to testify that since the injury he has made experiments in stepping from the car when at rest, and found that he could step naturally upon a tie that projected 29 inches from the rail, and that he did not think there would be any difficulty in doing so if the car was in motion. Whitcher v. Boston & M. R. Co. (1899) 70 N. H. 242, 46 Atl. 740.

In Gilbert v. Third Ave. R. Co. (1887) 22 Jones & S. 270, 8 N. Y. S. R. 152, an action for personal injuries in which the plaintiff testified that he stood on the steps and platform of a street car, and by a sudden jerk of the car in starting was thrown off, it was held that a witness might be permitted to testify that he had seen a person, placed upon the step of the car as the plaintiff described himself to have been at the time of the accident, thrown in a different direction when the car was suddenly started.

In an action for injuries sustained by a passenger on a street car alleged to have been negligently operated at such speed that it was thrown from the rails on striking a curve, evidence of experiments made under substantially similar conditions, showing that such cars run at their highest possible speed upon the curve would keep upon the track, is admissible. Cheetnam v. Union R. Co. (1904) 26 R. I. 279, 58 Atl. 881, 17 Am. Neg. Rep. 368.

In a suit on an accident policy in which the complainant contended that the insured's death resulted from injuries by being thrown against the seat of a street car by its swerve in rounding a curve, while the defendants claimed that the fall resulted from the physical condition of the insured, it is competent to show experiments made with the same car running upon the same track, unchanged, at various speeds from 2 miles an hour to 10 miles an hour, indicating that the swerve of the car would cause a person to fall in a direction opposite to that in which the insured fell, although the persons who made the experiments were men, and the one who was injured was a small woman, this difference in conditions not altering the result. Fisher v. Travelers' Ins. Co. (1911) 124 Tenn. 450, 138 S. W. 316, Ann. Cas. 1912D, 1246.

In an action for the death of a passenger who fell from the platform of a street car while it was rounding a curve, it is proper to refuse to permit witnesses to testify to the results of experiments made by them in running the same car upon which the accident occurred, through the same curve, where it appears that these experiments were made at a different time of day, when the electric current would have less load and therefore more power, and were made with no load upon the car and upon a dry rail, while the car at the time of the accident was heavily loaded with passengers and the rails were wet. Halverson v. Seattle Electric Co. (1904) 35 Wash. 600, 77 Pac. 1058.

In Schweinfurth v. Cleveland, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. (1899) 60 Ohio St. 215, 54 N. E. 89, an action for the killing of plaintiff's intestate by a train at a highway crossing, it was held that the jury might properly consider information obtained from experiments made in their presence at the crossing with an engine and train, horse and buggy, and men seated in the buggy, the circumstances being like those present at the accident. The court said: "Experiments made in the presence of the jury with a view of reproducing to their senses as nearly as may be the transaction or occurrence, in whole or in part, which is the subject-matter of investigation by them . . . serve to put the jury in possession of knowledge important in the determination of the issues on trial that they could not obtain so readily or accurately from the testimony of witnesses. They are in a measure a substitute for oral testimony, and often may afford evidence more satisfactory and reliable."

In Leonard v. Southern P. Co. (1892) 21 Or. 555, 15 L.R.A. 221, 28 Pac. 887, it was held that in order to disprove that a scar upon the outside of the bottom flange of a railroad rail was made by a wheel on an engine as the wheel lay across the track, it was proper to permit a similar wheel, though somewhat smaller than that on the engine, to be rolled upon a section of a similar railroad rail across which was laid another similar section, in order to show that the wheel could not strike the lower flange as claimed, it being also shown that the larger the diameter of the wheel the further it would be from striking such flange.

In an action for personal injuries from a piece of wood thrown by a saw, evidence as to experiments made with the same saw under practically identical conditions is admissible. Hinkel v. Oregon Chair Co. (1916) 80 Or. 404,

Upon the question whether a circular saw would throw the timber in the way claimed by the plaintiff, witnesses may testify that they saw the machine in operation subsequently to the accident, and that it would not and could not throw the timber in such direction; the only difference in the conditions under which the experiment was conducted being that the saw was slightly rusted and its teeth had been filed down. Kreger v. Brenham Furniture Mfg. Co. (1905) 38 Tex. Civ. App. 399, 85 S. W. 1156.

In Hayes v. Southern P. Co. (1898) 17 Utah, 99, 53 Pac. 1001, 4 Am. Neg. Rep. 730, an action for injuries sustained by an employee of a railroad company who, being in a coal shed having a railroad track through it, was struck by the beam of an engine while standing on the side of the track against a coal bin, where he had stepped aside on the approach of the engine, it was held not to be reversible error to admit evidence of an experiment made with an engine of the same beam which was run past the witness while standing at the place of the accident, without injuring him, notwithstanding the experiment was made with a man other than the plaintiff, inasmuch as the jury had an opportunity for observation and comparison of both of them, and although there was a difference in the rate of speed at which the engines were run, where the rate of speed would not have made any material difference in the result.

In People v. Phelan (1899) 123 Cal. 551, 56 Pac. 424, it was held that the court properly permitted evidence to be given of experiments made by the direction of the prosecution, for the purpose of contradicting the testimony of some of defendant's witnesses relating to sounds heard in the nighttime in the vicinity of defendant's cabin, although the experiments were conducted in the daytime and it was not shown that the atmospheric conditions, such as humidity, temperature, etc., were the same, the court saying: "The principal conditions were the same, and the jury could weigh and make allowance for the differences referred to. They affected the weight but not the competency of the evidence."

In Sonoma County v. Stofen (1899) 125 Cal. 32, 57 Pac. 681, it was held that for the purpose of impeaching the story of a county treasurer that he had been robbed and locked in the vault, and that he had vainly endeavored to attract attention by kicking upon the inner door with the heels of his boots, and who had testified that he did not strike upon the sheet iron lining of the sides of the vault, although he knew that there was a hollow space between it and the brick outer wall, evidence was admissible of experiments made by striking with clinched hands and books of account upon the sheet iron sides, and also of experiments made by striking or kicking upon the inner door, for the purpose of showing that the blows upon the sides were much more audible to persons stationed in different parts of the building than the blows upon the door, although the atmospheric and climatic conditions were not shown to have been the same upon the two days, and the condition of the courthouse had been altered somewhat by the removal of one door between the treasurer's and sheriff's offices and the replacing of the wooden panels and the upper portions of the other doors with glass, it not being apparent that different atmospheric conditions or the structural changes in the building would have materially affected the result.

For the purpose of contradicting a witness who testified to having heard one running from the direction of the spot where an affray took place, and that someone stopped just above the defendant's house and went into his gate, evidence of one that he had gone to the witness's house and had had a man run between the points indicated in the testimony of the witness, and did not hear him except when he fell over a stump, is properly excluded, it not appearing whether the runner making the experiment was, as compared with the defendant, large or small, a light runner or a heavy one, whether the atmospheric conditions and the general conditions as to noise or quiet were similar to those existing at the time of the occurrence, and whether the sense of hearing in the two men was equally keen. Lawrence v. State. (1903) 45 Fla. 42, 34 So. 87.

For the purpose of supporting the testimony of witnesses that they overheard a certain conversation, it is competent to show that persons located as were the witnesses could not hear conversation in an ordinary tone at the place where the conversation in question was carried on, where the conditions when such test was made were the same as those present when the conversation testified to occurred. Starr v. People (1900) 28 Colo. 184, 63 Pac. 299.

In an action for slander in which the defense was that the words were not spoken, evidence may be given of experiments as to whether or not words spoken under similar conditions where defendants stood could have been heard where plaintiff stood. Gambrill

v. Schooley (1902) 95 Md. 260, 63 L.R.A. 427, 52 Atl. 500.

In Dow v. Bulfinch (1906) 192 Mass. 281, 78 N. E. 416, it was held that it could not be said as a matter of law that the trial court erred in excluding evidence of tests made eight years after the occurrence in question, as to the possibility of hearing sounds and conversation in the room below, through an opening around steam pipes, as testified to by a witness for the opposite party, the court saying: "The judge may well have thought that the trial of the question whether the conditions were in all respects the same, what changes, if any, had taken place in the adjustment of the heaters, what was the relative situation of the persons making the test, and whether the surrounding noises, if any, were the same, would lead to an extended inquiry upon collateral matters which would be of no practical assistance to the jury, and that the more direct and logical course was to explain to the jury the exact physical situation at the time of the alleged occurrences, and to leave it to their common knowledge whether, under such a state of things, the witnesses for the plaintiff were to be believed."

For the purpose of contradicting a witness who testified that when he was 100 yards away from the seat of the difficulty he heard certain words spoken, notwithstanding the wind was blowing the sounds from and not toward him, it is competent to permit witnesses to testify that their hearing was good, and that, standing in the position of the witness, they could not hear words spoken by persons standing in the place where the difficulty occurred, in different ranges of voice from the lowest to the highest, the conditions as to wind, etc., being practically the same. Wilson v. State (1896) — Tex. Crim. Rep. —, 36 S. W. 587.

Automobile.

In an action for personal injuries sustained in a collision between a carriage and the defendant's automobile, there is no abuse of discretion on the part of the court in excluding testi-

Banana peel.

In Ft. Worth & D. C. R. Co. v. Yantis (1916) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 185 S. W. 969, an action for injuries sustained by a passenger who claimed to have slipped upon a banana peel in descending the steps of a railway car, in which a witness testified that the banana peel left a very distinct stain upon the doorsill and matting, while witnesses introduced in behalf of the defendant testified that almost immediately after the accident they made an examination and failed to discover any banana peel or stain, it was held proper to permit a witness to testify that he had placed a banana peel upon the outer sill of the door of the same car, stepped upon it with the weight of his body, permitted it to slip off upon the rubber doormat and pushed it along, making a smeared place upon the mat, and that the smeared place was yet visible for a distance of 50 feet, although the experiment had been made some eighteen to twenty hours previously, the fact that, after plaintiff's fall, the stain then made, if any, may have been stepped upon by persons going in and out of the car going rather to the weight of the testimony than to its admissibility.

It is error to admit evidence of an experiment made with a different horse, but a similar wagon, as to the time necessary to traverse a certain space. Louisville R. Co. v. Hoskins (1905) 28 Ky. L. Rep. 124, 88 S. W. 1087.

In Klanowski v. Grand Trunk R. Co. (1887) 64 Mich. 279, 31 N. W. 275, an action for injuries sustained by a collision on a highway crossing between a train and the vehicle in which plaintiff was riding, it was held that a witness was improperly permitted to testify that he went out in a wagon like plaintiff's and placed himself, without measurement, about where plaintiff told him he stopped, and watched for the approach of the train, for the purpose of finding out how long, after he caught sight of it, it would take him to reach the crossing.

In a prosecution for arson it is error to permit two active young men to testify as to the time it took them to walk from the point where a witness testified he met defendant on the night of the fire, to the place of the fire and back to the defendant's home, for the purpose of convincing the jury that defendant, who was an old man in infirm health, could have made the trip in about the same time. People v. Gotshall (1900) 123 Mich. 474, 82 N. W. 274, 13 Am. Crim. Rep. 630.

In order to discredit an alibi based on evidence to the effect that defendant had been on the road with a load weighing about 1,000 pounds, a witness is improperly permitted to testify as to the length of time it took him to make the trip with a similar load, it not appearing that the kind and strength of the horses, the condition of the wagon, and the condition of the road were the same at both times. State v. Ortiz (1919) — N. M. —, 180 Pac. 284.

In State v. Plyler (1910) 153 N. C. 630, 69 S. E. 269, a prosecution for homicide in which one of the points made by the prisoner in his defense was that he could not have walked from his premises, where he was seen at a certain hour, to the scene of the homicide in time to have fired the gun that was supposed to have killed deceased, it was competent to permit a witness to testify, against the prisoner's objection, that he traversed the space between such spot and the scene of the homicide in three minutes.

In order to show that the prosecutrix was mistaken in her identification of the defendant as the person who committed an assault upon her with intent to rape, where it appears that defendant with three other persons, driving a wagon drawn by two mules, was preceded at a certain point on the road by three other wagons some 150 yards in advance of him, and that the wagon in which the defendant was riding passed the other wagons at a point further down the road, having traveled about 830 yards while the preceding wagons were covering about 680 yards, evidence is admissible of experiments made by defendant as nearly as practicable under the same conditions as those attending the original transaction, for the purpose of showing that it was impossible that the wagon in which he was traveling could have stopped at the house of the prosecutrix, and for appellant and his codefendant to have alighted, gone a distance of 190 yards, committed the assault, and then returned to their wagon and overtaken the preceding wagons as the testimony showed. Clark v. State (1897) 38 Tex. Crim. Rep. 30, 40 S. W. 992.

Where a witness testified to having covered a certain route in a given time, other witnesses may, for the purpose of corroborating such testimony, testify as to the length of time taken by them to traverse the same ground, although it appears that part of the way thus walked over was through woods and on a sidehill and was more or less rough and stony, and that there was no path in which to walk, so that the witnesses could not be certain of following the identical course, such dissimilarity of conditions going to the weight and not the relevancy of the evidence. State v. Flint (1888) 60 Vt. 304, 14 Atl. 178.

Door.

In a prosecution for homicide in which it was proved as an inculpatory fact against defendant that the cap of the deceased, who was lying near the door of defendant's saloon, was wedged in under the door and could not have been pushed in from the outside, it was error to permit witnesses to testify as to experiments made with the cap of the deceased to show that, when put on the floor inside the door with the back mashed down and the door shut, it would catch under the door at the place and in the manner in which the witness had testified to having found it, where it was not shown that the door was in the same condition, or that at the time of the homicide the cap was mashed down behind as it was at the time of the experiment.

In Mann v. Reynolds (1912) 150 Ky. 313, 150 S. W. 329, an action against a druggist for negligently selling bichloride of mercury instead of calomel, it was held that the trial court properly permitted an apothecary to bring into court samples of calomel and of bichloride of mercury, although the bichloride of mercury was in crystalline form and not in powdered form like that sold by the druggist, the testimony being clear that it was one and the same drug.

In People v. Hill (1899) 123 Cal. 571, 56 Pac. 443, it was held improper, for the purpose of establishing that a depression in a wire fence had been made by defendant in climbing over it, to permit a witness to testify that he had put his weight on the wire next to another post for the purpose of observing its effect, and that it made the downward appearance testified to, inasmuch as the relative weight of the two persons, the tension of the wire at the different posts, and the force with which each stepped upon the fence were elements to be considered before the experiment could illustrate the supposed act of the defendant.

In State v. Bass (1913) 251 Mo. 107, 157 S. W. 782, defendant was charged with having shot his wife, whose partly consumed body, taken from the ruins of the house to which he was supposed to have set fire in order to conceal his crime, proved to contain shot, which the defendant accounted for by the fact that he had in the house a large number of shotgun shells, placed in an earthen churn, which were heard to explode during the fire. It was held to be error to admit, on behalf of the state, evidence of experiments made by throwing shotgun shells into a fire, or building a fire around them, to show that when exploded unconfined the shot had no penetrating force, where it was not shown that the shells used were identical with or reasonably similar to those which were in defendant's house.

In a prosecution for murder there is no error in refusing to permit the defense to use the pistol and cartridges found on the person of the defendant at the time of his arrest for the purpose of testing the shooting capacity of the pistol by shooting into a section of the log taken from the cabin in which the deceased was shot, for the purpose of showing that a ball from this pistol would penetrate much further into the wood than the evidence showed was done by the pistol that probably did the killing, it not being shown from what point or position in the room any of the balls embedded in the wall were fired at the time of the affray, or that the cartridges were the same as those in evidence, or that the distance from which the shots were fired was known. State v. Fletcher (1893) 24 Or. 295, 33 Pac. 575.

In Mansfield v. Com. (1915) 163 Ky. 488, 174 S. W. 16, a prosecution for homicide in which the theory of the defense was that the deceased, holding the barrel of his pistol in his hand, struck defendant on the top of his head with the butt end of it, thereby causing the pistol to discharge, it was held that a pistol of like make might be used in the presence of the jury for the purpose of demonstrating that it could not be discharged by striking the handle against any object or person, but only by pulling the trigger and at the same time pressing the safety device.

In a prosecution for homicide in which the defendant claimed that the deceased was killed by a shot from his revolver when he accidentally dropped it upon the floor, and in which the state showed that the pistol was so constructed that it could not be fired by being struck a blow, the defendant should be permitted to prove that an experiment had been made with the pistol by fastening it in a secure place and striking the hammer, while on the safety notch, a slight blow, and that this blow caused the hammer to strike and explode the cartridge, although the experiment was not made in the same way defendant claimed that the shot was fired, that is, by striking the floor. Hodge v. State (1910) 60 Tex. Crim. Rep. 157, 131 S. W. 577.

In a prosecution for murder in which the defendant claimed that the shooting was accidentally caused by the slipping of his gun from a stump against which he had set it, evidence of experiments made by a witness with a shotgun which was of a different construction and size than the rifle of defendant was properly excluded. People v. Auerbach (1913) 176 Mich. 23, 141 N. W. 869, Ann. Cas. 1915B, 557.

In *Eidt v. In an action for injury to plaintiff's farm by the fumes from a smelter some 2 miles distant, it is error to permit experiments to be made before a jury by pouring sulphuric acid out of a bottle on a wooden stick, a pine branch, and a piece of cloth, there being no such similarity of conditions as to insure a reasonably just and accurate comparison. *Rowe v. In People v. Brotherton (1874) 47 Cal. 388, a prosecution for forgery, it was held competent for the prosecution to show that certain chemicals found in the baggage of one of the defendants had been applied to a check written in imitation of the original check, which defendants were accused of having raised, with the same kind of ink, and that the ink was extracted from the body of the check without served a dim light therein may not be permitted to testify that he had experimented by placing a candle in the room under a counter about where the fire occurred, and then going across the street to about the same place where he had noticed the reflection on the walls of the room the night before the fire, when he noticed the same sort of reflection as that seen by him before the fire. *Hooker v. It is not essential to the admissibility of evidence as to the distance at which powder burns are produced that the experiments should be made upon a live human being. People v. Solani (1907) 6 Cal. App. 103, 91 Pac. 654.

In Tesney v. State (1884) 77 Ala. 33, in which, as bearing upon the question whether defendant had stabbed deceased in self-defense, it was a question whether deceased had shot him at close quarters or from a few paces distant, it was held that the court erred in admitting evidence of the result of a solitary experiment, made by firing at a coat similar to the one worn by defendant in order to show that no powder burns would be produced by a shot at close quarters, the court saying: "Such evidence superinduces the mischief of trying a collateral controverted matter by proving separate and distinct experiments with results as variant as the manner of loading the pistols, and the modes of making the experiments dependent more or less on the wishes and feeling of the person making them, and tends to confuse the jury and withdraw their minds from the consideration of the main issue."

In People v. Clark (1890) 84 Cal. 573, 24 Pac. 313, a prosecution for homicide, in which the distance of the deceased from the defendant at the time of the homicide was material as bearing upon the question whether the shooting was in self-defense, and in which it appeared that no powder marks were found upon the clothing or body of the deceased, it was held that a witness might be permitted to testify to experiments made by him with a rifle of the same make and caliber as that used by the deceased, to show the distance within which the discharge of such rifle would powder mark clothing.

Where the evidence is not only conflicting but far from satisfactory as to there being any powder marks plainly discernible around the wound which occasioned the death of the deceased, and the caliber of the revolver used for the experiment is not shown with certainty to be the same as that used by the defendant, and there is no evidence that the cartridge used for loading was the same in its contents, evidence of experiments made by discharging a revolver at a piece of white paper is properly excluded. People v. Solani (1907) 6 Cal. App. 103, 91 Pac. 654.

In Fein v. Covenant Mut. Ben. Asso. (1895) 60 Ill. App. 274, in which the question was whether a person whose life was insured had killed himself or had come to his death accidentally or as the result of a felonious act of a third person, and in which it was a disputed point whether or not there were powder marks on the face of the deceased, it was held that evidence of experiments made with a pistol of the same nature and caliber as that with which the insured had been killed, and with cartridges from the same box, by shooting at a piece of white paper at varying distances, was properly admitted, the condition being substantially the same except that paper was used instead of the skin of a living man.

In Thrawley v. State (1899) 153 Ind. 375, 55 N. E. 95, a prosecution for homicide which defendant claimed to have occurred in a hand-to-hand conflict, while the prosecution adduced evidence to show that the deceased had been shot from a distance, it was held competent to permit a witness to testify to the result of experiments in shooting with defendant's revolver at blotting pads for the purpose of showing how far unburned grains of powder would carry, the same make and grade of cartridges being used as defendant had employed in the homicide, and it being shown that such cartridges were standard and very uniform in operation.

In State v. Newells (1906) 135 Iowa, 53, 109 N. W. 1016, in which it was a question whether or not the person whom defendant was accused of killing had committed suicide, it was held that there was no error in admitting evidence of an experiment made by shooting at a piece of the shirt worn by the deceased when he was killed, with the defendant's revolver, at a distance of 6 to 12 inches, for the purpose of noting the resulting powder marks or burns, if any, although it was not shown that the cartridges employed by the witnesses were the same as the particular cartridge from which the bullet was shot into the body of the deceased.

In Scott v. Homesteaders (1910) 149 Iowa, 541, 129 N. W. 310, in which the question was whether the insured, who died from a gunshot wound, had committed suicide, the defendant advanced the theory that where the muzzle of a pistol or revolver is held close enough against the point of injury to prevent communication with the outside atmosphere, no powder marks will appear on the outside of the wound, and introduced expert evidence to that effect, based upon alleged observation and experiment, in which no differentiation was claimed as to the caliber of pistols or revolvers. It was held competent to permit testimony on the part of the plaintiff that, upon the discharge of a revolver placed against a piece of bacon supported by a cabbage head, powder marks appeared upon the exterior surface of the bacon, although such experiment was conducted with a pistol of smaller caliber than that with which the insured was presumably killed.

In State v. Asbell (1896) 57 Kan. 398, 46 Pac. 770, in which it was a question whether or not the person for whose murder defendant was being tried had committed suicide, it appeared that the hair around the bullet hole was not stained and that there were no powder marks on the flesh, and it was claimed that if the decedent had fired the pistol it would have necessarily been close to her head and the hair would have been singed and the flesh powder marked. It was held that a witness was properly permitted to testify to the result of experiments conducted by him by shooting at human hair and a paper target with the pistol with which the deceased was killed, and with cartridges similar to those found therein, at distances ranging from 6 inches to 10 feet.

Experiments made with the same revolver and the remaining ammunition contained therein by shooting at a piece of light cloth, for the purpose of determining the distance at which the revolver must have been held to produce the burned effect found upon the clothing of a woman, is admissible upon the question whether she was murdered or committed suicide. Newkirk v. State (1919) — Md. —, 106 Atl. 694.

In Beckett v. Northwestern Masonic Aid Asso. (1897) 67 Minn. 298, 69 N. W. 923, in which it was a question whether a person insured had committed suicide, and there was evidence tending to prove that there were no powder marks around the wound, it was held to be competent, for the purpose of rebutting the theory of suicide, to show the results of experiments made by discharging the same revolver loaded with similar cartridges and noticing at what distances from the muzzle of the revolver hair and other substances were singed and powder burned.

In Huestis v. Aetna L. Ins. Co. (1915) 131 Minn. 461, 155 N. W. 643, in which it was a question whether the insured had shot himself accidentally or with suicidal intent, and the closeness of the gun to the place of the wound had some bearing on the probability of its being fired intentionally, the court admitted testimony as to the result of experiments with the same gun, loaded with similar shells, fired into sheets of cotton wadding.

In McAlpine v. Fidelity & C. Co. (1916) 134 Minn. 192, 158 N. W. 967, in which it was a question whether an insured person had committed suicide or been murdered, it was held that evidence of experiments made with the gun of the insured by shooting against white paper was properly excluded, evidence having been given of the results of other experiments with a substance furnishing a better illustration.

In Lillie v. State (1904) 72 Neb. 228, 100 N. W. 316, a prosecution for homicide in which, in determining whether the shots, one of which passed out through a curtain, the glass of the window, and a wire screen on the outside of the window, were fired by the defendant or by some other person, it became important to know at what distance from the window such shot was fired. The curtain, which was in evidence, was powder burned, and the state offered evidence of experiments which had been performed for the purpose of demonstrating how near it the shot must have been fired to produce such result. It was held that it was not an abuse of discretion on the part of the trial court to admit evidence of experiments in which the material used was a piece of muslin hung before a wooden surface, and about 6 inches distant, with revolvers and cartridges of various kinds, fired at various distances, a record being kept of each shot fired, and each bullet hole through the cloth being fully explained to the jury, the kind of revolver and cartridges used in connection therewith and the distance from which the shot was fired being shown, although it was not known what sort of cartridges or revolver were used by the assassin.

In People v. Fiori (1908) 123 App. Div. 174, 108 N. Y. Supp. 416, a prosecution for homicide in which it appeared that the clothing worn by the deceased contained powder and appeared to be burned or scorched, it was held that, in order to determine from what distance the shot which penetrated the clothing was fired, it was proper to admit evidence of an experiment made by discharging a revolver and cartridges of the same kind as those used by the defendant at pieces of cloth cut from a new garment and moistened to correspond with the presumable condition of the deceased's coat at the time of the killing, it being also attempted to comply with the conditions regarding the atmosphere, the test having been made on a rainy day, and it appearing that it was wet and rainy the night when the homicide was committed. But it appearing that the fatal shot did not penetrate the clothing of the deceased, but struck him in the head, it was held that such evidence injected into the case an element of dissimilarity which, instead of aiding the jury, would be quite liable to confuse them, and under such circumstances was not proper.

In Sullivan v. Com. (1880) 93 Pa. 284, a prosecution for murder in which the defense was set up that the deceased had committed suicide, the prosecution showed that there were no powder marks or burns upon the person or clothing of the deceased. It was held that it was proper to admit evidence of experiments made with the same revolver and cartridges, which were discharged at a piece of muslin at varying distances.

In a prosecution for homicide in which the theory of the defense was that the deceased committed suicide, witnesses may be allowed to state with what results they had fired the pistol with which the killing was done at different distances, for the purpose of ascertaining at what distance it would burn cloth like that worn by deceased, or stain it with powder marks. Boyd v. State (1884) 14 Lea (Tenn.) 161.

In a prosecution for murder a witness may be permitted to testify to experiments made with a pistol used in the killing, for the purpose of showing how far it would powder burn cloth, similar to the shirt worn by the deceased. Hughes v. State (1912) 126 Tenn. 40, 148 S. W. 543, Ann. Cas. 1913D, 1262.

In order to show the distance of the weapon from deceased's head at the time of the homicide, evidence of experiments made as to the effect of powder fired from a pistol upon a pasteboard at various distances is inadmissible, a test on the pasteboard not being similar to firing at the skin of a human being. Morton v. State (1902) — Tex. Crim. Rep. —, 71 S. W. 281.

In Streight v. State (1911) 62 Tex. Crim. Rep. 453, 138 S. W. 742, a prosecution for homicide in which the state contended that when the pistol was fired it burned deceased's eyebrow, it was held error to reject evidence of experiments made with a pistol of the kind found lying by deceased, and the same character of shell, by shooting at a target prepared with human hair placed in the position and to represent human eyebrows, showing that with a bullet hole so placed as in the case of the bullet which killed the deceased it would be impossible at any range for the powder to burn the eyebrow off.

In Reagan v. State (1919) — Tex. Crim. Rep. —, 208 S. W. 523, a prosecution for homicide in which it became material, as bearing upon the question whether the fatal shot was fired in self-defense, to determine at what distance from the deceased it was fired, it was held error to admit evidence of experiments made by shooting the same pistol with the same kind of cartridges at white paper in order to determine the distance at which it would cause powder burns, it appearing that the clothing of the deceased was of dark color.

In Pollock v. State (1908) 136 Wis. 136, 116 N. W. 851, a prosecution for homicide, it was held competent for the purpose of discrediting defendant's claim that he fired in self-defense when he and the deceased were in close proximity, to show that there were no powder marks on the body of the deceased, and to give evidence as to experiments made by shooting bullets from the same pistol, using similar cartridges, through the vest of the deceased at various distances, for the purpose of showing at what distance there would be no powder stains.

In Moehlenbrock v. Parke, D. & Co. (1918) 141 Minn. 154, 169 N. W. 541, an action to recover for the death of a person alleged to have been caused by the administration of impure ether as an anesthetic, against the manufacturer thereof, it was held that evidence was admissible as to the effect of ether out of the same can, administered to another patient on the following day, human beings being physically sufficiently near alike so that it may be assumed that, when a drug produces a certain effect on one person, it will to a certain extent similarly affect another, taking into account age, strength, and other conditions present.

In an action on a bond in which the plaintiff claimed that it was originally sealed with paper taken from the gummed margin of postage stamps, and that such seals had been lost, it was proper to refuse to permit the defendant to adhere the gummed margin of postage stamps to paper in the presence of the jury, and when dry to let the jury remove them, there being no offer to show that such margins, when once adhered to paper, will remain unaffected by time or the conditions under which they are kept or handled. Hardwick Sav. Bank & T. Co. v. Drenan (1900) 72 Vt. 438, 48 Atl. 645.

In Standard Oil Co. v. Reagan (1915) 15 Ga. App. 571, 84 S. E. 69, 8 N. C. C. A. 209, an action for damages occasioned by negligence in selling gasoline as kerosene, it was held no error to show that upon the application of a match to a quantity poured into a tin can the liquid sold as kerosene ignited much more readily than genuine kerosene, although the evidence in the case indicated that the liquid in question had been poured upon chips in a stove to which fire had already been applied.

In Boerner Fry Co. v. Mucci (1913) 158 Iowa, 315, 138 N. W. 866, an action against an ice cream manufacturer for the price of a quantity of vanilla sold to him by plaintiff, alleged not to be according to sample, it was held that the trial court was clearly within its discretion in refusing to permit the jury to taste of ice cream flavored with the vanilla in question, the professed purpose of the experiment being to show that the extract gave the ice cream a soapy taste, since it did not appear that such taste was not attributable to other ingredients.

In a prosecution for homicide, in which the defendant claimed to have been rendered temporarily insane by a drink which had been given him by a saloon keeper, his testimony that liquor tasted by him at the time of the trial had a taste very similar to that which he had drunk prior to the homicide is insufficient to let in evidence of experiments made with ordinary whisky and with a liquor claimed to be of the same character as the liquor which defendant had taken. People v. Slack (1892) 90 Mich. 448, 51 N. W. 533.

In Thornhill v. Carpenter-Morton Co. (1915) 220 Mass. 593, 108 N. E. 474, an action for injuries sustained by the plaintiff from the sudden ignition of the volatile and inflammable gases contained in a stain when a match was lighted in the room where the stain was being applied to the floor, it was held that it could not be said that the trial court abused its discretion in refusing to permit a can of the stain to be lighted in the presence of the jury for the purpose of showing that it could easily be extinguished, the conditions under which the accident occurred being so manifestly different from the conditions when the experiment was proposed that it would not have assisted the

Where plaintiff's theory is that a fire was caused by the ignition of gases formed upon the explosion of an ammonia refrigeration system, consisting of ammonia gas intermingled with the gases formed by the accompanying lubricating oils, the production by defendant of liquid ammonia in court and the offer by counsel to submit it to certain tests and experiments is improper and harmful. *Mueller Bros. E. 1055, in which it was contended that cement delivered was not up to contract grade, it was held that tests made of the cement after it had been subjected to conditions which would change its qualities were incompetent, since they did not tend to show its condition and qualities at the time and place of delivery.

received of the defendant under the contract, although the test was made by applying them to pipe other than that delivered under the contract.

In People v. Wagner (1916) 29 Cal. App. 363, 155 Pac. 649, a prosecution for homicide in which defendant claimed that his gun had accidentally gone off while he was cleaning it, and, in explaining how the killing occurred, illustrated how he sat in the chair and how he held the gun before and at the moment of its discharge, it was held that the trial court erred in permitting the prosecution to show the result of certain experiments made by firing shots from the gun which killed the deceased at and into cardboard and blocks of wood which were intended to represent the deceased, and were supposedly placed in the position in which he stood at the time of the killing, the result of such experiment tending to show that if the gun had been discharged on the morning of the killing in the manner and under the same circumstances described by the defendant, the pattern and location of the shot would have been different from the pattern and location of the shot actually found upon the head of the deceased and in the window case—ment, where it was not shown that the block of wood which was supposed to represent the head and body of the deceased stood in the same position and at the same angle as the deceased stood when he was shot.

For the purpose of discrediting the testimony of the defendant in a murder case as to the conditions under which he shot the deceased, his claim being that he had done so in self-defense, it is error to permit the introduction into evidence of certain targets into which a witness testified he had fired shots from a gun for the purpose of showing that had the shooting taken place under the circumstances testified to by defendant the shot would not have scattered as it did, it not appearing that in making such test the same or a similar gun was used, or that the shot, powder, and loading were similar, or that the target was so placed as to be similar in position to the body of the deceased when he was shot, as testified by the defendant. Hisler v. State (1906) 52 Fla. 30, 42 So. 692.

In State v. Justus (1883) 11 Or. 178, 50 Am. Rep. 470, 8 Pac. 337, 6 Am. Crim. Rep. 511, in which the defendant, who was accused of the murder of his father, claimed that he had accidentally shot him in letting down the hammer on his gun while at a certain distance from where his father was sitting, it was held error to admit evidence of experiments made with the same gun, loaded as defendant was accustomed to load his gun, and out of the defendant's powder flask, by discharging it at certain targets made out of pasteboard at different distances, since the characteristics of near gunshot wounds can by no possibility be reproduced or represented by experiments upon pasteboard.

Space.

Spark arrester.

Sparks.

In Thomas, Roberts, Stevenson Co. v. Philadelphia & R. R. Co. (1917) 256 Pa. 549, 100 Atl. 998, in which the issue was whether a fire had been started by sparks from defendant's locomotive, and in which witnesses had testified that under no circumstances could a spark larger than the mesh of an arrester escape therefrom if the latter were in good repair and condition, it was held that there was no error in admitting evidence as to experiments which demonstrated that when bituminous coal was used there were sometimes emitted through an arrester in good condition sparks which, after leaving the smokestack, expanded in size to such an extent that when picked up they were considerably larger than the mesh of the arrester, although these experiments were not made under conditions precisely similar to those existing at the time the sparks in the instant case were emitted,—especially as other witnesses were allowed to give like testimony without objection.

In E. T. & H. K. Ide v. Boston & M. R. Co. (1909) 83 Vt. 66, 74 Atl. 401, an action against a railroad for loss by fire, in which a perforated plate of the kind used by the defendant as a spark arrester, and a wire netting device in use on some other road, were in evidence, it was held that it was within the discretion of the trial court to permit the jury to make experiments with such appliances to determine which of the two would permit the passage of the larger cinders, although the evidence was that the spark-arresting devices, when put in an engine, are set at an angle, so that the size and shape of the apertures were factors merely in the relative efficiency of the devices in question.

In Augusta R. & Electric Co. v. Arthur (1907) 3 Ga. App. 513, 60 S. E. 213, an action for injuries sustained by a foot passenger who was knocked down by a street car, it was held that there was no error in permitting a witness to testify as to certain experiments made by him as to the speed of a car on the defendant company's track, running on a different day, and not at but near the scene of the casualty, especially as the witness testified that so far as he could judge the cars which were being compared ran at about the same rate of speed.

In Fippinger v. Glos (1914) 190 Ill. App. 238, proof of experiments made by experts as to the speed at which defendant's auto truck could be driven was held competent on behalf of defendant without proof that the conditions were identically the same, where it was practically impossible to produce the exact conditions, owing to the fact that defendant was not served with process until more than nine months after the accident.

In Upthegrove v. Chicago G. W. R. Co. (1910) 154 Ill. App. 460, an action for injuries sustained in a railway wreck, it was held that the trial court did not err in refusing to permit defendant to show the result of a test made to ascertain the distance in which a train running over the track at the point where the accident occurred could be stopped, where it appeared that such experiments were not made with the same engine, and that the train did not contain either the same number of loaded cars or the same number of empty cars, nor that the same number of cars were air equipped as in the train upon which plaintiff was riding.

In an action against a railroad company for the death of a person struck by a train, evidence is admissible of a test made to determine whether the train that caused the death could have been stopped after the engineer saw or could have seen the deceased, by running the same train on a different day, after the accident, over the same place, with the same number of coaches, and in applying every means of stopping the train as soon as it was possible, by being on the lookout, to see an object standing at the place of the accident. Byers v. Nashville, C. & St. L. R. Co. (1895) 94 Tenn. 345, 29 S. W. 128.

Suicide.

In Tackman v. Brotherhood of American Yeoman (1906) 132 Iowa, 64, 8 L.R.A.(N.S.) 974, 106 N. W. 350, in which the question was whether or not one found strangled by a strap in his barn met death by accident or suicide, the court permitted evidence of experiments showing that with the strap hanging in a certain manner an accidental fall upon the strap would tighten it around the neck three times out of four, where the custom of hanging the strap over the peg as it hung in the experiment and the fact that it was not tied around the neck of the decedent are shown, so that the only condition not shown and necessary to be inferred to make the conditions in the experiment the same as those under which the death occurred is that the strap hung in the form of a loop.

In State v. Schneck (1911) 85 Kan. 334, 116 Pac. 823, in which the question was whether a person found with her throat cut had committed suicide or had been murdered, it was held that the trial court properly refused to allow defendant to make a physical demonstration before the jury that a knife found under the body would cut a chunk of raw beef, the conditions being so different that the experiment would not have aided the jury in determining whether the wound could have been inflicted with the knife.

In an action for injuries sustained by a passenger by reason of the starting of the train before she had time to alight, there is no error in refusing to admit testimony of a subsequent test made to determine the length of time that the engineer probably took to oil his engine at the point in question on the occasion of the accident. O'Dea v. Michigan C. R. Co. (1905) 142 Mich. 265, 105 N. W. 746.

In Davis v. State (1897) 51 Neb. 301, 70 N. W. 984, a prosecution for homicide in causing the derailment of a train and the death of a passenger, the theory was that the defendant had unscrewed the nuts from the fish-plate bolts with a monkey wrench introduced in evidence, and removed with a clawbar the spikes holding down a rail on the trestle, just prior to the occurrence of the wreck. A witness having testified as an expert for the defendant that it was impossible for a man with the monkey wrench in evidence to unscrew the nuts on the fish-plate bolts of the railway track, it was held proper to permit the state in rebuttal to prove by a nonexpert that with the monkey wrench in evidence he unscrewed eight nuts from as many fish-plate bolts on a portion of the railway track in all respects like the track on the trestle, with the exception that where the witness experimented the track was on the earth, and that with the clawbar he also removed all the spikes which held down a rail, and that he did all this work in twenty-one minutes; and that the difference in conditions existing between the track where the experiment was made and the track where the displacement occurred did not render the evidence incompetent, but was proper for consideration by the jury in determining the weight to be given to the evidence of the experiment.

For the purpose of contradicting witnesses who had testified to having witnessed an affray, another witness is improperly permitted to testify that standing at a certain point he could not see the place where the difficulty occurred, it not appearing that the place from which he made his observation was the point where the defendant's witnesses testified they made theirs. Sherrill v. State (1902) 138 Ala. 3, 35 So. 129.

In a prosecution for homicide in which defendant testified that, after hearing a witness state on the examining trial that she was in her yard and saw all the fatal difficulty, he then went to the place of the difficulty and from there observed that none of the witness's premises but the top of the house was visible, it was held that another witness was properly permitted to testify that he had found that he could see the place where the difficulty occurred from the witness's yard. Mason v. State (1919) — Tex. Crim. Rep. —, 211 S. W. 593.

In Clarence v. State (1910) 86 Neb. 210, 125 N. W. 540, a prosecution for homicide in which defendant's contention that he had acted in self-defense was supported by the testimony of witnesses who claimed to have seen the affray through a crack in a corn crib in which they were working, it was held error to permit witnesses on behalf of the state to testify that they had gone to the crib in question, from which the boards which formed the crack through which it was claimed the witnesses had looked had been removed, and had placed a team and wagon where it was said a team and wagon had stood at the time of the difficulty, and had nailed boards on the studding where it was said some of the boards had been before being removed, and that in looking out no one could have seen the parties involved at the place where they were said to have had the altercation, there being no proof by anyone present at the time of the tragedy that the original conditions had been restored, and it further appearing that there was corn in the crib at the time of the tragedy, upon which the witnesses thereof stood, while at the later time referred to by the impeaching witnesses the corn had all been removed.

In State v. King (1917) 102 Kan. 155, 169 Pac. 557, where the evidence tended to show that a robbery was committed in a store by four persons who came in an automobile, two of whom remained in the automobile in front of the store while the other two committed the robbery, it was held that evidence might be introduced to show that those who afterwards sat in an automobile in front of the store under conditions similar to those existing at the time of the robbery could see into the store to the place where the robbery was committed.

In Alabama G. S. R. Co. v. Burgess (1896) 114 Ala. 587, 22 So. 169, 2 Am. Neg. Rep. 483, an action for injuries received by a boy who was run into by a train while walking along the railroad track, in which it became a question on the trial how far from the place of injury the plaintiff and his little sister, who accompanied him, could be seen on the track and recognized as children from the direction the train came, it was held that witnesses were improperly permitted to testify to an experiment made by them about a month after the injury, by placing the plaintiff and a little girl at the place of the injury and observing from what distance they could be recognized as children, the conditions being too variant to aid the jury in determining the question whether the engineer exercised reasonable care to prevent the injury.

In St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. McMichael (1914) 115 Ark. 101, 171 S. W. 115, an action for injuries by one who was struck by a train while sitting on the edge of a station platform, where he had dropped off to sleep, it was held that the court did not err in permitting witnesses to testify that they had gone upon the grounds and that at a point on the track a certain distance from where plaintiff was sitting at the time of his injury they could see a man sitting in a position described by them, notwithstanding the witnesses who made these observations were not on an engine moving at a speed of 35 or 40 miles an hour, there being testimony of expert passenger engineers to the effect that one accustomed to the movements of an engine could see a man as plainly from an engine going at that rate of speed as could one standing or walking on the track.

In Chicago & A. R. Co. v. Logue (1893) 47 Ill. App. 292, an action brought for the killing of a child by a train running at a high speed, it was held to be error to admit testimony as to the distance at which witnesses could distinguish a bucket of coal which they had placed upon the track, the circumstances and surroundings being wholly different from those attendant on the engineer in the discharge of his duties.

In Fein v. Covenant Mut. Ben. Asso. (1895) 60 Ill. App. 274, it is said of the foregoing case: "This decision is above criticism. The elevation of the engineer above the track, the rapidity of the motion, the oscillation of the engine, the condition of the atmosphere, the distracting and responsible duties of the engineer were not taken into account in the coal-bucket experiment."

In Burg v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. (1894) 90 Iowa, 106, 48 Am. St. Rep. 419, 57 N. W. 680, an action to recover damages occasioned by the killing of a child on a railroad track, it was held that evidence of tests made with trains, one of which was the same train used when the accident occurred, and the other a train claimed to be substantially like it, for the purpose of ascertaining the distance at which the children could have been seen and also the distance required to stop the train when running at the same rate of speed as the train did on the day of the accident, was admissible, although one of such tests was made at a different time of day from that at which the accident occurred, where, so far as the record disclosed, the opportunity for seeing was equally good at both times.

In Nelson v. Old Colony Street R. Co. (1911) 208 Mass. 159, 94 N. E. 313, an action for damages occasioned by a collision between plaintiff's team and defendant's street car, about 6:30 P. M. in January, it was held that there was no error in permitting the witness to testify that between 7:30 and 8 o'clock of the same evening he stood in the vestibule of a car coming from the same direction as had the car which ran into the plaintiff, while a man was stationed at a point where the collision had occurred, that he first caught sight of the man at a point which, on measuring, was found to be 180 feet from the point where the man was standing, although the car upon which he was riding had both an incandescent and an oil headlight which assisted him in seeing, while the car which struck the plaintiff was equipped with an incandescent electric headlight.

In an action for the killing of a child by a train, it is error to exclude experiments made on the same kind of a day as that on which the injury occurred, at the same hour of the day, and at the same place, tending to show how far the child might have been seen by the engineer. Harrison v. Southern R. Co. (1908) 93 Miss. 40, 46 So. 408.

In an action for injuries received by one who, while lying with one leg across a street car track, was run over at night, in which it was contended that the motorman had not shown due diligence in keeping a lookout, it is error to admit evidence of the results of experiments made with human figures prominently displayed, sitting upright close to the rail and at a place where the headlights of approaching cars struck them in time to see and to stop, where the evidence tends to show that the upright position of the figures was not a true representation of plaintiff's position on the track. Riggs v. Metropolitan Street R. Co. (1909) 216 Mo. 304, 115 S. W. 969.

In Wells v. Lusk (1915) 188 Mo. App. 63, 173 S. W. 750, an action for injuries sustained by one who was run over by a train while he was lying in a drunken sleep on the railroad track, in which the engineer testified that when he first caught sight of plaintiff 700 or 800 feet away he was unable to distinguish him as a human being, but at first thought that the object was a bunch of crows, who were in the habit of feeding on the grain that fell from box cars, and that the sun shining in his face interfered with his vision, it was held error to permit witnesses to testify that they visited the scene of the accident about two months thereafter and made tests as to the distance in which they could distinguish a person lying on the track where plaintiff was, as a human being, the court saying: "The testimony of the witnesses who made the so-called tests after the accident is of no aid in this case. They went to look at an object they knew to be a man; they were not on a locomotive engine running 18 or 20 miles an hour; and experience teaches us that the ease with which we conclude that an object is a prostrate human being when we already know it is such can form no test as to what we can distinguish when we have no such previous knowledge. The jury could judge of the engineer's ability in this respect as well without this testimony as with it. The tests were made under different conditions entirely than were the observations of the engineer taken."

But in a similar case it was held competent to show that under the same conditions as to the night, the weather, the light, and all other circumstances, a man similar to the one who was run over, though weighing less, placed himself prone against the rail in the position occupied by the victim of the accident and awaited the approach of the same through train at the same hour of the evening, and that he was recognized by the engineer as a human being at a distance three times as far away as the engineer involved in the accident said he was when he first saw the victim as a dark object, and thought it was an old coat. Owen v. Delano (1917) — Mo. App. —, 194 S. W. 756.

So also in Griggs v. Dunham (1918) — Mo. App. —, 204 S. W. 573, an action against a street railroad for the killing of plaintiff's husband while drunk and lying on the track, evidence was held proper of a test made on a night like the one in which the deceased was killed by placing on the track an object the size and shape of a man, the surroundings being unchanged, for the purpose of showing the distance from which a man could be seen by one on a car in the position of the motorman.

In Cox v. Norfolk & C. R. Co. (1900) 126 N. C. 103, 35 S. E. 237, an action for damages for the negligent killing of plaintiff's intestate by defendant's train, it was held competent to permit a witness to testify that he had made certain experiments to see how far down the track a man could be seen.

To show that the vision of an engineer from the side of the engine on the outside of a 3-degree curve would be so obstructed by the boiler as to be limited to a very short distance, evidence of tests made on a curve of between 3 and 4 degrees is admissible. Olivaras v. San Antonio & A. P. R. Co. (1908) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 77 S. W. 981.

In Houston & T. C. R. Co. v. Ramsey (1906) 43 Tex. Civ. App. 603, 97 S. W. 1067, for the purpose of showing how far away a man on a railroad velocipede might have been seen by the engineer of a train, evidence was admitted of experiments made by witnesses who testified that a man about 6 feet high and in his shirt sleeves, wearing a white shirt, placed on the track about where the plaintiff's decedent was killed, could be seen by them from a point about 1,000 yards distant. This testimony was objected to on the ground that the circumstances under which the experiments were made were entirely different from those prevailing at the time of the accident in that in one case the engineer was sitting in the cab of his engine traveling at the rate of about 45 miles an hour and the deceased on a railroad velocipede on the track going from him, the time being about or after sundown, and the engineer not knowing or expecting the presence of anyone on the track, while in the case of the experiment, the time was in the afternoon, and the object with which the tests were made was in each case a man standing upright on the track at a point where the witnesses knew they were, the witnesses themselves standing on the ground some 3 or 4 feet lower than the engineer in his cab. The majority of the court, however, were of the opinion that the dissimilarity of conditions was not such as to render the evidence inadmissible.

Upon the question whether a person killed upon a railroad track by a fast train might have been seen by the brakeman, evidence that a witness sat upon a freight car similar to the one upon which the brakeman was, and in a similar position, and on a track as straight and level as the evidence showed the track to be at the place where the accident occurred, and that he could see a man at certain distances, is admissible. Freeman v. Moreman (1912) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 146 S. W. 1045.

In Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Whitfield (1918) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 206 S. W. 380, an action for the death of a person who was struck by a train, it was held that defendant might show the results of experiments showing that a man sitting on the end of a tie at the place where the injury occurred could not have been seen by a person in the cab of a locomotive at a greater distance than 130 feet.

In Young v. Clark (1897) 16 Utah, 42, 50 Pac. 832, 3 Am. Neg. Rep. 315, an action for injuries sustained by the plaintiff, who was struck by a train while attempting to cross a railway bridge, it was held that testimony tending to show that children, of the size of the children who were on the bridge, could be seen thereon from a certain point, was competent as bearing upon the question as to the care used by the engineer, and as to whether he could see the children from that point.

In Palmer v. Oregon Short Line R. Co. (1908) 34 Utah, 466, 98 Pac. 689, 16 Ann. Cas. 229, an action for the killing of a child by a railroad train, evidence of experimental tests made by witnesses who placed a child of about the age of the deceased upon the track at the point where the accident occurred and went down the track to determine how far such a child could be seen and recognized, the child experimented with being dressed in different colored clothes than was the child that was struck, and being placed in a sitting position on the track, was held admissible, although the experiment was made under conditions which were not the same as those in which the engineer was placed, the results of the experiment amounting to no more than both court and jury had a right to consider without any evidence on the subject.

Evidence of an experiment made for the purpose of determining at what distance a man struck by a railway engine might have been seen by the engineer is inadmissible where, although made with an engine of the same class, the man with whom the test was made was stationed within 2 feet of the rail all the time, while the man who was struck was never within this distance of the rail until just as he was struck, and in the test the track was "comparatively straight," while in the actual case it was perfectly straight. Going v. Norfolk & W. R. Co. (1916) 119 Va. 543, 89 S. E. 914.

In AMSBARY v. GRAYS HARBOR & LIGHT CO. (reported herewith) ante, 1, an action for the death of a person who, having fallen in a fit or because of intoxication, near a street railway track, was struck by a car, it was held error to exclude evidence of an experiment made with a dummy in the form of a man, dressed as the deceased was dressed, and placed in the position and location that the deceased was in at the time of his injury, by noting from the front platform of the same car, driven by the same motor-man, with certain information concerning the dummy given in advance, the distance from which the dummy could be distinguished.

— of live stock on or near track.

In an action for the killing of live stock by a train, in which the defense rested very materially upon evidence that the engineer did not see nor could have seen such stock at a point sufficiently far from the place where they were killed to have stopped the train in time to prevent the accident, it is proper to show the distance from which such animals might have been seen. Walker v. Columbia & G. R. Co. (1886) 25 S. C. 141.

In an action for the killing of cattle by a railway train, in which the defendant contends that the engineer could not have seen the cattle in time to stop or control the train because of the embankment of a cut through which the train ran just before reaching the place of the accident, the plaintiff may be permitted to prove the result of certain experiments made by placing a steer at the place where the cattle were killed and then in determining by sight and measurement how far the steer could be seen up the track in the direction from which the train was approaching. Atlanta & W. P. R. Co. v. Hudson (1907) 2 Ga. App. 352, 58 S. E. 500.

See also in this connection, Illinois C. R. Co. v. Burns (1889) 32 Ill. App. 196, as set forth in I. b, supra.

In Green v. Long Island R. Co. (1909) 131 App. Div. 277, 115 N. Y. Supp. 590, an action for damages to a motor truck struck by a locomotive engine, in which there was testimony that there was a red light upon the truck at the time of the accident, it was held error to permit witnesses to testify that they had gone to the scene of the accident on a night when the weather conditions were substantially the same as at the time of the accident, and held the same red light at the height it was on the machine when it was struck, and to show from what distance it could be seen.

In an action to recover damages for the killing of cattle at a highway crossing by a train, in which the person in charge of the cattle testified that she neither saw nor heard the train until it was close upon the cattle, there is no error in admitting the evidence of witnesses as to experiments made by them to determine how far the train could be seen coming to the crossing from the highway, nor in answering the question as to whether they could have heard the whistle or bell if they had been sounded or rung. Elgin, J. & E. R. Co. v. Reese (1897) 70 Ill. App. 463.

For the purpose of contradicting testimony of the plaintiff that a car standing on a sidetrack obstructed his view of an approaching train, experiments made for the purpose of determining how far south the main track could be seen by a person standing midway between the main and side track at a point near where the accident occurred are not admissible, where it does not appear that any car or cars were on the sidetrack at the time, but that a board was held up about opposite where it was claimed the south car was situated on the day of the accident, the board being held 2½ feet west of the rail, which would correspond with the distance a car would project over the rail in that direction. Chicago & E. I. R. Co. v. Crose (1904) 113 Ill. App. 547, affirmed in (1905) 214 Ill. 602, 105 Am. St. Rep. 135, 73 N. E. 865.

Where it is claimed that an intervening bluff along which a railway was built prevented a traveler approaching a crossing from hearing the ordinary signals, it is competent to show by a witness who has made a test at the place of the injury, and under substantially similar circumstances, how far the signals can be heard, and the effect of the intervening bluff to obscure the vision and deaden the sound made by a passing train. Missouri P. R. Co. v. Moffatt (1896) 56 Kan. 667, 44 Pac. 607, 11 Am. Neg. Cas. 554.

In Johnson v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. (1909) 80 Kan. 456, 103 Pac. 90, an action for the killing of a person by a railroad train at a highway crossing, it was held that a witness might testify to the result of tests which he had made to determine whether the noise of trains coming toward a cut would be deadened by the cut and the surroundings to a man on the highway, and whether smoke and steam from engines in the cut could be seen at the crossing, the court saying that atmospheric conditions, the coal used, the time of its application to the fire, and other circumstances would affect the weight of such testimony, but would not make it incompetent.

In an action for personal injuries received by a passenger on an electric car by reason of its running onto a siding and colliding with other cars standing there, witnesses are properly permitted to testify that they had ridden in the front end of a car going in the same direction as the car in which the plaintiff was a passenger, and that the switch could be seen for a distance of 300 feet where, it appearing in the evidence that it happened in the afternoon on a clear day, any dissimilarity in the condition of the two occasions must have been unfavorable to the experiment. Elgin, A. & S. Traction Co. v. Wilson (1905) 120 Ill. App. 371, judgment affirmed in (1905) 217 Ill. 47, 75 N. E. 436, 19 Am. Neg. Rep. 145.

In a prosecution for homicide, in which the theory of the state suggested a lying in wait on the part of defendant, and defendant's theory was self-defense, predicated on threat and a casual meeting at an unexpected place between himself and deceased, witnesses may be permitted to testify to an experiment made on the ground some months subsequent to the homicide under the same or nearly similar conditions, to show that the country did not furnish a place of concealment. Schauer v. State (1900) — Tex. Crim. Rep. —, 60 S. W. 249.

In Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Fouts (1913) 88 Ohio St. 305, 104 N. E. 544, Ann. Cas. 1915A, 1256, an action by a railway conductor against the company for personal injuries sustained through the alleged negligence of the engineer in misinterpreting a signal given him by the plaintiff, it was held error to permit the plaintiff to attempt to reproduce in view of the jury, in the court room, the signal which he thought he gave, the controversy not being as to how he made the signal, but how it appeared to the engineer in his situation in the open country, as seen against the bright afternoon sky at 500 to 600 feet distant, when only the head and hand of the conductor were visible.

In Ord v. Nash (1897) 50 Neb. 335, 69 N. W. 964, 1 Am. Neg. Rep. 110, an action for injuries received in falling at night into an unguarded excavation in the highway, it was held that there was no abuse of discretion on the part of the trial court in rejecting as evidence the result of certain experiments made by witnesses who, on a cloudy night, with the assistance of a light in an adjoining house similarly situated to one burning at the time of the accident, were able plainly to see the footpath and also the surface of the ground for a radius of several feet from the point where the injury was received.

In Lasityr v. Olympia (1911) 61 Wash. 657, 112 Pac. 752, an action for personal injuries received by one who, while passing along a street at night, tripped over a piece of wire netting stretched to protect a newly constructed cement sidewalk, in which the trial court rejected testimony offered by defendant, after showing that the street lamp lighting the place where the accident occurred on the night preceding the trial of the action was identical with the lamp at the same point on the night of the accident and that the voltage passing through the arc light system on the night of the accident was greater than the voltage on the night preceding the trial, that on the night preceding the trial witnesses could readily read newspapers on the sidewalk at the place of the accident by the light of the lamp in question. The supreme court held that while they were not prepared to say that it would have been error to admit proof of these experiments, yet the quantity of light given out by an arc light at all times and under all conditions is not so certain and unvarying as to render the ruling of the court erroneous or manifestly an abuse of sound judicial discretion.

In AMSBARY v. GRAYS HARBOR R. & LIGHT CO. (reported herewith) ante, 1, it was said with reference to Lasityr v. Olympia (1911) 61 Wash. 651, 112 Pac. 752, that the decision therein seems to indicate the extreme limit of the exercise of the trial court's discretion in excluding the offered evidence, and that they did not regard it as controlling beyond its application to the particular facts there involved.

Proof of the condition of a street lamp and its power to diffuse light on the 21st of January is no evidence of its condition and power on the 1st of October preceding, where there is no proof that the structure of the lamp was the same at the one time as at the other, nor any evidence whether the combustible material used at both times was the same. Yates v. People (1865) 32 N. Y. 509.

It is not sufficient ground for excluding the evidence of witnesses who made experiments as to the distance from which a locomotive headlight fell upon the highway crossing at which the accident occurred that they were made several months after the accident. Burton v. Chicago & A. R. Co. (1914) 176 Mo. App. 14, 162 S. W. 1064.

In Arrowood v. South Carolina & G. Extension R. Co. (1900) 126 N. C. 629, 36 S. E. 151, an action for the killing of a man by a train, it was held that the evidence of witnesses who went to the spot where the deceased was struck, on a dark night such as that on which the deceased was killed, and made observations of the light cast by one of defendant's engines with such a headlight as was used on all the engines of the defendant was competent to go to the jury for what it was worth upon the question whether the engineer might have seen the deceased.

In order to determine whether a brakeman engaged in spotting cars on a dark night when it was misting rain might have seen a coal chute by the light of the lantern which he carried, witnesses may properly be permitted to testify that on a night which was darker than the ordinary night, when there was no moon, and when, by reason of the sand blowing, objects were more difficult to distinguish than upon an ordinary night, they stationed themselves on a car similar to the one on which plaintiff was riding, and, using a lantern which was substantially the same as was used by the plaintiff, they could see the coal bins, the divisions between them, and could tell which of the bins were loaded with coal and which were empty, notwithstanding the difference in atmospheric conditions. Kansas City, M. & O. R. Co. v. Hall (1912) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 152 S. W. 445.

The evidence of witnesses to the effect that they had been able to read fine newspaper print in a hallway at 5 o'clock P. M. on the 18th of March is not competent upon the question whether the hallway was sufficiently lighted on December 13th between 4 and 4:30 P. M. Bretsch v. Plate (1903) 82 App. Div. 399, 81 N. Y. Supp. 868.

In Baker v. Harrington (1907) 196 Mass. 339, 82 N. E. 33, in which it was a question whether the stairs down which plaintiff fell on December 7th were sufficiently lighted, the observation of witnesses made in April at the time of day corresponding, with regard to sunset, with the time of day when the accident to the plaintiff had occurred, were held to be admissible in the discretion of the court, where accompanied by an instruction that unless the jury should find that the conditions existing when the witness made his observations were "precisely the same as at the moment" when the accident to the plaintiff occurred, they should disregard the testimony.

In People v. Woon Tuck Wo (1898) 120 Cal. 294, 52 Pac. 833, in which several witnesses for the prosecution testified they saw defendant shoot deceased with a pistol in the street near midnight and that they recognized the defendant at and immediately after the time when the shot was fired, and the testimony of the various witnesses who were at the scene at the time of or immediately after the accident was very conflicting as to the condition of the lights at that time, it was held that there was no error in excluding the testimony of a witness that he had examined the premises some three months after the homicide, and that he was unable to recognize any person at the place where the homicide was alleged to have been committed when standing at the point where the witnesses for the prosecution had stood, inasmuch as under the circumstances such testimony would have tended to confuse and mislead rather than enlighten the jury.

In Smith v. State (1853) 2 Ohio St. 511, a prosecution for assault with intent to murder, in which the prosecuting witness testified that, looking through a certain window, he recognized defendant by the flash of his pistol, and in which the state brought witnesses who were not present at the shooting to prove experiments and observations subsequently made by them at the same place, under like circumstances as to light, position, firing with a pistol, etc., for the purpose of showing the possibility of recognizing the person discharging the pistol, it was held that the court erred in rejecting testimony offered on behalf of the defendant of experiments made under like conditions but at another place, the court saying that there was no such difference in common window glass that the judgment could not in any degree be aided by an experiment made with another pane.

In Spires v. State (1905) 50 Fla. 121, 39 So. 181, 7 Ann. Cas. 214, in which a witness testified to having recognized the defendant by the flash of a gun fired in her bedroom where there was no light burning on a dark night, it was held that the court did not err in refusing to grant a motion of defendant to try an experiment in the presence of the jury in a dark room with the gun offered in evidence to see whether the flash of the gun would make sufficient light to permit a person to be recognized, it not appearing how the gun was loaded on the night the crime was committed and the result being liable to be affected by the eyesight of the person making the test.

of any cause, under the terms and provisions of § 1786 or § 1834, Rev. Laws 1910, and such statement or proceedings are attempted to be presented to this court by affidavit, such affidavit must show that such statements or proceedings had reference to the cause on trial and were such as might properly be made a part of the case made or other proceedings in error.

ERROR to the County Court for Lincoln County (Billingslea, J.) to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff and overruling a motion for a new trial in an action brought to recover possession of certain property. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Erwin & Erwin, for plaintiff in error:

The court erred in overruling defendant's motion for new trial.

Lamm v. State, 4 Okla. Crim. Rep. 641, 111 Pac. 1002; Walker v. State, 6 Okla. Crim. Rep. 370, 118 Pac. 1005; Tudor v. State, 14 Okla. Crim. Rep. 67, 167 Pac. 341; Methvine v. Fisher, — Okla. —, 166 Pac. 702.

Messrs. Goode & Johnson for defendant in error.

Bailey, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action of replevin, brought in the county court of Lincoln county. After a general denial, plaintiff in error pleaded by way of counterclaim and cross petition the payment of various sums of money, and alleging that such sums were paid as usurious interest. To such answer and cross petition defendant in error filed a reply, consisting of a general denial, and further pleading a written release from all claims, debts, or demands by reason of the transaction as alleged in plaintiff in error's cross petition. Judgment was had against plaintiff in error, and a motion for a new trial was duly filed, and said motion for a new trial was overruled on March 26, 1917, and plaintiff in error allowed ninety days in which to prepare and serve a case made. On June 25, 1917, plaintiff in error did serve a purported case made. It will be noted that such case made was served ninety-one days after the order of the court allowing ninety days in which to serve case made. This being the fact, it is contended by defendant in error that such case made is a nullity for the reason that the same was not served within the time allowed.

It is true that the case made was not served within the ninety days allowed; however, this court will take judicial notice that June 24th, the ninetieth day, fell on Sunday. 15 R. C. L. p. 1100, ¶ 82. McIntosh v. Lee, 57 Iowa, 356, 10 N. W. 895; Swales v. Grubbs, 126 Ind. 106, 25 N. E. 877. Section 5341, Rev. Laws 1910, provides: "The time within which an act is to be done shall be computed by ex-

judicial notice—

cluding the first day, and including the last; if the last day be Sunday, it shall be excluded."

The last day allowed for serving such case made being Sunday, such day will be excluded in the computation of time and the following day be included. Smith County v. Labore, 37 Kan. 480, 15 Pac. 577; Grant v. Creed, 35 Okla. 190, 128 Pac. 511; Harn v. Amazon F. Ins. Co. — Okla. —, 167 Pac. 473. We therefore hold that the purported case made was served within the time allowed.

Of the fifteen assignments of error presented by plaintiff in error, fourteen of such assignments charge error of the court in giving certain instructions and in refusing to give certain instructions tendered by plaintiff in error. The case made does not contain the evidence, nor any part thereof, nor is there any statement of what the evidence was or what facts were sought to be proven, nor is there any claim that the verdict is not supported by the evidence. Section 6005, Rev. Laws 1910, provides: "No judgment shall be set aside or new trial granted by any appellate court of this state in any case, civil or criminal, on the ground of misdirection of the jury or the improper admission or rejection of evidence, or as to error in any matter of pleading or procedure, unless, in the opinion of the court to which application is made, after an examination of the entire record, it appears that the error complained of has probably resulted in a miscarriage of justice, or constitutes a substantial violation of a constitutional or statutory right."

And under such provision of the statute as well as decisions of this court, in passing upon the errors assigned relative to the giving and refusing of the instructions referred to, the court will be compelled to look into the evidence and to ascertain if a right and proper verdict has been rendered. The burden is upon the plaintiff in error to show that such error has been committed as has probably resulted in a miscarriage of justice or constitutes a substantial violation of a constitutional or statutory right. If the verdict arrived at by the jury was a proper one, under all the evidence presented to them, the fact that the court may have improperly instructed the jury cannot stand as sufficient grounds for reversal. It is held in Truman v. Buxton, 37 Okla. 5, 130 Pac. 149, as follows: "We are committed to the rule that where a verdict and judgment are authorized by the evidence, and another would be unwarranted, the same will not be reversed on appeal on account of errors alleged to exist in the instructions."

And again: "Where none of the evidence appears in the record, and there is no statement of what it tended to prove, or that it raised the questions on which instructions are based, this court cannot, as a general rule, determine whether there was error in the rulings of the court as to the instructions or not." See also Livingston v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 41 Okla. 505, 139 Pac. 260. And as was said in Leroy v. McConnell, 8 Kan. 273: "One of the errors complained of is the giving of certain instructions and the refusal to give others. It would be labor wasted to examine the instructions given, for, even if it were certain that they were not correct as legal principles, there would be the uncertainty as to whether they applied to the evidence in the case; and if they did not, then, though they may have been error, it is not shown to be prejudicial to the plaintiffs. The plaintiffs in error must show that such errors have been committed as have wrought prejudice to them, or may have done so, or there can be no reversal of the judgment. It is not necessary to bring up all the evidence in every case, but enough must be shown, either by the testimony or by statement in the bill of exceptions, for this court to see that the instructions are applicable to the evidence. The same remark applies to instructions refused." The fifteenth and last assignment of error is that "the court erred in refusing defendant's request to have taken, by the court stenographer, certain proceedings, to wit, certain improper remarks by counsel for plaintiff, as found in the affidavit marked 'exhibit A,' and made a part of the motion for a new trial."

Such affidavit being as follows: "At the trial of said cause on the 10th day of March, 1917, counsel of record for plaintiff in his argument to the jury made certain remarks outside the record which affiant considers prejudicial to the rights of the defendant. That thereupon affiant objected to such remarks and averments and asked that the same be taken down by the court stenographer, and that such request was refused by the court, to which affiant excepted on behalf of the defendant."

Counsel relies upon § 1786, Rev. Laws 1910, to support this assignment, aside from the question as to whether, in proceedings in the county court, the court stenographer, in recording the statements and proceedings during the trial of a cause, is to be governed by § 1786 or § 1834, Rev. Laws 1910. But assuming for the purpose of this assignment that § 1786, supra, controls, we do not think plaintiff in error has brought himself within the provisions of the statutes. In Dabney v. Hathaway, 51 Okla. 658, 152 Pac. 77, it is said: "The defendants lastly complain that 'the court erred in refusing to permit the stenographer to take certain remarks by the court in the presence of the jury, although requested to do so by the attorney for defendants.' They attach affidavits of W. H. Parker and Paul Pinson in support of this assignment. Counsel relies upon § 1786, Rev. Laws 1910, in urging this assignment. But the substance of that statute is: All statements of counsel, the witnesses, or the court, made during the trial of any cause with reference to any cause pending for trial, when made by a party or attorney interested therein 'and all other matters that might properly be a part of a case made for appeal or proceedings in error,' shall be taken down and transcribed by the stenographer if requested, and a refusal of the court to permit this to be done shall be reversible error."

Here, as was observed in the case of Dabney v. Hathaway, supra, there is not the slightest indication in the affidavit filed in this case that the remarks of which complaint is made had any reference to the cause of action, or could in any way have been made a part of the case made. If the remarks complained of by defendant were concerning this case, or could have properly been made a part of the case made, then it is the duty of counsel to make a showing in the record to that effect.

We recognize the mandatory nature of the section of the statute referred to, and we do not mean to suggest any discretionary power in the trial court to limit or prevent the recording of any statements when made during the trial of any cause, with reference to such cause, or such other matters that might properly be made a part of a case made or in other proceedings in error; but, before the terms and penalties of such statutes are invoked, counsel should be at least required to make such showing as will enable this court to see that the statements complained of had reference to the trial, and indicate the nature of the remarks of which complaint is made.

In Page v. Faucet (1587) Cro. Eliz. pt. 1, p. 227, 78 Eng. Reprint, 482, "the error assigned was, that the judgment was given at a court held there 16 February, 26 Eliz. and this day was Sunday, and it was so found by the examination of the almanacs of that year. And it was ruled that this examination was sufficient, and a trial per pais was not necessary, although it were an error in fact. And the judgment was reversed."

"The second day of November, 1914, fell on Monday,—a fact of which we are authorized to take judicial notice. Code Civ. Proc. § 1875, subd. 8." People v. Rudolph (1915) 28 Cal. App. 683, 153 Pac. 721.

In Beardsley v. Irving (1909) 81 Conn. 489, 71 Atl. 580, it was held to be error for the court to omit to instruct the jury whether or not a certain day was Sunday.

But it has been held that where the attention of the trial court has not been called to the fact that a certain date was Sunday, the appellate court will not take notice that the day was Sunday. Line v. Line (1913) 119 Md. 403, 86 Atl. 1032, Ann. Cas. 1914D, 192, holding that the court would not consider the fact in ruling upon the admission of a bond in evidence.

So, it was held that unless the issue is raised by the pleadings and proof an appellate court will not take judicial notice that the date of the passage of an ordinance was Sunday. Buxton v. Nashville (1918) 132 Ark. 511, 201 S. W. 512, where the court said: "To permit appellants to remain silent, in the court below, on the issue as to whether the date mentioned was Sunday, and to invoke here the doctrine that the court will take judicial cognizance of the fact that such date was on Sunday, would be tantamount to firing upon the holdings of the trial court from a battery that was kept masked in the court below. This cannot be done."

In Walton v. Stafford (1897) 14 App. Div. 310, 43 N. Y. Supp. 1049, it was held that the appellate court would not, on appeal, take notice that a certain day was Sunday when the matter was not raised before the trial court; but in affirming the decision in (1900) 162 N. Y. 558, 57 N. E. 92, the court of appeals stated that it was conceded that the day was Tuesday, not Sunday.

It may be noted that it has been held that an averment in the answer that the note sued on was not made on the date alleged, but on a certain other date, is a good defense if the date alleged is Sunday, though not averred to be so. Finney v. Callendar (1863) 8 Minn. 41, Gil. 23. So as to the date of a hiring of a horse. Webb v. Kennedy (1874) 20 Minn. 419, Gil. 374. But that it has also been held that an information for breach of the Sunday law is not sufficient if it states that the act was done on a certain day, not stating that the day was Sunday. Com. v. Gelbert (1895) 170 Pa. 426, 32 Atl. 1091. The question as to sufficiency of pleadings in this regard in either civil or criminal cases is not within the scope of the note.

REPORT by the Supreme Judicial Court for York County, upon an agreed statement of facts, for the determination by the full court of an action brought to recover damages for taking possession of and killing plaintiff's horse against his objection. Action to stand for trial.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Mr. Elias Smith for plaintiff.

Messrs. Emery, Waterhouse, & Paquin for defendant.

Deasy, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Trover for a horse taken from the plaintiff's possession against his objection and killed by the defendant. It is conceded that when the acts complained of were done the defendant was an officer or agent of the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals, and that he had complied with all the provisions of § 59 of chapter 126, Rev. Stat. The constitutionality of § 59 is challenged. The section is as follows:

"Any officer or agent of any society for the prevention of cruelty to animals may lawfully cause to be destroyed forthwith, any animal found abandoned or not properly cared for, appearing in the judgment of two reputable persons called by him to view the same in his presence, to be diseased or injured or in a condition from lack of food, water or shelter, past recovery for any useful purpose."

This section, when enacted as § 12 of chapter 183, Public Laws of 1883, related to abandoned animals only; the language being, "any animal found abandoned and not properly cared for."

By chapter 70 of the Public Laws of 1905 the word "and" was changed to "or." As thus amended, and otherwise by the same act slightly altered, it became § 59 as above quoted.

Neither in its original or amended form does it provide for compensation for, opportunity for hearing by, or notice to the owner.

The plaintiff claims that he has been deprived of his property without "due process of law" (U. S. Const. 14th Amend.) and in contravention of "the law of the land" (Me. Const. art. 1, § 6). The quoted phrases are identical in meaning. State v. Knight, 43 Me. 122; Bennett v. Davis, 90 Me. 105, 37 Atl. 864.

Notice and opportunity for hearing are of the essence of due process of law. Bennett v. Davis, supra; Rusk v. Thompson, 170 Mo. App. 76, 156 S. W. 64; Smith v. State Medical Examiners, 140 Iowa, 66, 117 N. W. 1117.

A hearing before a judicial tribunal is not essential, but there must be notice and a reasonable opportunity for a hearing before some tribunal. Bennett v. Davis, supra; People v. Apfelbaum, 251 Ill. 18, 95 N. E. 995.

An act that purports to authorize procedure depriving an owner of his property without opportunity for hearing and without notice violates both the Federal and state Constitutions.

Section 60, chapter 126, Revised Statutes, in its present form, as amended in 1893 (Laws 1893, chap. 165, § 4), provides for notice and hearing. For want of such provisions in its original form (Acts 1883, chap. 183, § 13) it was held unconstitutional by King v. Hayes, 80 Me. 206, 13 Atl. 882. See, to same effect, Loesch v. Koehler, 144 Ind. 278, 35 L.R.A. 682, 41 N. E. 326, 43 N. E. 129; Miller v. Horton, 152 Mass. 544, 10 L.R.A. 116, 23 Am. St. Rep. 850, 26 N. E. 100; Brill v. Ohio Humane Soc. 4 Ohio C. C. 358, 2 Ohio C. D. 594; Sahr v. Scholle, 89 Hun, 42, 35 N. Y. Supp. 97; Goodwin v. Toucey, 71 Conn. 262, 41 Atl. 806; Jenks v. Stump, 41 Colo. 281, 15 L.R.A. (N.S.) 554, 124 Am. St. Rep. 137, 93 Pac. 17, 14 Ann. Cas. 914.

But the defendant urges that a horse which has been decided by two reputable persons to be injured or diseased and past recovery for any useful purpose is no longer property. The word "property," he contends, does not include a "wreck of what was once a steed," having no utility and no value. This reasoning, however, begs the question. The plaintiff claims that his animal is not past recovery and that it has value. To conclusively determine this question against the plaintiff without notice or hearing would be to nullify the constitutional guaranty.

The defendant argues that the determination of the necessity or expediency of any legal enactment is within the exclusive province of the legislature. This is true. The court cannot declare a law to be void for the reason that it is unnecessary or inexpedient; but it may be the duty of the court to pronounce invalid an act which violates an express mandate of the Constitution, even if the act is expedient and has been determined by the legislature to be necessary.

Again, the defendant contends that § 59 is a valid exercise of the police power. No court has ever undertaken to define the limits of the police power of the state. New occasions teach new applications of it. It is based upon Constitutional law—construction—due process and law of land.

—necessity of notice and opportunity of hearing.

—necessity of judicial hearing.

—power of legislature—procedure without hearing.

—condemnation of animal without notice.

society's right of self-defense and is coextensive with that right. State v. Starkey, 112 Me. 12, 90 Atl. 431, Ann. Cas. 1917A, 196.

Under the police power the use by the owner of many species of private property has been held to be subject to uncompensated restriction and regulation. For numerous illustrations see State v. Robb, 100 Me. 186, 60 Atl. 874, 4 Ann. Cas. 275; Opinion of Justices, 103 Me. 506, 19 L.R.A. (N.S.) 422, 69 Atl. 627, 13 Ann. Cas. 745; State v. Starkey, 112 Me. 10, 90 Atl. 431, Ann. Cas. 1917A, 196.

In cases of extreme and urgent necessity, as conflagrations (Farmer v. Portland, 63 Me. 47), or epidemics (Seavey v. Preble, 64 Me. 121), it justifies the destruction of property without preliminary notice or hearing, and even without compensation.

But § 59 provides for the destruction of property, and not for restrictions upon or regulation of its use, and it cannot be justified as a measure of urgent necessity.

If § 59, now as in its original form in the Act of 1883, related to abandoned animals merely, our conclusion might be different. The destruction by public authority of an abandoned animal deprives nobody of property. But the section in its present form does not refer to abandoned animals only. It purports to authorize the defendant to do, without notice or hearing, what the agreed statement says he did, to wit, that he "took the horse from the plaintiff's possession against his objection" and killed it. It thus contravenes an explicit constitutional mandate.

IV. Miscellaneous, 78.

I. Abandoned animals; humanitarian statutes.

The decisions generally deny, on the ground that the owner is deprived of property without due process of law, the constitutionality of statutes and ordinances providing, without notice and hearing, for the destruction of abandoned or disabled animals, other than dogs, enacted chiefly from humanitarian motives. Loesch v. Koehler (1895) 144 Ind. 278, 35 L.R.A. 682, 41 N. E. 326, rehearing denied in (1896) 144 Ind. 284, 43 N. E. 129; Waud v. Crawford (1913) 160 Iowa, 452, 141 N. W. 1041; King v. Hayes (1888) 80 Me. 206, 13 Atl. 882; RANDALL v. PATCH (reported herewith) ante, 65; Carter v. Colby (1902) 71 N. H. 230, 51 Atl. 904; Brill

v. Ohio Humane Soc. (1890) 4 Ohio C. C. 358, 2 Ohio C. D. 594.

A statute authorizing any agent of any society for the prevention of cruelty to animals to kill any animal found neglected or abandoned and which, in the opinion of three reputable citizens, was injured or diseased past recovery, or by age had become useless, was held unconstitutional in Loesch v. Koehler (1895) 144 Ind. 278, 35 L.R.A. 682, 41 N. E. 326, as depriving the owner of property without due process of law, so far as it permitted such killing without notice to him. Rehearing was denied in (1896) 144 Ind. 284, 43 N. E. 129.

And a statute authorizing a sheriff or other police officers to destroy any horse or other animals disabled or unfit for further use was held unconstitutional in Waud v. Crawford (1913) 160 Iowa, 432, 141 N. W. 1041, in so far as it authorized the destruction, without notice or hearing, of an animal disabled by disease not contagious or infectious in character.

It was held in King v. Hayes (1888) 80 Me. 206, 13 Atl. 882, that a statute which allowed an agent of a society for the prevention of cruelty to animals to condemn, conclusively fix the value of, and destroy, a horse, without any notice, actual or constructive, to the owner, operated as an unconstitutional deprivation of property without due process of law.

A statute authorizing any officer or agent of any society for the prevention of cruelty to animals to destroy forthwith any animal found abandoned "or not properly cared for," appearing, in the judgment of two reputable persons called by him to view the same, to be diseased or injured or in a condition from lack of food, water, or shelter, past recovery for any useful purpose, was held in RANDALL v. PATCH (reported herewith), ante, 65, unconstitutional as depriving the owner of property without due process of law, in so far as it authorized the destruction, without notice or hearing, of a horse which was not abandoned.

And a statute providing that whenever an officer had taken into his possession an animal which appeared by reason of age, injury, or other cause, to be disabled for use, such officer should call upon three disinterested citizens, who should examine the animal, and if they found it disabled for use, the officer should at once cause the animal to be killed, was held in Carter v. Colby (1902) 71 N. H. 230, 51 Atl. 904, to violate the constitutional provision that no person should be deprived of property without due process of law, in so far as it authorized the taking of a horse from its owner and its killing without notice or opportunity for him to be heard.

A statute providing that any sheriff, constable, marshal, policeman, or agent of any society for the prevention of cruelty to animals, might kill any animal found neglected or abandoned, and which, in the opinion of three reputable citizens, was injured or diseased past recovery, or by age had become useless, was held unconstitutional in Brill v. Ohio Humane Soc. (1890) 4 Ohio C. C. 353, 2 Ohio C. D. 594, in so far as it permitted the killing, without judicial proceedings, of an animal afflicted with a disease which was not contagious and did not render it dangerous. The court took this position, assuming that the animal was abandoned or neglected, although the facts were otherwise in this case.

In Goodwin v. Toucey (1898) 71 Conn. 262, 41 Atl. 806, the court said that if the statute were construed as authorizing the killing of an animal by an agent or officer of the Humane Society, not to prevent cruelty or the spread of contagious disease, but whenever such agent and two reputable citizens happened to be of the opinion that the animal was injured or sick "past recovery, or unfit for any useful purpose," it would be difficult to sustain its constitutionality. It was held, however, that the statute authorized the killing of an animal only in case it had been taken in charge by an officer or agent of the Humane Society under other statutory provisions authorizing them to take charge of animals found abandoned, neglected, or cruelly treated, and requiring notice to the owner, who might within a specified time re-take the property.

In a number of cases cited under II. c, infra, attention is called to the fact that the constitutionality of statutes and ordinances authorizing the destruction of animals without notice to the owner has been sometimes sustained on the ground that the owner had a right to a judicial hearing in a subsequent action for damages against the officer or agent who killed the animal. This view was taken in Sahr v. Scholle (1895) 89 Hun, 42, 35 N. Y. Supp. 97, where the defense to an action for killing the plaintiff's horse was that it was found abandoned, and the defendant acted under statutory authority as an officer of the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals. The court said: "It was incumbent upon the defendant, in order to establish his defense, to prove the fact that the horse was injured past recovery for any useful purpose. The determination of such fact by two reputable citizens called to examine the horse, as required by the statute, was not conclusive upon its owner. Before there could be such a conclusive determination as would result in depriving the owner of his property, he was entitled to a hearing. In that way only can acts of the legislature conferring upon public officers the right to destroy private property be harmonized with the constitutional provision securing to every person due process of law before his property can be interfered with. A person whose property has been destroyed by a public officer, acting pursuant to a statutory authority, without notice to the owner, may always, therefore, have his common-law action for damages; and, if he can prove that the fact which authorizes the officer to act did not exist, he is entitled to a judgment."

The validity of statutes or ordinances authorizing the destruction of animals, other than dogs, having infectious or contagious diseases, has been sustained in a number of cases as an exercise of the police power. Durand v. Dyson (1915) 271 Ill. 382, 111 N. E. 143, Ann. Cas. 1917D, 84; New Orleans v. Charouleau (1908) 121 La. 890, 18 L.R.A. (N.S.) 368, 126 Am. St. Rep. 332, 46 So. 911, 15 Ann. Cas. 46; Newark & S. O. Horse Car R. Co. v. Hunt (1888) 50 N. J. L. 308, 12 Atl. 697; Torrueila v. Fernandez (1908) 14 P. R. R. 591; Chambers v. Gilbert (1897) 17 Tex. Civ. App. 106, 42 S. W. 630, writ of error refused in (1900) 93 Tex. 726; Livingston v. Ellis County (1902) 30 Tex. Civ. App. 19, 68 S. W. 723; Maynard v. Freeman (1900) —

It was said in Lowe v. Conroy (1904) 120 Wis. 151, 66 L.R.A. 907, 102 Am. St. Rep. 983, 97 N. W. 942, 1 Ann. Cas. 341, that the appearance of a malignant and contagious disease in cattle is in its nature such a menace to the public health as to bring it clearly within the class of cases which can only in many instances be effectually dealt with by the destruction of the animals afflicted.

Power to enact an ordinance requiring the inspection of dairy cows and the destruction of such cows as were found to be affected with tuberculosis was held authorized by charter power "to maintain the city's cleanliness and health, and to this end to regulate the location of and the inspection and cleaning of dairies, . . . and to adopt such ordinances and regulations as shall be necessary or expedient for the protection of health and to prevent the spread of disease." New Orleans v. Charouleau (1908) 121 La. 890, 18 L.R.A. (N.S.) 368, 126 Am. St. Rep. 332, 46 So. 911, 15 Ann. Cas. 46.

Without setting out the statute, the court, in Brooks v. Moore (B. C.) supra, held that the Animal Contagious Diseases Act 1903, under which the defendant, a government veterinary inspector, was assuming to act in proceedings to destroy horses of the plaintiff on the ground that they were affected with glanders, was intra vires the Parliament of Canada.

It was held that equal protection of the law was not unconstitutionally denied by a statute fixing the period at twenty-four hours within which an appeal might be taken from an order of a supervisor of health for the destruction of animals suffering from infectious or contagious disease, on the theory that the time was too short to permit the appeal to be available to a poor man. Torrueila v. Fernandez (P. R.) supra. The court said that the appeal was sufficient if notice thereof was served with the official who notified the owner of the decision ordering the destruction of the animal, and that the appeal was thus available to rich and poor alike; but also that the appeal was not a constitutional right, and inability to exercise it did not therefore violate the Federal Constitution.

It was held in Westchester Electric R. Co. v. Angevine (1900) 52 App. Div. 239, 65 N. Y. Supp. 376, that a board of health of a city could not delegate to an officer of a society for the prevention of cruelty to animals the power to destroy horses found to be affected with glanders.

It was held, however, in New Orleans v. Charouleau (La.) supra, that a city council could delegate to the board of health power to destroy dairy cows having tuberculosis.

The destruction by the health authorities of animals suffering from a contagious disease, where such destruction is necessary to prevent the spread of the disease, does not deprive the owner of due process of law, although no provision is made for compensation for the destruction of animals actually diseased. Torruella v. Fernandez (1908) 14 P. R. R. 591.

And an ordinance requiring the inspection by the health authorities of dairy cows in a large city, and providing for the destruction of such cows as were found to be affected with tuberculosis, was held in New Orleans v. Charouleau (1908) 121 La. 890, 18 L.R.A.(N.S.) 368, 126 Am. St. Rep. 332, 46 So. 911, 15 Ann. Cas. 46, not to be unconstitutional as authorizing the taking of property without due process of law in that it provided for no compensation to be made to the owner of the cows. It was said in the syllabus by the court: "It being shown that tuberculosis in a cow may be ascertained by a practically infallible test; and it being further shown that the presence of a cow so affected in a dairy in a city is a serious menace to the public health,—the public authorities have the same right to require the destruction of such cow without compensation to the owner and without judicial inquiry as they have to require the destruction of decayed fish, meats, and vegetables."

The destruction under statutory authority of animals affected with a contagious disease is not a taking of property for public use within the meaning of a constitutional provision requiring adequate compensation to be made to the owner when property is taken for public use without his consent. Chambers v. Gilbert (1897) 17 Tex. Civ. App. 106, 42 S. W. 630, writ of error refused in (1900) 93 Tex. 726; Livingston v. Ellis County (1902) 30 Tex. Civ. App. 19, 68 S. W. 723.

The proposition that cattle which have become so diseased as to be obnoxious to the public health or to be a public nuisance may be destroyed by the state in the exercise of its police power, without compensation to the owner, finds support in Houston v. State (1898) 98 Wis. 481, 42 L.R.A. 39, 74 N. W. 111, although it was unnecessary expressly to decide the question, since the demurrer to the complaint admitted that none of the cattle destroyed were affected with any disease and the issue was as to the liability of state for the destruction of healthy animals.

In Durand v. Dyson (1916) 271 Ill. 382, 111 N. E. 143, Ann. Cas. 1917D, 84, Chambers v. Gilbert (Tex.) supra, and Maynard v. Freeman (1900) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 60 S. W. 334, cited under II. c, infra, the statute provided for compensation, and the principal point considered was as to notice and hearing.

It was held in Chambers v. Gilbert (1897) 17 Tex. Civ. App. 106, 42 S. W. 630, writ of error refused in (1900) 93 Tex. 726, that a statute providing for payment by the county of the appraised value of diseased animals which were destroyed by the sheriff on order of the county judge did not violate constitutional provisions that the legislature should have no power to make any grant of public money to any individual or authorize any county or other political subdivision of the state to grant public money or thing of value in aid of or to any individual, association, or corporation whatsoever.

The validity of statutes and ordinances providing for the destruction of animals, other than those affected with contagious or infectious disease, has been sustained under the police power, although no provision was made for a notice to the owner and an opportunity for him to be heard, but the owner is frequently held entitled to a judicial hearing after the destruction, to contest the existence of the disease, the finding of the officers or persons called to inspect the animal before its destruction not being conclusive in this respect if there has been no notice and hearing, and not protecting the party killing the animal from payment of damages, if, in the subsequent action by the owner, the facts are not found to be such as bring the case within the statute or ordinance.

An ordinance requiring the inspection by the health authorities of dairy cows in a large city, and providing for the destruction of such cows as were found to be affected with tuberculosis, was held in New Orleans v. Charouleau (1908) 121 La. 890, 18 L.R.A.(N.S.) 368, 126 Am. St. Rep. 382, 46 So. 911, 15 Ann. Cas. 46, not to be unconstitutional, in that it did not provide for a judicial hearing before condemnation of the property.

In Durand v. Dyson (1916) 271 Ill. 382, 111 N. E. 143, Ann. Cas. 1917D, 84, the court sustained the constitutionality of a statute empowering the board of live stock commissioners to order the destruction of animals diseased or exposed to disease which was found to be of a dangerously contagious or dangerously infectious nature, and providing for compensation to the owner by agreement or by appraisal, but forfeiting his right to compensation unless after the appraisal was made he immediately destroyed the animals and disinfected the premises occupied by them. The cattle involved in this case were affected with hoof and mouth disease, and the court stated that it was generally recognized that where the disease among cattle is so very dangerous and of so contagious or infectious a character as to be communicable to human beings through the consumption of the flesh or milk of the diseased animals, as in the case before it, legislatures have the power to confer on boards or commissions the right to destroy the animals; that in some cases hearings might be reasonably had before the destruction of the property, but that when the question was one regarding the destruction of animals or food which was not only unfit for human use, but might be fatal to those who used it, the emergency was such that the legislature should have the entire disposition of the matter without review by the courts.

Due course of law under state constitutional provision or due process of law under the 14th Amendment to the Federal Constitution, it was held in Chambers v. Gilbert (1897) 17 Tex. Civ. App. 106, 42 S. W. 630, were not denied by a statute providing that if at any time it should come to the knowledge of the county judge by affidavit of any creditable citizen of the county that glanders or farcy existed among certain classes of animals, it should be the duty of the judge to appoint three disinterested and intelligent citizens of the county, who should carefully and minutely examine the animals so reported to be diseased, and if, in their opinion, the animals were diseased, should condemn and appraise the same, and report to the county judge, who should command the sheriff to kill the animals so diseased, provision being made that, after destruction of the animals, the county should pay the appraised value, if any. A writ of error was refused in (1900) 93 Tex. 726.

And in Maynard v. Freeman (1900) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 60 S. W. 834, the question of the unconstitutionality of the above statute was raised, but the point dismissed on the authority of the Chambers Case (Tex.) supra.

See also Riley v. Coleman County (1916) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 181 S. W. 743, in which the court, referring to the Texas statute authorizing the killing of horses and other animals affected with glanders, stated that the procedure therein authorized had been held constitutional as a proper exercise of the police power of the state, citing former decisions in that state. It was held, however, that no issue as to the constitutionality of the proceedings authorized by the statute was properly presented in that case.

The legislature may, in the exercise of its police power, authorize a state board of health to destroy horses affected with glanders, and such enactment is not subject to the objection that it is unconstitutional as depriving the owner of his property without due process of law, in that the destruction is authorized without notice to him and an opportunity for him to be heard, if the decision of the board that the disease exists is not made conclusive and the property owner is not deprived of a right after the destruction to contest the existence of the disease. Newark & S. O. Horse Car R. Co. v. Hunt (1888) 50 N. J. L. 308, 12 Atl. 697. The court said: "Plaintiff, however, contends that the determination of the officials that the prescribed disease exists is to be made without notice to the property owners and without affording them an opportunity to be heard, and on this ground claims that these acts are obnoxious to the constitutional provision invoked. If the legislature by these acts has made the determination of these officials, as to the existence of the common nuisance, a conclusive adjudication upon the rights of the property owner, then it is perfectly obvious that this legislation cannot be supported. It has been settled in this state that it is not within the power of the legislation to impart to a determination of this sort a conclusive character as against the property owner, and legislation intending that result was held to be futile. Hutton v. Camden (1876) 39 N. J. L. 122, 23 Am. Rep. 203. An examination of the acts in question clearly shows that there was no intent in the legislative mind to make the conclusions of the officials decisive of the right of the property owner as to the existence of that condition of things which these acts declared should constitute in these cases a common nuisance, and would justify its abatement by the destruction of the animals diseased. . . . It has never been pretended that the 14th Amendment worked the abolition of the common-law rule which justified anyone specially affected by a nuisance in abating it without waiting for an adjudication that it was a nuisance which he might abate, but unless the fact of the nuisance was established by proof he was liable to the aggrieved property owner as for an unwarranted trespass."

In the preceding case, the decision of the officials before their destruction of the diseased animals as to the existence of the disease was held not conclusive on the owner, where he had no notice and no opportunity to be heard. The question whether such decision is conclusive is not, of itself, within the scope of the annotation; but the validity of statutes or ordinances providing for the summary destruction of animals affected with a contagious or infectious disease has been sustained, as has already been noted, in some instances on the ground that the owner is not deprived of due process of law, because he may have a judicial hearing in an action against the officer or other person who kills the animal, and the destruction without such a hearing may be imperative to protect the public health in case the disease actually exists.

Thus, the court in Miller v. Horton (1891) 152 Mass. 540, 10 L.R.A. 116, 23 Am. St. Rep. 850, 26 N. E. 100, stated that grave questions would arise as to the constitutionality of the statute requiring the commissioners on contagious diseases among domestic animals to cause an animal infected with farcy or glanders to be killed, if their decision was conclusive that the animal was infected with the disease, where the animal might be killed without notice to the owner, and without compensation. It was held that the statute should not be so construed, but that it authorized the killing of actually infected horses only, and that the order of the commissioners would not protect one who killed a horse which had not such disease, in a subsequent suit by the owner for compensation. The latter question is, of course, not within the scope of the present annotation.

And in an action for the killing of horses by a board of live stock commissioners, where the defense was that the horses were infected with glanders and that the killing was authorized by statutes permitting the killing of animals having contagious or infectious diseases, the court, in Pearson v. Zehr (1891) 138 Ill. 48, 32 Am. St. Rep. 113, 29 N. E. 854, in holding that the determination of the members of the board that the disease existed was not conclusive, stated that to permit the commissioners to determine, ex parte, that some of the horses had the glanders and that others had been exposed thereto, and to hold that determination a justification for slaughtering them, without imposing upon the commissioners the burden of establishing affirmatively the actual existence of the disease and the exposure, would not be a valid exercise of the police power of the state, but would be a palpable violation of the constitutional provision that no person shall be deprived of property without due process of law.

See also Sahr v. Scholle (1895) 89 Hun, 42, 35 N. Y. Supp. 97, cited under I. supra, where, in an action for killing a horse which, it was claimed, was abandoned, the question was considered as to the conclusiveness upon the owner of the finding that the horse was injured past recovery for any useful purpose.

On this point, although the facts do not bring the case within the scope of the note, attention is called to Lowe v. Conroy (1904) 120 Wis. 151, 66 L.R.A. 907, 102 Am. St. Rep. 983, 97 N. W. 942, 1 Ann. Cas. 341, in which the court said: "The statute, as stated, makes no provision giving the party proceeded against for such a nuisance or cause of sickness an opportunity to be heard before his property may be destroyed. While such a determination has been held to be a full protection to all persons acting under it in carrying out the purposes of the law,—that is, to abate, and, if necessary, destroy, that which is in fact a nuisance or source of danger to health,—yet it is no protection for destroying private property which in fact is no such nuisance or source of danger. This is upon the ground that due process of law requires that the owner be given an opportunity to be heard at a trial before his private property be taken and adjudged forfeited for his misconduct, or for the protection of the public health. He cannot be deprived of the right, either before or after such taking of his property, to have a judicial inquiry whether in fact he has forfeited the right to his property by coming within the condemnation of the law. In such cases, where a board of health has summarily destroyed property, the owner may bring his action to recover the damages sustained, if it be found he has been unjustifiably deprived of it. In the absence of judicial inquiry wherein the owner is given full opportunity to establish that no nuisance or cause of sickness exists as claimed, the board of health cannot declare a thing a nuisance or source of danger to public health which is not so in fact. Their authority to act is bottomed upon the actual existence of the conditions which the statutes declare they may abate or remove."

Attention is called also to the distinction as to the power to declare public nuisances and to order their summary abatement between cases where the property involved is of comparatively small value and where it is of large value, instances of the destruction of diseased animals being placed by the Federal Supreme Court with the latter class of cases.

Thus, it was said in Lawton v. Steele (1893) 152 U. S. 133, 38 L. ed. 385, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 499, on facts not within the scope of the present annotation: "Where the property is of little value, and its use for the illegal purpose is clear, the legislature may declare it to be a nuisance, and subject to summary abatement. Instances of this are the power to kill diseased cattle; to pull down houses in the path of conflagrations; destruction of decayed fruit or fish or unwholesome meats, of infected clothing, obscene books or pictures, or instruments which can only be used for illegal purposes. While the legislature has no right arbitrarily to declare that to be a nuisance which is clearly not so, a good deal must be left to its discretion in that regard, and if the object to be accomplished is conducive to the public interests, it may exercise a large liberty of choice in the means employed. . . . It is not easy to draw the line between cases where property illegally used may be destroyed summarily and where judicial proceedings are necessary for its condemnation. If the property were of great value, as, for instance, if it were a vessel employed for smuggling or other illegal purposes, it would be putting a dangerous power in the hands of a custom officer to permit him to sell or destroy it as a public nuisance, and the owner would have good reason to complain of such act as depriving him of his property without due process of law. But where the property is of trifling value, and its destruction is necessary to effect the object of a certain statute, we think it is within the power of the legislature to order its summary abatement."

Statutes and ordinances regulating the running at large of dogs, usually requiring their registration or licensing, prohibiting their running at large unless muzzled or collared, and providing for their summary destruction when found running at large in violation of the statute or ordinance, have generally been sustained as a valid exercise of the police power.

Under charter power to declare, prevent, and remove nuisances, and to take such other measures for the preservation of the public health as the trustees may deem necessary, a town may require the muzzling of dogs and the killing of all dogs found running at large in violation of the ordinance; such an ordinance is a reasonable and proper exercise of the police power. Haller v. Sheridan (1867) 27 Ind. 494.

An ordinance providing that a dog seized while running at large shall be killed if not ransomed by payment of $1 before 10 o'clock of the morning after it has been detained twenty-four hours, and providing for a notice of the seizure to be given to the owner of any dog having a collar with the owner's name thereon, is not unconstitutional, or so unreasonable that the court can hold it void. Hagerstown v. Witmer (1897) 86 Md. 293, 39 L.R.A. 649, 37 Atl. 965.

The police power was held in Leach v. Elwood (1878) 3 Ill. App. 453, to authorize a municipal corporation to enact an ordinance empowering the mayor, on an alarm of mad dogs, to prohibit, by public notice, unmuzzled dogs from running at large within the city limits and authorizing the killing of all dogs found at large without a muzzle.

An ordinance requiring all dogs to be securely muzzled, and declaring any dog found running at large without a muzzle to be a nuisance, and making it the duty of the marshal and policemen to kill any such dog, has been held a valid exercise of the power to enact ordinances for the protection of life, health, and property. Walker v. Powell (1901) 156 Ind. 639, 53 L.R.A. 749, 59 N. E. 20.

A statute requiring the payment of a license fee for dogs, and authorizing the destruction of any dog which, having been seized for nonpayment of the license, is not redeemed within forty-eight hours after the seizure, does not unconstitutionally take property without due process of law in that it provides for the destruction of the animal without notice to the owner. Fox v. Mohawk & H. River Humane Soc. (1901) 165 N. Y. 517, 51 L.R.A. 681, 80 Am. St. Rep. 767, 59 N. E. 353; People ex rel. Westbay v. Delaney (1911) 73 Misc. 5, 130 N. Y. Supp. 833, affirmed without opinion in (1911) 146 App. Div. 957, 131 N. Y. Supp. 1137.

It was held in Fox v. Mohawk & H. River Humane Soc. (N. Y.) supra, that the authority given by statute to a humane society to destroy or appropriate unlicensed dogs was not an unconstitutional delegation of governmental power to a private corporation, since unlicensed dogs had long been regarded as subject to destruction by any person. This decision was followed in People ex rel. Westbay v. Delaney (N. Y.) supra.

An ordinance requiring the registration of dogs, and the wearing of a suitable collar with the owner's name or initials by dogs which were registered, and providing that any dog not registered and collared should be liable to be killed by any person, was held in Jenkins v. Ballantyne (1892) 8 Utah, 245, 16 L.R.A. 689, 30 Pac. 760, not to constitute a violation of the constitutional provision against depriving a person of property without due process of law, but a valid police regulation.

The Vermont statute, which was considered a valid exercise of the police power in McDermont v. Taft (1910) 83 Vt. 249, 138 Am. St. Rep. 1083, 75 Atl. 276, provided that the owner or keeper of a dog should cause it to be registered and licensed and to wear a collar distinctly marked with the name of its owner or keeper, and that "any person may, and every police officer and constable shall, kill or cause to be killed" dogs not so licensed and collared, "whenever and wherever found."

A statute providing that no dog should be entitled to the protection of the law unless placed on the assessment rolls, and that in civil actions for the killing or for injuries to dogs the owner could not recover beyond the amount of the value of the dog as fixed by him in the last assessment preceding the killing or injuries complained of, was held a valid exercise of the police power in Sentell v. New Orleans & C. R. Co. (1896) 166 U. S. 698, 41 L. ed. 1169, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 698, 1 Am. Neg. Rep. 773.

A statute authorizing a justice of the peace, on complaint that a dog is dangerous, to order the owner to kill the dog, and prescribing, in case of noncompliance within forty-eight hours, a penalty of $2.50 and the further sum of $1.25 for every forty-eight hours thereafter until the dog is killed, does not deprive the owner of the dog of due process of law, in that he is given no opportunity to be heard by the justice, where in an action to enforce the penalty he has full opportunity to be heard and to contest the truth of the complaint on which the order was made. People ex rel. Renshaw v. Gillespie (1898) 25 App. Div. 91, 48 N. Y. Supp. 882.

Under statutory authority to prevent the running at large of dogs and to destroy the same when at large contrary to any prohibition to that effect, it was held in Gibson v. Harrison (1901) 69 Ark. 385, 54 L.R.A. 268, 63 S. W. 999, that a municipal corporation might exact a fee of $1.50 for the privilege of keeping a dog, and in case of its nonpayment impose a fine upon the owner and provide for the killing of the dog.

Under a "general welfare" charter clause, it was held in Fincher v. Colum (1907) 2 Ga. App. 745, 59 S. E. 22, that a city council might pass an ordinance requiring owners of dogs to register them, secure tags, and pay fees therefor, and authorizing the killing of all untagged dogs.

It was held in Rose v. Salem (1915) 77 Or. 77, 150 Pac. 276, that the city had power to prohibit dogs from running at large under charter authority "to prevent domestic animals from running at large within the city," and "to license, tax, impound, sell or kill dogs."

Under authority to pass by-laws for restraining and regulating the running at large of dogs, and for killing dogs running at large contrary to the by-laws, a township council may prohibit dogs from running at large unaccompanied by their owners, and provide that any dog found so running at large at a greater distance than  $\frac{1}{2}$  mile from the owner's premises may be killed by any resident, although in the authority for passing the by-law it is also provided that for the purposes therein named a dog should be deemed to be running at large "when found in a street or other public place," and not under the control of any person, the latter clause merely affecting the burden of proof, and not limiting the power to justify the killing of a dog to those cases where it is in a street or other public place. McNair v. Collins (1912) 24 Ont. L. Rep. 44, 6 D. L. R. 510, 3 Ont. Week. N. 1639, 22 Ont. Week. Rep. 891, Ann. Cas. 1913C, 964.

Attention is called to Faribault v. Wilson (1885) 34 Minn. 254, 25 N. W. 449, 6 Am. Crim. Rep. 544, holding that under charter power to regulate or prevent the running at large of dogs and to authorize their destruction in a summary manner when not licensed or at large contrary to ordinance, the remedy by destruction of dogs was not the only one a city might impose for violation of an ordinance regulating the keeping of dogs, but that a fine might be on the owner.

See also Whitfield v. Paris (1892) 84 Tex. 431, 15 L.R.A. 783, 31 Am. St. Rep. 69, 19 S. W. 566, where, in holding that a city was not liable for the recklessness of a policeman in shooting at an unmuzzled dog on a public street whereby he seriously wounded a person on the street while he was attempting to enforce an ordinance making it his duty to kill unmuzzled dogs, the court stated that the enactment of the ordinance referred to was an exercise by the city of its police power.

But on the ground that the title of the ordinance, which was "An Ordinance Prohibiting Animals from Running at Large in the City," did not express, as required by statute, the subject-matter of a section thereof which provided for the registering, taxing, and collaring of dogs, and made it the duty of the marshal to kill any dog found running at large in the city without a collar and tag, and rendered the owner criminally liable if the tax was not paid and the dog registered, irrespective of whether he was permitted to run at large or not, said section was held invalid in Stebbins v. Mayer (1888) 38 Kan. 573, 16 Pac. 745.

And in several cases ordinances providing for the summary killing of dogs have been held unconstitutional, as depriving the owner of property without due process of law. People ex rel. Shand v. Tighe (1894) 9 Misc. 607, 30 N. Y. Supp. 368; Rose v. Salem (1915) 77 Or. 77, 150 Pac. 276; Lynn v. State (1894) 33 Tex. Crim. Rep. 153, 25 S. W. 779.

An ordinance providing that if any dog should attack a person except on the owner's premises, on complaint made to the mayor or police justice, such officer should inquire into the complaint, and, if satisfied of its truth, and that such dog is dangerous, should order the owner to kill him immediately, and providing that if the owner should refuse to do so within forty-eight hours he should forfeit $10 and also $5 for every forty-eight hours thereafter until the dog was killed, was held in People ex rel. Shand v. Tighe (N. Y.) supra, unconstitutional in so far as it authorized the issuance of an order for the owner to kill the animal without notice and an opportunity to be heard.

Although apparently not necessary to the decision, the court in People ex rel. Shand v. Tighe (N. Y.) supra, stated that it found no authority going so far as to suggest that a statute authorizing a city council to pass an ordinance to "regulate and license" dogs conferred power to pass an ordinance to kill them.

It was held in Lynn v. State (1894) 33 Tex. Crim. Rep. 153, 25 S. W. 779, that an ordinance making it the duty of the city marshal and policemen to shoot all dogs not muzzled, found in any street, alley, sidewalk, or other public highway within the city limits, was unconstitutional, in that it deprived the owner of property without due process of law, and violated a provision of the Penal Code subjecting to a fine any person who should discharge firearms on a street. This conclusion was reached notwithstanding a statute authorizing cities to restrain and prohibit the running at large of dogs and to authorize their destruction when at large contrary to ordinances.

b. As affected by property rights in dogs.

Many of the decisions cited above were in jurisdictions in which, doubtless, dogs are recognized by statute as property. And, as expressly recognizing the proposition that the summary destruction of dogs running at large in violation of an ordinance is within the police power, even though dogs are property, see Litchville v. Hanson (1910) 19 N. D. 672, 124 N. W. 1119, Ann. Cas. 1912D, 876.

It was said in Sentell v. New Orleans & C. R. Co. (1896) 166 U. S. 698, 41 L. ed. 1169, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 693, 1 Am. Neg. Rep. 773, that, assuming that dogs were property in the fullest sense, they would still be subject to the police power of the state and might be destroyed as in the judgment of the legislature was necessary for the protection of its citizens. The court stated that damage done by dogs is usually such as is beyond the reach of judicial process, that legislation of a drastic nature is necessary to protect persons and property from destruction and annoyance, and that such legislation is clearly within the police power of the state. See this case under III. a, supra.

The validity of an ordinance requiring the payment of an annual license on dogs, and making it the duty of the marshal to seize and impound any dog not licensed, and, after two days, if no person has claimed the dog and paid the license or produced a license showing previous payment, to destroy such dog, was sustained in Re Ackerman (1907) 6 Cal. App. 5, 91 Pac. 429, as against the objection that the ordinance was unreasonable in that it provided for the destruction of the dog without notification of the owner. It was held that the ordinance did not unconstitutionally take property without due process of law, but was a valid exercise of the police power, and that this conclusion was not affected by the fact that in that state under statute a dog was property.

It was said in Julienne v. Jackson (1891) 69 Miss. 34, 30 Am. St. Rep. 526, 10 So. 43, in sustaining the constitutionality of an ordinance providing that between certain dates all dogs running at large without a muzzle and tag should be destroyed by any policeman of the city: "It is held with great unanimity by the courts that regulations of the most stringent character, and the most summary proceedings for the destruction of these animals kept contrary to such regulations, are entirely within legislative power, and free from constitutional objection, though the property of the owner is destroyed without notice or hearing in the execution of the law."

However, in at least one case the court refused to sustain the validity of an ordinance providing for the destruction of dogs, the decision being placed on the ground that dogs were declared by statute in that state to be property.

Thus, an ordinance making it unlawful for dogs to run at large in the city limits, authorizing the street commissioner or his agents to impound any dog found running at large, and providing that whenever any dogs should be impounded notice should be given to the owner or custodian, if known, and, if the dog was not claimed within three days, it should be killed, was held unconstitutional in Rose v. Salem (1915) 77 Or. 77, 150 Pac. 276, as depriving the owner of his property without due process of law. The court admitted that in many of the states the courts had held similar ordinances valid, but stated that in all cases of this sort which had been called to its attention emphasis was laid on the assumption that dogs were property in a limited or qualified sense only, and were not at common law the subject of larceny; whereas, in that state it was larceny to steal a dog, and dogs were expressly declared by statute to be personal property.

A distinction between the right to destroy dogs and such other domestic animals as horses and oxen, without notice to the owner, is made in Fox v. Mohawk & H. River Humane Soc. (1901) 165 N. Y. 517, 51 L.R.A. 681, 80 Am. St. Rep. 767, 59 N. E. 353. Although the court held that the summary destruction or appropriation of a dog by a humane society, without notice to the owner, when he had failed to procure a license for the dog as required by statute, did not constitute a taking of his property without due process of law, it stated that such a confiscation without judicial process would, in the case of domestic animals such as horses, oxen, and the like, even though these animals were trespassing, be unconstitutional. The court stated that under any circumstances there was but a qualified property in such animals as dogs, and that, in fact, there might be said to be no property in them as against the police power of the state.

In other cases the nature of the property in dogs has been mentioned as one of the grounds for sustaining the validity of the statute or ordinance providing for their summary destruction.

It was said in McDerment v. Taft (1910) 83 Vt. 249, 138 Am. St. Rep. 1083, 75 Atl. 276, that while dogs are recognized by the law as a species of property, they belong to that class of property the keeping of which may be stringently regulated by the legislature in the exercise of its police power, even to the extent of providing for their destruction, in given circumstances, without judicial proceedings and in a most summary way.

An ordinance requiring the owner of a dog to pay a tax and to collar the dog, and making it the duty of the city marshal to kill every dog found running at large in violation of the ordinance, the marshal to receive for his services $1 for each dog killed, was held in Independence v. Trouville (1875) 15 Kan. 70, not invalid, at least not in any such respect as would excuse the city from payment of the compensation to the marshal provided for by the ordinance. The court said that the ordinance could certainly not be held invalid because of the sacredness of the property in dogs, that property in dogs was of such a low character that it could hardly be considered as property at all. And on this ground the court distinguished the case from that of more valuable animals, such as a cow, which must be taken up and impounded and notice given to the owner.

IV. Miscellaneous.

Am. St. Rep. 181, 103 S. W. 380, it was held that a statute permitting the summary killing of hogs found running at large on or near public levees did not unconstitutionally deprive the owner of his property, where prevention of the weakening of the levees by the rooting of hogs was necessary to the public safety.

STATE OF WEST VIRGINIA EX REL. C. S. FARMER, Admr., etc., of Beulah Westerman, Deceased,

v.

CITIZENS' TRUST & GUARANTY COMPANY.

(— W. Va. —, 100 S. E. 685.)

Executor and administrator — personal debt to estate — liability of surety.

1. A debt due from a personal representative to the estate which he represents is not for all purposes to be regarded as money on hand; but where at the time of his appointment and qualification such representative was insolvent and unable to pay his debt, and so continued throughout the period of his administration, there being no laches on his part, such debt is to be treated as any other debt owing to the estate, and the surety on his official bond is not liable thereon for more than could have been enforced against the principal at any time within such period.

Pleading — motion to strike — effect.

2. A motion to strike out a plea has the same effect upon the legal sufficiency thereof that a demurrer thereto would have had.

Executor and administrator — surety — extent of obligation.

3. A surety on the official bond of an administrator or executor, where there is no statute or stipulation in the bond to the contrary, obligates himself only to account for losses occasioned by the failure of the fiduciary to use due diligence in pursuing and collecting claims owing to the estate, and to make proper application of the assets that come into his hands.

— debt due as former administrator.

4. Where the principal in a bond given by a husband as administrator of his deceased wife, the chief assets of whose estate she acquired by will from her deceased father, upon whose estate the husband as executor of the will also administered, but without bond, the will so providing, did not in his lifetime account for or deliver to the wife, except in part, the estate so devised and bequeathed to her, and died leaving the residue unadministered, the surety on his official bond as such administrator, when sued thereon by the administrator of the unadministered assets of the wife's estate, may, to defeat recovery, plead, rely on, and show the inability of the principal therein to pay the same to the wife's estate after her death, because of the insolvency of the principal during the entire period covered by his administration of her estate.

Headnotes by LYNCH, J.

CERTIFICATION by the Circuit Court for Wood County to the Supreme Court of Appeals of a ruling denying plaintiff's motion to strike defendant's special plea from the file, in an action brought to enforce its liability as surety on an administrator's bond. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Mr. A. C. Chapman for plaintiff.
Messrs. Kreps, Russell, & Hiteshew, for defendant:

The sureties are liable for a debt of their principal only under circumstances that would render them liable for a debt due by a third person.

United Brethren First Church v. Akin, 2 Ann. Cas. 355, note; 11 R. C. L. 118; Sanders v. Dodge, 140 Mich. 236, 112 Am. St. Rep. 399, 103 N. W. 597.

Lynch, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Plaintiff, as administrator de bonis non of the estate of Beulah Westerman, daughter of W. S. Wiley, deceased, and wife of C. G. Westerman, deceased, who qualified and became the administrator of the estate devised and bequeathed to her by the will of her father, brought against Citizens' Trust & Guaranty Company, surety on Westerman's bond as administrator, this action of debt on the bond to recover assets belonging to her estate in the hands of Westerman, unadministered, at the date of his death; and to defeat recovery thereon defendant, in addition to nil debet, conditions performed, and conditions not broken, pleaded specially the insolvency of Westerman from the time he qualified as such administrator to the date of his death. This plea the court refused to strike from the file on plaintiff's motion, but did certify its ruling thereon to this court to test the correctness thereof, thus presenting the single question whether, because of such insolvency, any liability on the bond attached to the defendant as surety therein.

The decisions of this state furnish no precedent or criterion to guide us in reaching a proper conclusion upon this proposition. What is not less embarrassing, we meet at the outset a contrariety of judicial opinion wherever the question has been discussed. The facts may be gathered from the opinion in Morris v. Westerman, 79 W. Va. 502, 3 A.L.R. 1237, 92 S. E. 567, which, so far as they are now important, are these: C. G. Westerman qualified as executor of the will of W. S. Wiley about January 22, 1903, in Wetzel county, but without bond; the will specifically dispensing with the indemnity. Beulah Wiley took under the will the greater part of the valuable estate of her father, only part of which came into her hands, either through her husband or from any other source, at any time while her husband had charge of her father's estate. Subsequently Mrs. Westerman died, and her husband became administrator of her estate, and gave the bond on which this action is brought to enable him to qualify as such, and who did so qualify and did administer upon her estate until the date of his death, whereupon plaintiff became the administrator of the unadministered assets, and brought this action to recover from the surety on Westerman's official bond that portion of her father's estate which her husband, first as his executor and then as her administrator, had failed to turn over to her, or, after her death, to her estate.

The condition of the administration bond involved here is that the principal, "C. G. Westerman, administrator of the estate of Beulah [or Mrs. C. G.] Westerman, deceased, shall faithfully pay the rents and profits or proceeds of said estate which may lawfully come into his hands, or to the hands of any person for him, to such person or persons as are entitled thereto, and shall in all other things well and truly discharge his duties as such administrator."

The special plea filed by defendant sets up by way of defense the following: "That C. G. Westerman was, at the time he was appointed and qualified as administrator of the estate of Beulah Westerman, deceased, insolvent, and . . . continued to be insolvent during the entire period that he was administrator, . . . to wit, up until the date of his death, . . . and that at no time during the said period . . . could the said debt decreed [in Morris v. Westerman] as owing from the estate of C. G. Westerman, deceased, to the said C.

S. Farmer, administrator d. b. n. of the estate of Beulah Westerman, deceased, have been collected from the said C. G. Westerman, and that at no time during the aforesaid period . . . could a greater amount have been collected from C. G. Westerman upon the aforesaid debt than was actually recovered and received . . . from and out of the estate of C. G. Westerman, deceased."

Whether Westerman in fact was or was not insolvent when his wife died, or when he died, or in the meantime, is immaterial, so far as this discussion is concerned. For that purpose the facts set up in the plea are taken as true, for a motion to strike has, we think, the same effect upon the question of the sufficiency of a pleading as a demurrer thereto would have

motion to strike

had. Besides, like every other material fact alleged by a pleading, Westerman's insolvency as set up in the special plea is a fact to be proved by him who relies on it by way of defense—in this instance, the surety in the fidelity bond. We are dealing now only with the right of the defendant to plead and rely on insolvency to exonerate itself from the liability sought to be enforced against it, and, if it can, to sustain the plea by necessary proof, the burden of which rests upon it.

The single question presented is whether the allegation of the insolvency of the administrator during the time covered by his administration, and his consequential inability at any time during the administration to collect the debt owed by him to the estate of his wife, constitutes a valid defense to the action instituted against the surety on his official bond. As already indicated, instead of there being a general concurrence, there is a marked lack of harmony among the judicial decisions upon the question. This confusion is largely due to the diversity of authority at the common law as to the manner of treating a debt owed by a personal representative to his decedent at the time of his appointment. Many courts by a legal fiction treat such debt as immediately liquidated and as constituting assets in the hands of the representative from the moment of his qualification, upon the theory that, as the personal representative cannot demand or receive payment of himself, or sue himself, and since he is bound to account for his own debt as for all other debts, the law presumes that he has done what he is legally bound to do, and therefore charges him with the amount as a debt paid.

What is generally known as the "Massachusetts rule" upon the subject seems to have been announced as early as 1814 in Stevens v. Gaylord, 11 Mass. 256, and since followed, not only in that state, but in many others, and in substance and effect, as stated at pages 268, 269, is: "As soon as the debtor is appointed administrator, if he acknowledges the debt, he has actually received so much money, and is answerable for it. This is the result with respect to an executor, and the same reason applies to an administrator, as the same hand is to receive and pay, and there is no ceremony to be performed in paying the debt, and no mode of doing it, but by considering the money to be now in the hands of the party in his character of administrator. . . . The consequence is that he and his sureties in the administration bond are liable for the amount of such a debt, in like manner as if he had received it from any other debtor of the deceased."

The rule was further extended in Leland v. Felton, 1 Allen, 531, to apply to debts due to the estate of a testator from the executor named in his will, though the latter was insolvent at the time he accepted the trust, and although he had never charged the debts in his account, and an account had been allowed in which they were not included, but were mentioned as notes which it had been impossible to collect, and though he had resigned his trust, and an administrator de bonis non had been appointed in his place. The latter case of Bassett v. Fidelity & D. Co. 184 Mass. 210, 100 Am. St. Rep. 552, 68 N. E. 205, adheres to the same rule, and holds that the surety on an executor's bond is liable for the full amount due the testator from an insolvent firm of which the executor was a member, although the firm and the executor were insolvent at the time the latter assumed the trust. The reasoning relating to this conclusion is that an executor or administrator is appointed for the sole purpose of enforcing, in behalf of those interested in the estate, the rights of the estate against others. "For that reason," says the court, "on broad principles of policy it was laid down by the common law of England that he must yield all controversy as to the debt due from himself, and treat it as an asset of the estate," since "no one is bound to accept the office, and, if he elects to do so, he thereby tacitly assents to this condition." The Massachusetts court has recognized no distinction in the application of this doctrine to assignees in insolvency cases (Benchley v. Chapin, 10 Cush. 173), to guardians (Mattoon v. Cowing, 13 Gray, 387), and to receivers in insolvency cases (Com. v. Gould, 118 Mass. 300).

The supreme court of Oregon indorses the same doctrine in United Brethren First Church v. Akin, 45 Or. 247, 66 L.R.A. 654, 77 Pac. 748, 2 Ann. Cas. 353, and holds the sureties on the bond of an executor liable for the amount of his personal debt to the estate, though they executed the bond without any knowledge of indebtedness by the executor to the decedent, or of the executor's insolvency and inability to pay the debt. This holding, however, seems to be warranted by a statute of that state, as it is perhaps by statutes of other states, providing that an executor of an estate shall be liable for any claim of the testator against him, "as for so much money in his hands."

The attempt to compel the sureties of an executor or administrator, the rule being the same in each case, to pay a debt due from him to the estate administered, when, had another person not so indebted been appointed as such, he could not possibly have collected it because of the continued insolvency of the debtor, certainly may frequently be fraught with serious consequences, and for that reason ought not to be sanctioned without due consideration, especially when no warrant can be found therefor other than the legal fiction that such a debt is to be treated as so much cash belonging to the estate at the time of the appointment—a fiction adopted and approved, it is said, merely for the purpose of justice and convenience. But if such were the purposes, its application ought not to be extended to cases where gross injustice will result. The rule necessarily must be based upon a presumption that all men are solvent and able to pay their obligations; but since that presumption is obviously not true in fact, to enforce the rule under all circumstances may work great hardship. When applied to a case where the personal representative was insolvent at the time of his appointment, and so continued until his death or discharge, a peculiar injustice might be caused by placing him in such a position that he might be charged with contempt or embezzlement for failure to pay over moneys with which he is charged, but which he has never received, since he was not able to pay, or by charging his sureties with liability beyond the faithful discharge of the duties of such personal representative, and in effect making them guarantors of such debts due the estate instead of sureties. Despite these evident hardships, there are some states which enforce the strict rule of liability against the representative and his sureties, irrespective of his continued insolvency and inability to pay. Bassett v. Fidelity & D. Co. supra; United Brethren First Church v. Akin, supra; Wright v. Lang, 66 Ala. 389; Arnold v. Arnold, 124 Ala. 550, 82 Am. St.

Rep. 199, 27 So. 465; Judge of Probate v. Sulloway, 68 N. H. 511, 49 L.R.A. 347, 73 Am. St. Rep. 619, 44 Atl. 720; McGaughey v. Jacoby, 54 Ohio St. 487, 44 N. E. 231; James v. West, 67 Ohio St. 28, 65 N. E. 156; 2 Woerner, Administration, 2d ed. § 311; 11 R. C. L. 118; notes in 2 Ann. Cas. 355; and 112 Am. St. Rep. 409.

But the better rule, as it seems to us, is that followed by the majority of courts, which, while treating the liability as money on hand for administration purposes, properly considered, do not so deem or treat it for all purposes, but place the duty of the fiduciary toward his own debt to the estate upon the same level as other debts due thereto.

Such rule does not make of the surety a guarantor of the payment of the debt owed by the personal representative, the collection of which, had it been owed by any other, would have been excused upon proof of the continued insolvency of such debtor. Thus, as remarked by the supreme court of Vermont in Lyon v. Osgood, 58 Vt. 707, 715, 7 Atl. 8: "The extension of the legal fiction of payment, so as to make the surety liable for the executor's debt beyond his means to pay, when not guilty of laches, would often work great injustice to the surety. The surety ought not to be required to contribute from his own funds to make up an estate for the deceased, which he, in fact, was not possessed of at the time of his death. . . . In the absence of laches, we think the surety is liable upon his bond for the executor's debt only to the extent of the executor's ability to pay it."

Harker v. Irick, 10 N. J. Eq. 269, restates the same proposition. The supreme court of Kentucky in Buckel v. Smith, 26 Ky. L. Rep. 991, 82 S. W. 1001, puts the debt of an administrator or executor on the same footing as a debt owed to the estate by any other person. Besides the fiction already referred to, there is apparent no solid foundation on which to base a difference between the two liabilities. The sureties, where there is no statute to the contrary, such as necessarily would operate as notice to them, obligate themselves only to account for losses occasioned by the failure of the fiduciary to use due diligence in pursuing and collecting claims owing to the estate, and to make proper application of the assets that come into his hands. But where he was always insolvent, and for that reason wholly unable to pay a debt owed by him to the estate, upon what theory of justice, propriety, public policy, or lawful right, other than the mere fiction referred to, can the sureties be compelled to respond for such unavoidable failure?

The bond executed by deceased and his surety does not purport to impose absolute liability. Its condition is (1) that the principal shall faithfully pay the rent and profits or proceeds of the estate which may lawfully come into his hands, or to the hands of any person for him, to such person or persons as are entitled thereto; and (2) shall in all other things well and truly discharge his duties as such administrator. With respect to debts other than his own, the personal representative is chargeable only with the faithful discharge of his duty to make a prompt and efficient attempt to collect them, and when such collection is rendered impossible by the insolvency of the debtor, his surety is not responsible therefor. Debts owed by the representative should be treated in the same manner, and when at the time of his appointment, and continuing until his discharge or death, he was insolvent and unable to collect such debt from himself, his surety should not be responsible for that which no diligence could have prevented. Such is the rule followed in the great majority of states. Re Walker, 125 Cal. 242, 73 Am. St. Rep. 40, 57 Pac. 991; Sánchez v.

Forster, 133 Cal. 614, 65 Pac. 1077; State ex rel. McClamrock v. Gregory, 119 Ind. 503, 22 N. E. 1; Buckel v. Smith, 26 Ky. L. Rep. 991, 82 S. W. 1001; Sanders v. Dodge, 140 Mich. 236, 112 Am. Barr, 45 Hun, 582, affirmed in 107 N. Y. 624, 13 N. E. 939; Re Piper, 15 Pa. 533; Rader v. Yeargin, 85 Tenn. 486, 3 S. W. 178; Lyon v. Co. 241 Ill. 409, 26 L.R.A.(N.S.) 411, 132 Am. St. Rep. 226, 89 N. E. 787.

Of course, if the personal representative was solvent when he assumed the duties of his office, and later became insolvent and unable to pay his debt, or if he was insolvent at first, but later became solvent, the surety might well be liable for a default under such circumstances, as many cases hold, though, according to the averments of the special plea, such question is not now presented. The averments of that plea, <sup>—debt due as former administrator.</sup> if proved upon the trial of the case, will constitute a bar to the action. No other questions are properly presented in the record for our consideration at this time.

Our order, therefore, will affirm the ruling upon the motion to strike out the special plea, and direct the certification of our decision to the Circuit Court of Wood County.

I. Introductory.

In considering herein the question, whether the bond of an executor or administrator covers a debt due from the principal to the decedent, the numerous cases involving the nature and extent of the personal liability of a representative as a debtor of the estate have been included only in so far as they appertain to the liability of the sureties on the representative's bond.

Two opposing doctrines seem to exist in the American jurisdictions relative to the bond of a representative as covering a debt owed by him to the decedent. The minority rule,—the so-called "Massachusetts rule,"—is based apparently on a legal fiction, and, although it has some following, it has been severely criticized as being too harsh and impractical in its application.

II. Majority rule.

a. Rule stated.

The more favored rule in America seems to be that the bond of an administrator or executor covers a personal debt owed by the principal to the decedent only to the extent that it binds him to a faithful performance of his duties as administrator; that is, he must exercise due diligence and honesty in the collection of debts, including a debt owed by himself, and the sureties are liable for his failure to do so. But where it appears that the debtor-representative is unable to pay, the debt becomes uncollectable, and the sureties on the bond are not liable therefor.

Thus, it was said in Harker v. Irick (1854) 10 N. J. Eq. 269: "If a person becomes surety for one as administrator, who at the time is a debtor to the estate and is insolvent, and is never able to discharge such indebtedness, such surety is not bound for such a delinquency of his principal. He is only bound for the faithful performance of his duties as administrator. It could be no breach of trust or delinquency in duty for the administrator not to do what is beyond his power and control to perform. If, under such circumstances, the administrator should, in the settlement of his accounts with the court, charge himself with the debt, and the accounts should be passed in such a shape as to bind the surety for the debt, the surety would be relieved, upon application to the proper tribunal, from such responsibility. It would be a fraud upon the surety to exact the debt from him, whether the administrator did or did not, by his mode of accounting, contemplate a fraud. But if at the time the surety assumes his responsibility the administrator owes the estate, and is solvent and able to pay, the amount of the debt will be considered, in law and equity, as so much money in his hands as administrator at the time, and consequently the surety will be responsible for it. It is the duty of the administrator to collect the debts of the estate without delay; and certainly any delay which places the debt he himself owes the estate in jeopardy, and results in its loss, is a gross violation of his duty as administrator."

setts rule, the court, in Howell v. Anderson (1902) 66 Neb. 575, 61 L.R.A. 313, 92 N. W. 760, said: "The Massachusetts rule, as we will call it for convenience, is based on a legal fiction and the presumption that all men are solvent and able to pay their obligations. It was but a short cut to say that one who was an administrator could not sue himself, therefore he would be required to account to the estate for his individual debt as so much cash. It was an easy way of solving a difficult problem, and one which we fully approve of, where the fact of insolvency is not satisfactorily made to appear. In case the administrator was solvent at the time of his appointment, or any time during the administration of his office, and before his final settlement and discharge, he should be required to pay over in cash the amount of his antecedent debt. In such a case the rule contended for by plaintiff is a salutary one. It results in no hardship to anyone, and for that reason should be invoked and enforced. But it seems to us that this rule should have no application where it is made to appear that the administrator was wholly insolvent when appointed, while acting, and at the time of settlement. The defendant in this case filed his report in response to the citation and brought his individual note into court, together with the other uncollectable claims due the estate, and turned them all over to the county judge. As the estate had not been fully administered, it was the duty of the county judge to appoint an administrator de bonis non, into whose hands the administrator's note, as well as the others uncollectable and uncontroverted, would go. The result to the estate would have been the same had another person than the defendant been appointed administrator. The estate has in no wise suffered by any act of his, subsequent to his appointment. It appears beyond question that at the time the defendant was appointed administrator of Howell's estate, he was wholly insolvent; that he remained in such insolvent condition during the entire time that he served as such administrator, and was insolvent at the time of his resignation and proposed settlement; that by reason of his condition it was at all times impossible for him to pay the antecedent debt he owed to the estate."

E. 787, wherein the court said, by way of dictum: "So far as we are advised, this question has never been passed on by this court. It seems to us that the rule laid down in Massachusetts is liable to work a great hardship upon administrators and the sureties upon their bonds. To compel sureties on administrators' bonds to augment the estate of the deceased by requiring them to pay a debt which an insolvent administrator happens to owe the estate is imposing upon them a burden not contemplated, and in many cases a great hardship. Leaving out of view the rights of the sureties, it would seem equally shocking to our sense of justice to proceed against an administrator personally for a failure to pay over money which he, in fact, did not have, and which he had no means of procuring. Where, however, the administrator is solvent, no such hardship can be imposed upon either the sureties or the administrator. The rule thus applied will accomplish the desired end in most cases, and avoid the harsh consequences that would occasionally result from the application of the unrestricted Massachusetts rule."

b. Application of rule.

1. Bond of administrator.

In State ex rel. McClamrock v. Gregory (1889) 119 Ind. 503, 22 N. E. 1, an action upon an administrator's bond, it appeared that the administrator at the time of his appointment owed certain sums of money to the decedent, which he failed to account for upon the settlement of the estate. The court held, relative to the question of the liability of the sureties upon the bond, that the debt of the administrator was to be accounted for the same as the other debts, and the proper performance of this duty was covered by the bond, but the insolvency of the debtor-administrator during the period of administration could be shown in discharge of the sureties' liability.

In Sanders v. Dodge (1905) 140 Mich. 236, 112 Am. St. Rep. 399, 108 N. W. 597, a proceeding for the final accounting of an administrator, it appeared that the latter was indebted to the estate of the decedent, but, owing to his insolvency, was unable to account for the debt. A statute provided that "no executor or administrator shall be accountable for any debts due to the deceased, if it shall appear that they remain uncollected without his fault." It was held that the bond of the administrator did not cover the debt owing by him to his intestate, where it appeared that he was hopelessly insolvent.

So in McEwen v. Fletcher (1914) 164 Iowa, 517, 146 N. W. 1, Ann. Cas. 1916D, 631, the court held that for the purpose of charging the sureties on an administrator's bond, an indebtedness owed by the administrator to the decedent should not be regarded as an asset as of the time of its maturity so as to charge the sureties on the bond irrespective of whether the debtor was solvent, but the liability should be measured by the ability of the administrator to pay the debt and his failure to perform the duties of his office in diligently collecting the same.

In Wilson v. Ruthrauff (1900) 82 Mo. App. 435, the court held that liability under the bond of an administrator for failure to collect a debt owing by him to the decedent was dependent on the debtor's ability to pay, for, while the debt owing by an administrator to an estate was an asset in his hands, it was not necessarily a collectable asset, and was not to be treated as cash, since the debtor-administrator might be insolvent.

In Scott v. Governor (1826) 1 Mo. 686, the court held that the security on an administrator's bond was not liable for a debt owing by the administrator to the decedent during the latter's lifetime, but could be assessed damages for the neglect of the administrator to file an inventory of such credits of the intestate, since the bond covered the due performance by the administrator of his official duties.

Where it appeared that an administrator, who sought to be discharged of his official liability, was indebted to the decedent, and it further appeared that throughout the term of his administration he was hopelessly insolvent, the court held that the situation was the same as though the debt of any other person was uncollectable, and that the administrator and his sureties were discharged of their liability by the provision of a statute (Comp. Laws, § 279, chap. 23) that no executor or administrator should be accountable for any debts due to the deceased if it appeared that they remained uncollected without his fault. Howell v. Anderson (1902) 66 Neb. 575, 61 L.R.A. 313, 92 N. W. 760.

In Ordinary v. Kershaw (1862) 14 N. J. Eq. 528, the court held that where a judgment had been rendered against a surety on an administration bond for an amount owing from the personal representative to the intestate, and it clearly appeared that the administrator was insolvent, the judgment operated as a fraud on the surety, for which he could obtain relief in a proper proceeding in chancery, saying: "Unquestionably, if the administrator was solvent, the debt due the estate was assets in his hands, to be accounted for as such. The debt was inventoried and appraised as good, it was accounted for as assets, and decreed to be such in the hands of the administrator. This court is now asked, in a collateral proceeding, to declare that the decree was erroneous, and that the debt was not assets in the hands of the administrator. That can only be done directly, either by application to the court by which the decree was made, or by bill in chancery. As against the surety, if in case of clear insolvency the administrator should charge himself with a debt of his own, or of a third person who was insolvent, by design or by mistake, and a decree should be made accordingly, it would operate as a fraud upon the

In Terhune v. Oldis (1888) 44 N. J. Eq. 146, 14 Atl. 638, the court stated the rule to be that where an administrator owes the estate, and is solvent and able to pay, the amount of the debt will be considered as so much money in his hands, for the proper accounting of which he and his sureties on the official bond are liable; but if it satisfactorily appears that he is unable to pay he will not be charged with the debt as cash.

So, in Harker v. Irick (1854) 10 N. J. Eq. 269, the court held that a surety was bound only for the faithful performance of his principal's duties as administrator, and his bond did not cover a debt owing by the principal to the decedent, where it appeared that the debtor was insolvent and unable to pay.

The reported case (STATE EX REL. FARMER v. CITIZENS' TRUST & G. CO. ante, 79) supports the majority rule, adopting the theory that the bond of an administrator covers only the obligation of the representative to use due diligence and honesty in the collection of debts, including a debt owed by him to the decedent, and does not make the surety on the bond liable for the administrator's failure to account, where it appears that he is insolvent and unable to pay, the debt then becoming uncollectable.

In Keegan v. Smith (1901) 60 App. Div. 168, 70 N. Y. Supp. 260, affirmed in (1902) 172 N. Y. 624, 65 N. E. 1118, an action on an administrator's bond, it appeared that the administrator failed to account for a debt owing by him to his intestate, and in the proceeding before the surrogate judgment was rendered against him and his sureties on the bond, the surrogate finding that he was solvent and able to pay. The court, on appeal, affirmed the finding of the surrogate, holding that the bond covered the proper accounting for the debt due from the administrator to the decedent, the same as any other debt owing to the estate, and the sureties on the bond could escape liability only by showing that the debt was uncollectable.

In Gottsberger v. Smith (1856) 5 Duer (N. Y.) 566, affirmed in (1859) 19 N. Y. 150, the court held that where a debtor of an estate was appointed administrator, the case might rest on the ground that the sureties on the administration bond were prima facie responsible for the due application of the amount, the debt being assets, but justice would require that they (the sureties) would have the same right to prove, in their discharge, that the debt was uncollectable, as their principal, the administrator, would have to prove that the debt of a third person was not collectable.

In Buckel v. Smith (1904) 26 Ky. L. Rep. 991, 82 S. W. 1001, wherein it was sought to charge the surety on the bond of the administrator with a debt which the latter owed the estate of his intestate at the time of his appointment, the court returned the case to the chancellor for him to consider and weigh the evidence that might be adduced as to the administrator's solvency, saying that the sureties did not undertake more than that the principal would diligently and honestly do what could be done in the administration of the estate committed to him.

In Hickman v. Kamp (1867) 3 Bush (Ky.) 205, wherein it appeared that an administrator was indebted to his intestate's estate, the court held that where it appeared that the debtor-representative had sufficient property to pay the debt, it must be considered as collected, and as such it was covered by the bond of the administrator, and the surety thereon was liable for the failure of his principal to account for the debt.

Compare Kirby v. Moore (1907) 80 Ky. L. Rep. 1022, 99 S. W. 1156, an action against an administrator and the surety on his bond, wherein it appeared that the former was indebted to the decedent as the transferee of certain real estate notes, and that he failed to account for the debt in the final settlement of the estate. The court held that the defendants were liable on the bond, saying that where a debtor qualifies as the personal representative of his creditor, the debt becomes an asset of the estate, which is covered by the bond. This rule, however, was qualified in Costigan v. Kraus (1914) 158 Ky. 818, 166 S. W. 755, Ann. Cas. 1915D, 115, and Buckel v. Smith (Ky.) supra.

In Gay v. Grant (1888) 101 N. C. 206, 8 S. E. 99, 106, wherein it appeared that an administrator was indebted to his intestate and that he had ability to pay the debt, although he was insolvent in that his property was not subject to legal process, the court held that his official bond covered the debt owing to the decedent, and the sureties thereon were liable for the failure of their principal to account for the debt.

In Kealhofer v. Emmert (1894) 79 Md. 248, 29 Atl. 68, wherein it appeared that an administrator owed a certain sum to the decedent as indemnification for a former payment by her as a surety on his bond in a prior administration, the court held that the debt was of the character included in a statute (§§ 224 and 225 of article 93 of the Code) which required every administrator, when returning the list of debts due to the decedent, to include among them any just claim which the decedent had against him, and the court held, further, that the sureties on the bond were liable for the improper performance or nonperformance of the requirements of these statutory provisions, where it appeared that the administrator was solvent and able to pay.

So, in Linthicum v. Polk (1901) 93 Md. 84, 48 Atl. 842, the court held that, conceding that money withheld by an administratrix was only a debt owing to the estate of the decedent, she was required to account for the sum due as if it was so much money in her hands, and on failure her bond could be sued, provided it appeared that she was solvent and able to pay, the court saying that the statute protects the sureties if the administrator or executor is insolvent, or unable to pay his debts at the time of his qualification, but adding that his commissions are to be applied to the payment of the debt, and that if he is a distributee the amount due by him must be deducted.

57 Md. 240, wherein the court held that the legislature, in enacting § 224, article 93, of the Code, did not intend to open the door to the inquiry whether the executor had the means and ability to pay his debt owing to the decedent, but by express words declared the bond responsible for the debt of the executor; and the sureties, when they entered into the bond, must be held to have assumed such responsibility.

In Re Piper (1850) 15 Pa. 533, it was held that where an administrator was the debtor of the decedent, and was able to pay but failed to do so, the sureties on his bond were liable, for the bond covered the obligation to account for the debt and use vigilance and diligence in pursuing and collecting the same, in like manner as in collecting the debt of a third person. The court said: "There is no inclination in this court to extend the liability of the sureties of an administrator by construction, or make them chargeable beyond the terms of their bond for the default of their principal. As the trust of administering is the voluntary act of the party who elects to do it, it is the wise policy of the law, in order to secure a faithful administration of the assets, to enjoin vigilance, attention, and fidelity on the part of the administrator, and to require that he shall give bond with approved sureties, who are responsible to all interested for the attention and fidelity required by law. This bond is not a matter of form, and if the administrator has not faithfully accounted for the goods and chattels, etc., of the decedent, in his hands to be administered, the responsibility with its consequences must fall on the sureties, if the administrator fails to account and pay. In considering the question of liability under this administration, it is as favorable to the sureties as the court can allow, to give them all the advantage of showing now the insolvency and inability of the administrator to pay any part of his indebtedness to the estate of the decedent, to the same extent as might have been shown had he returned this liability in his inventory and presented it in his account, asking a credit for it, to the protection of his sureties, by reason of his total inability to pay."

In Garber v. Com. (1847) 7 Pa. 265, the court held that an administrator who owed a personal debt to the estate of the decedent could show his insolvency and inability to pay the same, for the purpose of discharging the sureties on his bond.

So, in Bard's Estate (1903) 13 Pa. Dist. R. 552, the court held that the bond of an administrator did not cover an uncollectable claim owed by him to the estate, saying: "It does not necessarily follow that 'an insolvent debtor-administrator shall be surcharged with the amount of his obligation, even if he attempt to conceal it. His conduct may be reprehensible, yet, if it was not possible to collect the debt from him, or for him to pay it, his bondsmen cannot be held. The measure of their responsibility is prescribed by the condition of the bond, which does not include the payment of uncollectable claims. As contended, the burden is clearly on those asking that the accountant be surcharged, to show that the amount owing can be or could have been collected.'" But if it appeared, and the facts so showed in the present case, that the debt could have been paid by the principal, the sureties were liable.

In Rader v. Yeargin (1887) 85 Tenn. 486, 3 S. W. 178, the court held that the bond of an administrator did not cover a personal debt owing by him to the decedent so as to impose a liability on the surety, except in so far as it guaranteed the proper performance by the administrator of his official duties, that is, that he would use the same degree of diligence in collecting his personal debt as was imposed on him in collecting a debt from a third party.

2. Bond of executor.

In McCarty v. Frazer (1876) 62 Mo. 263, the court held that where it appeared that an executor, who was indebted to his testatrix, was insolvent, his debt could not be considered as money in hand so as to bind the sureties on his official bond, for by the statute (Wagner's Stat. § 18, p. 110) credit must be given the executor of an estate for all the debts charged in the inventory as due to the estate, if the court was satisfied that the debtor was insolvent.

In State ex rel. Welch v. Morrison (1912) 244 Mo. 193, 148 S. W. 907, wherein it appeared that the executors of an estate failed to account for debts owing by them to their intestate, the court held that, it appearing that the executors were solvent, the indebtedness due from them to the estate became assets in their hands, for which they and their sureties were liable.

Where it appeared that an executor owed a personal debt to the testator, the court held, in an action to charge the sureties on the executor's bond for the latter's failure to account for the debt, that the simple fact that a person became a surety on an executor's bond did not create a liability for a debt which the executor might owe personally to the estate, but where it appeared that the executor was solvent and able to pay the debt, then his failure so to do became a failure in the discharge of his duties, for which the sureties on his bond became liable. Rahe v. Jobusch (1915) 197 Ill. App. 200.

In Davenport v. Richards (1844) 16 Conn. 310, an action on the probate bond executed by executors, it appeared that one of the executors was indebted to the decedent on two promissory notes. The court held that, in the absence of a showing that the maker of the notes was insolvent, the sureties were liable for a failure to account for the debt, since the amount of the notes must be considered and treated as so much money in the hands of the debtor-executor and his co-executor.

In Costigan v. Kraus (1914) 158 Ky. 818, 166 S. W. 755, Ann. Cas. 1915D, 115, it was held that the surety on an executor's bond was not liable for the failure of the principal to account for a debt owing from him to the decedent, where it appeared that throughout the term of the executor's trust he was insolvent and unable to pay the debt.

In Baucus v. Barr (1887) 45 Hun (N. Y.) 582, affirmed in (1887) 107 N. Y. 624, 13 N. E. 939, the court held that the obligation imposed on an executor and covered by his bond was only that he should be faithful, honest, and diligent in the administration of the estate, and that the provisions of a statute (2 Rev. Stat. p. 84, § 18), to the effect that a debt owing from an executor to the testator should be treated as money in hand, were limited and governed by the ordinary obligation. So, where it appeared that at all times during his administration the executor was insolvent, the court held that the sureties on his bond were not liable for his failure to account for a debt owing from him to the estate, since under the bond they did not guarantee the payment of a personal debt owed by the principal to the decedent, but only guaranteed that he would diligently and faithfully obey all orders of the surrogate touching the administration of the estate.

In Re David (1904) 44 Misc. 337, 89 N. Y. Supp. 927, wherein it appeared that an executor, who owed money to the estate of his testator for a debt due the decedent during his lifetime, was at all times solvent and able to pay the same, but failed to do so, the court held that he and the sureties on his official bond were liable for an executor who owes a debt to his testator or intestate is chargeable with the same as for so much money in his hands, except where it clearly appears that he is insolvent and unable to pay.

In Spurlock v. Earles (1874) 8 Baxt. (Tenn.) 437, wherein it appeared that a testator appointed a debtor as his executor, the court held, on the failure of the debtor-executor to account for the amount of the debt, that the executor's bond imposed the obligation to perform all the duties required by law, which included the collection of all assets, and therefore the sureties on the bond were liable for the debt the same as for other debts due the estate, to the extent that the same could, with due and proper diligence, have been collected if it had been due from a third person.

See also Baucus v. Stover (1882) 89 N. Y. 1, wherein the court held that under a statute (2 Rev. Stat. 84, § 13) an executor was liable for a debt owing by him to his testator, as for so much money in hand, irrespective of his ability to pay the same, but queried whether the debt was covered by his bond so as to make the sureties liable.

In Wilson v. Rose (1828) 3 Cranch, C. C. 371, Fed. Cas. No. 17,831, it appeared that an executor failed to return, as one of the assets of an estate, a debt owing from him to the testator. The court held that since the Statute of Limitations had not run against the debt it was a valid asset which the executor was bound to give in, and having failed to do so his testamentary bond was liable. In that case the court did not discuss the question of the executor's solvency.

In Lyon v. Osgood (1886) 58 Vt. 707, 7 Atl. 5, the court held that an executor's bond did not cover a liability for failure on the part of the executor to pay a debt owing to his testator, where it appeared that the executor was insolvent, though the executor in his report treated his debt as available assets, saying: "If the executor is not chargeable with the debt as assets until he has received the money thereon, when not guilty of laches, he should not be held chargeable as regards the liability of his surety, for his own indebtedness, beyond his actual means or ability to pay; for only to that extent does he, by his appointment, receive money from himself belonging to the estate. His ability to pay his indebtedness is the extent of the assets in his hands upon his obligation to the deceased. The surety by signing the administration bond has aided him to get possession of assets from his indebtedness only to the extent of his ability to pay it; and he should not be held liable for a greater sum on such indebtedness, unless the executor, after his appointment, becomes able to meet and discharge a greater sum."

But in Probate Ct. v. Merriam (1836) 8 Vt. 234, the court held that it was the duty of a solvent executor to inventory and account for any indebtedness owed by him personally to the estate, and that his official bond covered his obligation to do so, upon default of which the sureties on the bond were liable. Although not expressly stated, the distinction between that case and Lyon v. Osgood (Vt.) supra, seems to be that in the Merriam Case the executor was solvent and able to account for his debt.

III. Minority rule.

a. Rule stated.

A minority of the American jurisdictions have followed and adopted the so-called "Massachusetts rule," to the effect that the bond of an executor or an administrator covers a debt owing from the representative to his testator or intestate, irrespective of his ability to pay the same. This rule seems based on the legal fiction that the appointment of a debtor as the personal representative of the deceased creditor operates as a payment of the debt, which becomes so much money in the hands of the administrator for the due accounting of which he and his sureties are liable.

Thus, the court said in McGaughey v. Jacoby (1896) 54 Ohio St. 498, 44 N. E. 231: "The indebtedness of the executor to the testator being regarded by the law as so much money in his hands, and assets in that form, with which he is chargeable in the administration of his trust, its proper application and distribution by him to the parties entitled thereto is a duty coming within the conditions of the bond which the executor is required to give, and for the performance of which the sureties undertake to be responsible; so that their liability for his failure to make faithful administration of that fund is within the express terms of their obligation."

In Stevens v. Gaylord (1814) 11 Mass. 256, an early case laying down and applying the so-called "Massachusetts rule," it was held that an administrator and his sureties in the administration bond were liable for the amount of a debt owed by the administrator to the decedent, in the same manner as if the personal representative had received it from any other debtor of the deceased, for when the debtor was appointed administrator it operated as a payment of the debt, and it became assets in the hands of the administrator, for the due accounting of which the sureties were liable. The court said: "It may be thought injurious to the sureties of the debtor that they should thus be made liable for a debt due from the administrator. To this it may be answered that, if such be the legal effect of the bond, it is presumed to have been contemplated by the parties at the time of executing it; and they cannot afterwards complain of the natural and legal consequence of their own voluntary act. But how is the condition of the sureties worse than if any other person had owed the same debt, and the administrator had released the debtor without receiving payment, or upon taking a note payable to himself for the amount? To examine this point a little further, let us suppose that an administrator, being a debtor to the intestate, after inserting his debt in the inventory, and bringing it into his account to the credit of the intestate's estate, should settle his account in the probate court, and that a decree should there be made for distributing the residue remaining in his hands on such account; if the administrator should become insolvent, or refuse to pay the balance, pursuant to the decree, and an action should be instituted on the part of the next of kin on the administration bond, would the sureties be exonerated because a part or the whole of that balance arose from a debt originally due from the administrator himself? They are obviously in no worse condition than if the administrator had received the like amount from any other debtor, and, after crediting it in his account, had become unable to pay. If it should be said that the representatives of a deceased administrator, under such circumstances, would be liable for the amount of his original debt, if not actually paid by him in the course of administration, . . . there seems to be no inconsistency in holding that the sureties are also liable on their bond for the same amount. The chance of such a future remedy ought not to deprive the creditors or next of kin of their resort to the sureties while the administrator is living, during all which time they have no other remedy."

In Winship v. Bass (1815) 12 Mass. 199, the court held that an executor's bond covered a debt owing by him to the principal, saying: "Executors and administrators are upon the same footing, both being trustees for the legatees or next of kin; unless, in the case of an executor, it should manifestly appear from the will itself that the testator intended him a benefit. As early as 1703, an act of the provincial legislature passed, in effect abolishing all distinction between an executor and an administrator, as to their interest in the estate of the deceased. By the Act of 1 & 2 Anne, chap. 5, § 1, it is provided that in wills where, after payment of debts and of any certain particular legacy or legacies, the residue or remainder of the estate is bequeathed generally to any one or more persons, other than the executors themselves, in every such case an inventory of the estate shall be presented upon oath, and no bond be accepted in lieu thereof; and the executors shall be liable to account as administrators are, by law, obliged to do; and a right of action is given to any residuary legatee against the executors. From the time of the passing of this act, whatever may have been the law of the country before, we apprehend that no debtor, appointed an executor, was, by such appointment, discharged of his debt, when there was a residuary legatee named in the will, and no notice taken of his debt. For, by that statute, he was to account in such case as an administrator would be holden to account; and there is no pretense that a debtor, by taking out letters of administration upon his deceased creditor's estate, can discharge himself of his debt. The remedy at law against him may be suspended during his administration, but will revive after it ceases; and, indeed, he may be charged upon his administration bond as having received the amount of his debt. For, having voluntarily assumed the trust, which prevents any other from receiving and being unable to sue himself, he shall be considered as having paid the debt, and as holding the amount in his hands as administrator."

See also Kinney v. Ensign (1836) 18 Pick. (Mass.) 236, wherein the court stated by way of dictum the theory of the "Massachusetts rule" in the following form: "The taking of administration by the debtor is not in fact or in law, to all purposes, payment of the debt; as between the administrator himself, and those beneficially interested in the estate, he is held to account for it as a debt paid, from convenience and necessity, because the administrator cannot sue himself, and cannot collect his own debt in any other mode than by crediting it in his administration account. On technical grounds, as well as on considerations of policy, an administrator is not permitted to show that he could not collect a debt due from himself."

So, in Ipswich Mfg. Co. v. Story (1842) 5 Met. (Mass.) 813, wherein the court, although not expressly holding or discussing the liability under an executor's or administrator's bond for the payment of a personal debt owed the decedent, stated the theory of the minority rule as follows: "It is not now necessary to consider the old rule that a testator, by making a debtor his executor, released his debt. That rule has been qualified to a great extent in England, and has never been in force here. It is now understood that when an executor or administrator was indebted to his testator or intestate at the time of his decease, although the right of action cannot exist, because a man cannot sue himself, yet the debt is not considered as extinguished in any way, but rather to be accounted for as paid. In other words, the debt becomes, prima facie, assets in the hands of the administrator or executor, to be accounted for and adjusted in probate account as assets actually realized. . . . It proceeds upon the ground that, when the same hand is to pay and receive money, that which the law requires to be done shall be deemed to be done, and therefore that such debt due from the administrator shall be assets de facto, to be accounted for in probate account. Such presumption would arise from the mere taking of administration."

b. Application of rule.

1. Bond of administrator.

In Choate v. Thorndike (1885) 138 Mass. 371, wherein it appeared that an administrator de bonis non was formerly a surety on a probate bond of the administratrix of the same estate, who was removed for her failure to account, the court held that the administrator's liability on his bond for the former administratrix became a debt owing by him to the estate, which was covered by his present bond; and the sureties thereon were liable for his failure to charge himself with the debt.

In Dorger v. Woodward (1904) 27 Ohio C. C. 123, wherein it appeared that an administrator was indebted to his intestate, the court held, following McGaughey v. Jacoby (1896) 54 Ohio St. 487, infra, that the amount of the debt became assets in the hands of the administrator, and as such was covered by the bond on which his surety was liable, regardless of the principal's solvency or insolvency. To the same effect, see James v. West (1902) 67 Ohio St. 28, 65 N. E. 156; Perkins v. Scott (1895) 9 Ohio C. C. 207, 6 Ohio C. D. 226. But in Campbell v. Johnson (1885) 41 Ohio St. 588, wherein the court held that the general rule adopted in Ohio, that the debt of an administrator is not released by his appointment but becomes assets in his hands, and as such is covered by the administration bond, did not apply where it appeared that the administrator and the sole beneficiary of an estate conspired to make the surety responsible for a worthless claim.

And compare McCoy v. Allen (1895) 9 Ohio C. C. 607, 6 Ohio C. D. 659, wherein the court held that where the administrator was insolvent at the time of his appointment, neither he nor the sureties on his bond should be charged with the amount of an uncollected debt owed by him to the decedent.

In the case of Re Marks (1916) 81 Or. 632, 160 Pac. 540, the court held that where it appeared that an administrator owed a debt to his intestate the debt would be considered and treated as so much money in his hands on his appointment, and as such was covered by the official bond on which his sureties were liable.

In Jacobs v. Woodside (1876) 6 S. C. 490, the court held that the debt of an administrator to the decedent was not extinguished by his appointment, but became money in hand for the due accounting of which the sureties on the official bond were liable, saying: "The executor or administrator, thus combining in himself the character both of debtor and creditor, thereby preventing all remedy for the recovery of his debt to the estate, which in law he alone represents, so far from being discharged or released by the mere act of his appointment, or the grant of letters testamentary or of administration, is regarded as holding the amount as cash in his hand, as the other effects of the decedent, subject to a due course of administration. His relation to the debt is changed by the very nature of his office. He cannot occupy a position which, on the one hand, would impose upon him the obligations of a debtor, while on the other it would entitle him to the rights of a creditor. To prevent the loss which might otherwise follow from the complete suspension of the remedy, the debt must be regarded as assets either in the hands of the administrator or the executor, and the bond of the former, in his case, will stand as its security."

In Twitty v. Houser (1876) 7 S. C. 153, wherein it appeared that an administrator was indebted to his intestate on a promissory note given during the latter's lifetime, the court held that the bond of the sureties covered the debt regardless of the principal's ability to pay.

And see Purdum v. Tipton (1846) 9 Ala. 914, wherein the court, although not discussing the liability of a surety on an administration bond, held that the administrator, on the settlement of his accounts, was chargeable with a debt due from himself to the decedent, although it appeared that he was insolvent.

In Norris v. Towle (1874) 54 N. H. 290, the court left the question open whether the insolvency of a debtor-administrator would discharge the liability of his sureties for the debt.

2. Bond of executor.

In Wright v. Lang (1880) 66 Ala. 389, wherein it appeared that an executor failed to account in his final settlement for certain notes made by him, payable to his testator, and it appeared further that the notes were worthless because of the insolvency of the maker, the court held that the sureties on the executor's bond were liable, since the bond covered the debt; the law presuming, on the appointment of the debtor as executor, the instantaneous payment of the debt, making it an asset in the executor's hands for which the sureties were liable.

In Leland v. Felton (1861) 1 Allen (Mass.) 531, wherein it appeared that an executor named in a will was indebted to his testator, and in an account rendered in the probate court he did not charge himself with the debt, the court held that the executor and the sureties on his bond were liable for the amount of the debt. The court held, further, that the alleged fact that the executor was insolvent was no legal defense, saying: "Having taken the office, and thereby placed himself in the position of executor, and so continued for this length of time, it is no answer now to charging his indebtedness in his account of administration that, if payment of all his other debts had been enforced, as well as this, he would have been unable to meet them."

Where it appeared that an executor sold certain real estate of his testator in order to pay debts and legacies, and in the petition to secure leave to sell he failed to include a debt owing from himself to the decedent, the court held that the sale was a breach of his bond for the faithful administration of the estate, since his personal debt to the testator became assets in his hands, covered by the bond, for which he and his sureties were responsible in like manner as if he had received it from any other debtor of the deceased. Chapin v. Waters (1872) 110 Mass. 195.

And in Bassett v. Fidelity & D. Co. (1904) 184 Mass. 210, 100 Am. St. Rep. 552, 68 N. E. 205, wherein it appeared that an executor was a member of a firm which owed a debt to his testator, the court held that the executor's bond covered the debt, and the sureties thereon were liable for the failure of their principal to account for the same, although during the period of his trust both he and the firm were insolvent, saying: "An executor or administrator is appointed for the sole purpose of enforcing, in behalf of those interested in the estate, the rights of the estate against others. When the estate has a claim against the executor or administrator himself, he is incapacitated from performing that duty and taking to himself that office. For that reason, on broad principles of policy, it was laid down by the common law of England that he must yield all controversy as to the debt due from himself, and treat it as an asset of the estate. No one is bound to accept the office, and if he elects to do so he thereby tacitly assents to this condition."

In Judge of Probate v. Sulloway (1896) 68 N. H. 511, 49 L.R.A. 347, 73 Am. St. Rep. 619, 44 Atl. 720, wherein it appeared that a testator appointed his debtor as executor, and the latter, throughout his period of trust, was insolvent and unable to pay the debt, the court held that the defendants as sureties on his official bond were liable for the amount of the debt, for by the statute (§ 7, Act of July 2, 1822), which abolished the old common-law rule that the appointment of a debtor as executor extinguished the debt, all debts due from an executor or administrator became assets in hand, for which he was accountable regardless of his ability or inability to pay.

Where an executor was indebted to his testator and it appeared that he failed to account for the debt, being insolvent throughout the term of his trust, it was held that the debt became assets with which the executor was chargeable, and at its maturity was treated as paid, and thereafter as so much money in hand, for the faithful administration and distribution of which the sureties on the executor's bond were responsible. The court applied a statute (Rev. Stat. § 6069) providing as follows: "The naming of any person executor in a will shall not operate as a discharge or bequest of any just claim which the testator had against such executor; but such claim shall be included among the credits and effects of the deceased in the inventory, and the executor shall be liable for the same as for so much money in his hands at the time such debt or demand becomes due; and he shall apply and distribute the same in payment of debts and legacies, and among the next of kin, as part of the personal estate of the deceased." McGaughey v. Jacoby (1896) 54 Ohio St. 487, 44 N. E. 231.

See to the same effect, Cheney v. Powell (1900) 20 Ohio C. C. 398, 11 Ohio C. D. 279.

In United Brethren First Church v. Akin (1904) 45 Or. 247, 66 L.R.A. 654, 77 Pac. 748, 2 Ann. Cas. 353, an action against an executor and the sureties on his official bond, it appeared that the executor was indebted to his testator during the latter's lifetime. The court held that under a statute (B. & C. Comp. Stat. § 1144) the executor was chargeable with the debt as for so much money in his hands, and for the proper and due payment and distribution of this money the sureties were liable.

IV. Rule in California.

In California, the majority rule is applied by the courts to the bonds of administrators, while the minority rule has been, under the provisions of a statute (Cal. Code, § 1447) applied to the bond of an executor. Treweek v. Howard (1895) 105 Cal. 434, 39 Pac. 20; Re Walker (1899) 125 Cal. 242, 73 Am. St. Rep. 40, 57 Pac. 991; Sanchez v. Forster (1901) 133 Cal. 614, 65 Pac. 1077.

Thus, the court held in Sanchez v. Forster, supra, that the liability of the sureties on the bond of an administrator for a debt owing by the latter to the decedent depended on whether the debt remained uncollected through the fault of the representative; that is, if the administrator, during his administration of the estate, had the financial ability to pay the debt and failed to do so, the sureties were liable under the bond. The court held, further, that the contrary rule laid down in Treweek v. Howard, supra, abstracted infra, was induced by a statute (Code Civ. Proc. § 1447) which imposed the restrictions therein stated only as to executors, and did not apply to administrators.

In the case of Re Walker (1899) 125 Cal. 242, 73 Am. St. Rep. 40, 57 Pac. 991, a proceeding to settle the final account of an administrator, wherein it appeared that the representative of the decedent was indebted to the latter, and the debt owing had remained uncollected, the court held that, under the general rule, the debt became money in hand on the appointment of the debtor as administrator, and he and his sureties were chargeable with the same, but that the rule, being a legal fiction, must be strictly limited so as not to cause injustice, saying: "The appellant admits that the general rule is that the administrator is to be charged with a debt due from him to the estate as money on hand, but contends that he may show,—at least, on his final settlement,—that he has never at any time, while administrator, had the means to enable him to pay the debt or any part thereof. Further than this, unquestionably, the contention could not logically go, since, as he cannot sue himself, and yet it is his duty to collect the debt for the estate, he must be held officially liable for any money he could have so applied at any time during his official term. If he has not so applied it, he has not faithfully executed the duties of his trust according to law, and his sureties may also be held, for it is so nominated in the bond. But in this case it stands, for the purposes of this appeal, admitted that the administrator has at no time during his term had one dollar which he could have so applied; and the decree finds and adjudges that he has something over ten thousand dollars in cash on hand, which decree renders him liable to be imprisoned for contempt for not paying over as directed, and perhaps liable to prosecution for embezzlement, and constitutes an estoppel against his bondsmen, who will in consequence be required to pay money to the estate which has not been lost by the administrator, and which otherwise the estate would never have received. They have not only become liable for the faithful discharge of his duties, which is all they expressly undertook, but also that the administrator is solvent and will pay his indebtedness to the estate. In other words, they are held liable, although the administrator has in fact faithfully performed the duties of his trust according to law, because of a fiction of the law that money due from such an administrator shall, as against him, be deemed money in hand. All fictions of the law, we have been taught, were created to enable the court to do justice, and where to indulge a fiction is to cause injustice, its just limit has been found. "In fictione juris semper acquitas existit."

In Treweek v. Howard (1895) 105 Cal. 434, 39 Pac. 20, an action against an executor and the sureties on his official bond, it appeared that the executor was indebted to the decedent during his lifetime for a certain sum of money, and failed, in making his final report, to account for this debt. The California Code (§ 1447) provides as follows: "The naming of a person as executor does not thereby discharge him from any just claim which the testator has against him, but the claim must be included in the inventory, and the executor is liable for the same, as for so much money in his hands, when the debt or demand becomes due." Under that act it was held that the debt, on the appointment of the debtor as executor, became money in the hands of the executor, and, as such, was a part of the estate covered by the bond on which the sureties became liable.

In the case of Re Walker, supra, the court said that while the holding in Treweek v. Howard, supra, was perhaps justified by the facts of that case, so far as it rested on the statute it was inconsistent with the decisions under the New York act from which the statute was taken.

KENESAW FREE BAPTIST CHURCH OF KENESAW, NEBRASKA,
v.

G. S. LATTIMER (G. S. LATIMER) et al., Appts.

(— Neb. —, 174 N. W. 296.)

1. When a church, strictly congregational or independent in its organization, is governed solely within itself, either by a majority of its membership or by such other local organism as it may have instituted for the purpose of ecclesiastical government, and holds property either by way of purchase or donation, with no other specific trust attached to it than that it is for the use of that church, the numerical majority of the membership of the church may ordinarily control the right to the use and title of its property.

2. Such local church may sever its ecclesiastical connection and still be entitled to control the temporalities of the church, where such change does not involve any diversion of the property from the original trust. In such case the civil courts will only inquire as to who constitute the religious society and its legitimate successors, and award to them the use of the property, and will not ordinarily, in case of a schism in the organization, inquire into the existing religious opinion of those who adhere to the original local organization.

— obligation to establish corporate capacity.

3. A religious society is not bound to establish its corporate capacity in order to maintain an action to quiet title to the church property against trustees who are threatening to interfere therewith.

Headnotes 1 and 2, by CORNISH, J.

APPEAL by defendants from a decree of the District Court for Adams County (Dorsey, J.) in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to quiet title to certain church property. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Mr. Hugh La Master, for appellants:

No proof of the corporate character of the plaintiff having been offered, and its corporate character having been expressly denied, the action should have been dismissed.

Where a church is established in accordance with the faith and polity of a certain denomination, the property becomes impressed with a trust character, and the courts will protect such trust and not allow the property to be diverted to another and different organization having different beliefs and a different organization.

When a church, strictly congregational or independent in its organization, is governed solely within itself, either by a majority of its membership or by such other local organism as it may have instituted for the purpose of ecclesiastical government, and holds property either by way of purchase or donation, with no other specific trust attached to it than that it is for the use of that congregation, the numerical majority of the membership of that church can and will control the right to the use and title of said property.

Lawson v. Kolbenson, 61 Ill. 405; Schradi v. Dornfeld, 52 Minn. 465, 55 N. W. 49.

Cornish, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Appeal by defendants from a decree quieting title in the plaintiff to certain church property held by them as trustees, and enjoining them from interference therewith. In 1883-84 when funds were raised and the church building erected, the Freewill Baptist denomination at Kenesaw was an independent governing body, owing no obedience to any higher authority. Quarterly meetings, composed of delegates from two or more local churches, could admonish a church when, in its opinion, it became an alien to the faith and practices of the denomination. It could determine whether the church was worthy of its fellowship or not. A local church, being independent, had the right to withdraw from the quarterly meeting and to join another evangelical denomination. This body would send delegates to the yearly meeting, which body sustained about the same relation to the quarterly meeting that the quarterly meeting did to the local church. Still higher was the General Conference, a national organization, which aimed to consolidate the body, harmonize its different parts, and produce unity of sentiment and discipline. Its powers, too, were only admonitory.

In the nine articles of the constitution of the local church it was provided that its trustees should provide for purchasing, selling, insuring, and caring for its property, and amongst others a provision as follows: "Other matters shall come under the rulings of General Conference."

In October, 1883, the General Conference appropriated $200 for erecting a house of worship at Kenesaw. The remainder of the $1,503.18, required to erect the church, was pledged without condition for the building of the church by local contributions of the citizens of Kenesaw before the church was organized. At the time of the completion of the church, $400 was owing, which the church assumed and paid.

At this time one Rev. A. D. Williams acted as church clerk, was its first pastor, and the active person in procuring the church fund. He was also chairman and one of the five members of the executive committee of the Nebraska Yearly Meeting, a corporation, to whom the property was deeded, "in trust for the Freewill Baptist Church of Kenesaw, Nebraska." This executive committee was created "to be a board of missions and church extension, to secure, hold, use, and convey funds, in money, houses, or lands, for the propagation of the gospel," etc. It was named a "System of Co-operation," organized in part to hold title in trust "for the churches or purposes for which it was secured," in cases where it had afforded aid. It would seem that the fund raised was pledged before the creation of this executive committee and co-operative system; but from the time Mr. Williams became its chairman, January 21, 1884, the committee, through him, may be said to have given aid in the construction of the building. Later the congregation built and paid for a parsonage upon the church grounds.

Years afterwards, by concerted action of the national organizations of the Freewill and Missionary Baptists, it was determined that there was no such difference in their denominations as to require their continued separation, and a basis of union was agreed upon and approved by the General Conference of Freewill Baptists. Twenty-eight constituent bodies of the General Conference, representing 44,481 members, approved, and five bodies, representing 1,721, disapproved, of the basis of union. Among those disapproving was the Nebraska Yearly Meeting. The plaintiff church, however, approved of the action taken. Afterwards the Nebraska Yearly Meeting organized another General Conference, and in 1915 refused recognition of delegates from the plaintiff church, on the grounds that it had taken itself out of the denomination. It also refused to deed the church property to the plaintiff, and would seem to claim the right, if in its judgment it seems proper, to hold the property for the uses of another congregation, conforming to the present views of the Nebraska Yearly Meeting. It should be added that the plaintiff represents every member of the present congregation at Kenesaw, so that what might be considered as the individual right of a member of the church is not involved.

The question is whether the members of the local church, as an independent body, can control the right to the use and title of the church property, in spite of the fact that the system of co-operation governing the executive committee provides that it shall be the judge whether the church has taken itself out of the denomination, or has become extinct, and when and in what way the property shall be disposed of for the purposes for which it was secured.

Disputes of this character have been classified as follows: First, cases where the property has been by the deed or will of the donor, or other instrument, by which the property is held, by the express terms of the instrument devoted to the teaching, support, or spread of some specific form of religious doctrine or belief; second, cases where the property is held by a religious congregation, which by the nature of its organization is strictly independent of other ecclesiastical associations, and, so far as church government is concerned, owes no fealty or obligation to any higher authority; third, cases where the religious congregation or ecclesiastical body holding the property is but a subordinate member of some general church organization in which there are superior ecclesiastical tribunals, with a general and ultimate power of control, more or less complete, in some supreme judicatory over the whole membership of that general organization. It will be remembered that the trust created in the deed in controversy was "for the Freewill Baptist Church of Kenesaw, Nebraska."

No doubt individuals may dedicate their property for the propagation of a definite religious doctrine or belief, so long as it violates no law or morality, in which case the property cannot be diverted from its special purpose. When, however, as in the instant case, property is given to a church which is a strictly congregational or independent organization, governed solely within itself, with no specific trust attached, other than that it is given for church purposes, the case is different. In such case the ordinary contributor to a particular church regards it as a living organism, subject to change and growth. He would not attach conditions to the contrary, if he could. So long as it continues by regular succession, retaining its identity as the church to which the donation was made, he will not complain, even though there are changes of doctrine or method which do not amount to an abandonment of the original purpose. This was the attitude of the Yearly Meeting. It has thought itself free not to follow the action of the General Conference.

The defendants contend that differences exist between the old organization and the union touching freedom of the will, general atonement, open communion, and perseverance of the saints. We will not go into a discussion concerning the extent of these differences. We do not believe that they are of such a character as to show an intention, on the part of the governing body of the local church, to violate its implied trust and abandon the purposes for which the church was organized. We do not believe that the local church, in following the recommendations of the General Conference, have acted outside of their own rights or violated any of the rights of the executive committee. No member of the local congregation complains. The general rule appears to be that, when a majority section of the church, independent in government, voluntarily followed the action of the General Conference, which resulted in severing its connection with the Yearly Meeting, it did not thereby lose its identity, and is entitled to control the temporalities of the church; such change not involving any diversion of the property from the original trust.

We are of opinion that the congregation of the Kenesaw Freewill Baptist Church are entitled to have their property in the hands of those who are in accord with their purposes, and who do not deny them the right to take the step which they have taken in their church affiliations.

Error is assigned that plaintiff failed to prove its corporate character and that such failure must defeat its action. We are of opinion that under the circumstances of this case the plaintiff was not required to either plead or prove its corporate character. For cases bearing upon questions discussed, see Mack v. Kime, 129 Ga. 1, 24 L.R.A. (N.S.) 675, 58 S. E.

NOTE

The general subject of the determination by the civil courts of property rights as between contending factions of an independent or congregational church is discussed in the annotation following BAPTIST CITY MISSION SOC. v. PEOPLE'S TABERNACLE CONG. CHURCH, post, 105. The question involved in the reported case (KENESAW FREE BAPTIST CHURCH v. LATTIMER, ante, 98) as to the right to withdraw from a voluntary ecclesiastical connection is discussed in subdivision VII. of that note. It will be observed that the reported case differs from most of the cases in that subdivision in that there was no dissenting faction of the local society.

ERROR to the District Court for the City and County of Denver (Perry, J.) to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to cancel an alleged deed of its property to the defendant society. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Henry E. May and Henry B. Babb for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. Thomas H. Hood and Murray & Ingersoll, for defendant in error:

The majority of the membership of a Congregational church has no right to give away the whole, or any part, of that church's property over the protest of a minority of its membership.

Hill, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This controversy is between two religious corporations representing different religious denominations. It involves the ownership of what is called the People's Tabernacle in the city of Denver. It appears that in 1884 the defendant in error was organized as the People's Tabernacle Congregational Church of Denver, and thus continued up to the time of this controversy. As per its name and articles of faith, it was understood to be what is termed a Congregational church or society. It affiliated with the others of that denomination, and for a great many years received funds from the Congregational Home Missionary Society. In 1900 it acquired the land in controversy and erected a church edifice thereon. The funds received for the purchase of other lots and buildings formerly owned by this society, as well as for these lots, and the construction of the building thereon, were secured, some from its members, but principally by public donations through the efforts of its former pastor, Rev. T. A. Uzzell, who devoted over a quarter of a century to the work carried on by this organization. There is testimony tending to show that, while many of those who made the largest contributions thus gave to him at his solicitation upon account of their appreciation of his work and their confidence in him, without regard to the denominational character of his church, and without any strings upon it, that is, as to how he or the organization was to use it, it was likewise shown that during the period in which practically all these funds were raised he was generally known and understood to be a Congregational minister, and that his church, while somewhat on the missionary order, was likewise recognized and understood to be a Congregational church. The record further discloses that under his pastorship the church or mission prospered and did much good in its community, and that at the time of his death, 1910, it was in a prosperous and healthy condition, both spiritually and financially, that it then had about $1,700 in its treasury, that the church property was of a value of about $50,000 and was clear of encumbrance.

The record discloses that, after Parson Uzzell passed away, dissension arose among the membership of the church, occasioned apparently by inability to raise money, with the result that thereafter, at a meeting purported to be called for that purpose and by a vote of the membership present, being sixty-four for, and fifty-eight against, a deed was authorized to be executed for the property to the Baptist City Mission Society, which it is conceded is a part of the religious organization known as the Baptist denomination. This deed contains certain conditions. One was that the Baptist societies would pay all the debts of the Tabernacle Church, which then had reached about $700, and also a special improvement tax against the property of about $1,700. Other clauses provided for membership under certain conditions of the members of the church in the Baptist society. It also, under certain conditions, permitted a resale of the property. The result of its conditions as a whole permitted of its entire future control by the Baptist Church and of that creed and faith. Protests were made by many of the minority who were present at the meeting. Later eighty-two members of the church signed a written protest. This was ignored, the conveyance made, possession given, and the property turned over to the new organization. This suit was brought to have the deed declared void, for its cancellation, etc. Trial was to the court, which found that the attempted transfer was a diversion of the temporalities of the said defendant in error church, and was in violation of the trust under and by virtue of which said temporalities were held, and a breach of duty on the part of those attempting to execute said deed, for which reason it was ordered canceled, etc.

The defendant in error urges many irregularities in the proceedings leading up to the execution of the deed, and lack of performance with its conditions, which its counsel contend are alone sufficient to have the transaction set aside. As we view it, these matters need not be gone into; but assuming, without so holding, that they were regular and sufficient in the respects complained of, the question then to be determined is: Can a majority of those present, at a meeting called for that purpose, order the execution of a deed to their church property to another denomination practically without consideration, thereby leaving their own church society without any church edifice or other place within which to worship, and where the result of the transaction makes it practically a gift of the property from one denomination to another, leaving the grantor organization with nothing for its members to do but to go into the other denomination, disperse, or again raise money with which to rent or buy another edifice within which to carry on its worship. In other words, can a majority only of those present at a meeting (although called for that purpose) of a church organization of one denomination turn its temporalities over to another denomination for the use and benefit of the latter denomination as here attempted? The trial court was of opinion that it could not be thus accomplished. We are in accord with this conclusion, <sup>Religious societies—power to convey property.</sup> which is supported by the great weight of authority. Marien v. Evangelical Creed Cong. Church, 132 Wis. 650, 113 N. W. 66; Roshi's Appeal, 69 Pa. 463, 8 Am. Rep. 275; *Smith v. While it is true that the language in the deeds from the original grantors to the defendant in error for the lots in controversy does not contain a declaration pertaining to the use or the purposes for which they were secured, it is clearly shown that they were secured for these uses, and were being used <sup>Evidence—purpose of deed.</sup> for these purposes, and not otherwise. In such cases the weight of authority is that, when not set out in the deed, the purposes for which they were secured and being used can be otherwise shown to exist. Landrith v. Hudgins, 121 Tenn. 556, 120 S. W. 783; Lindstrom v. Tell, 131 Minn. 203, 154 N. W. 969; Smith v. Pedigo, 145 Ind. 361, 19 L.R.A. 433, 32 L.R.A. 838, 33 N. E. 777, 44 N. E. 363; Franke v. Mann, 106 Wis. 118, 48 L.R.A. 856, 81 N. W. 1014; Hale v. Everett, 53 N. H. 9, 16 Am. Rep. 82.

The plaintiff in error cites numerous cases disclosing contentions between majority and minority stockholders of private corporations to sustain its position. They have no application to cases of this kind where the denominational character of the churches or societies must, of necessity, enter into the controversy. Any argument which seeks to evade or get around this fact is not applicable to this controversy. The judgment is affirmed.

ANNOTATION.

Determination by the civil courts of property rights between contending factions of an independent or congregational church.

- III. General rule of majority control, 108.
- IV. Necessity of formal action, 110.
- V. Decision of council, 110.

I. In general.

This note, as indicated by its title, is confined to cases where a schism or division has arisen within an independent religious society as a result of which the title to, or control of, the property of the society has become involved in litigation in the civil courts.

It is to be observed at the outset, as said in Stallings v. Finney (1919) 287 Ill. 145, 122 N. E. 369, and in substance in many other cases, both within and without the scope of this annotation, that "courts have no power to pass upon questions of differences between contending factions of a church society unless civil or property rights are involved. They will not interfere to control the exercise of ecclesiastical authority not violative of a civil or property right."

- b. Change of denominational relations or fundamental doctrines, 113.
- VII. Withdrawal from a voluntary ecclesiastical connection, 123.
- VIII. Adhering to voluntary ecclesiastical connection, 129.
- IX. Effect of incorporation, 130.
- X. Divided use, 132.

the only questions which the civil courts are authorized to determine are those affecting property rights. In such controversies, ecclesiastical or doctrinal questions will only be inquired into so far as may be necessary to determine the property rights of the parties."

The principle is, of course, applicable whether the society involved is independent in government or is but part of a general ecclesiastical body. A concrete illustration of the kind of questions which the principle excludes from the jurisdiction of the civil courts is afforded by Carter v. Papineau (1916) 222 Mass. 464, L.R.A. 1916D, 371, 111 N. E. 358, Ann. Cas. 1918C, 620, an action arising out of the exclusion of a member of the Protestant Episcopal Church from the communion table. The court said that in Massachusetts the rights of plaintiff as a communicant are not enforceable in the civil courts; and that it was unnecessary to determine whether, at common law, a member of the Church of England could sue if unjustifiably denied participation in the communion.

That the principle may in its operation withhold the hand of the civil court, even in case of flagrant violation of the law of the church, if no property right is involved, is well illustrated by the recent case of Gibson v. Singleton (1919) — Ga. —, 101 S. E. 178, where the Georgia supreme court declared that "a court of equity will not interfere with the internal affairs of a religious organization, when no property rights are involved, for the reason that civil courts have no jurisdiction of such matters, and cannot take jurisdiction of them, whether they had been adjudicated by the ecclesiastical courts or not;" and applied that principle by sustaining a demurrer to a petition to enjoin the pastor of an incorporated church from prescribing the payment of $1 as a condition of a right to vote for trustees, notwithstanding that the discipline of the church provided that every member twenty-one years of age and in full communion should have the right to vote, and notwithstanding the allegations of the petition to the effect that if the pastor were allowed to enforce the condition, he would effectually prevent from voting a large number of the members of the church. And the court added that allegations that the enforcement of such announcement of the pastor would result in an illegal and fraudulent election and be violative of the rules of the church and permit the pastor to enforce his own arbitrary will upon the members of the church for his own private and personal purposes would not confer jurisdiction.

Schisms or divisions within religious societies, however, frequently give rise to questions affecting property rights of which the civil courts do have jurisdiction.

In Watson v. Jones (1872) 13 Wall. (U. S.) 679, 20 L. ed. 666, generally accepted as the leading case on the subject, the court thus classifies the questions which come before the civil courts concerning the rights of property held by ecclesiastical bodies: "1.

The first of these is when the property which is the subject of controversy has been, by deed or will of the donor, or other instrument by which the property is held, by the express terms of the instrument, devoted to the teaching, support, or spread of some specific form of religious doctrine or belief.

"2. The second is when the property is held by a religious congregation which, by the nature of its organization, is strictly independent of other ecclesiastical associations, and, so far as church government is concerned, owes no fealty or obligation to any higher authority.

"3. The third is where the religious congregation or ecclesiastical body holding the property is but a subordinate member of some general church organization in which there are superior ecclesiastical tribunals with a general and ultimate power of control more or less complete in some supreme judicatory over the whole membership of that general organization."

The present annotation is not concerned with the third class, which was in fact the class involved in the Watson Case; nor with the first class, except so far as it includes cases which are also within the second class. (It will be observed that the first and second classes and the first and third classes are not mutually exclusive.)

II. Property subject to express trust.

As regards the first class, i. e., express trusts, the court in the Watson Case said: "In such case, if the trust is confided to a religious congregation of the independent or congregational form of church government, it is not in the power of the majority of that congregation, however preponderant, by reason of a change of views on religious subjects, to carry the property so confided to them to the support of new and conflicting doctrine."

This principle, with reference to property held by a congregational or independent society subject to an express and specific trust, is very generally conceded. For example, Lurton, J., in Nance v. Busby (1892) 91 Tenn. 303, 15 L.R.A. 801, 18 S. W. 874, said: "In the case of a definite trust for the maintenance of a particular faith or form of worship the court will even go so far as to prevent the diversion of the property by the action of the majority of the beneficiaries, and if there be a minority who adhere to the original principles, such minority will be held to comprise the exclusive beneficiaries, and entitled to the control and enjoyment of the property without interference by the unfaithful majority." Hence, if the property is held subject to an express and specific trust for the benefit of any particular denomination and for the support and propagation of any particular set of doctrines or tenets, the civil courts will prevent its diversion to any other denomination or any other set of doctrines or tenets, upon the complaint of a minority faction which remains true to the original purposes of the trust. See, in this connection, Sarver's Appeal (1874) 81 Pa. 183, infra, VII., and Rodgers v. Burnett (1901) 108 Tenn. 173, 65 S. W. 408, infra, VII.

The principle, of course, does not apply in case of an independent society if it is found that the majority faction—assuming that by the law of the society the majority rule prevails—has not departed from the doctrines or tenets protected by the trust.

Thus, in Bennett v. Morgan (1902) 112 Ky. 512, 16 S. W. 287, where the site of the church building was conveyed to commissioners of a primitive Baptist church and their successors, "holding forth the apostolic doctrine, to wit, personal election, predestination, baptism by immersion, etc.," a decree enjoining a minority faction, which believed in "absolute predestination," from interfering with the exclusive use of the church property by the majority, which believed in "limited predestination," was affirmed, upon the ground that by the weight of testimony both doctrines were taught in substance in churches in good standing in the associations of the Primitive Baptist Church, and there was no such unanimity of authority upon the subject as would justify the court in holding that there had been either by the majority or minority a departure from the faith as understood at the time the church property was conveyed for the purposes named in the deed. A Kentucky statute, which contemplates a division of the property in certain circumstances, was held inapplicable for reasons not within the scope of this annotation.

Even when there has been a perversion of an express trust by the persons in control of an independent society, the suit for relief may fail because the complainants do not have the status necessary to enable them to vindicate and protect the trust.

Thus, in Nance v. Busby (Tenn.) supra, it was held that excommunicated members of a purely congregational and independent church could not stand for and represent the members of the church in an action to prevent the diversion of the church property from its lawful uses under a conveyance of the property to the "Regular Primitive Baptist Church, at Nashville, of the old school, of which Elder Phillip Ball is the present pastor or minister, and their successors of the same faith and order, forever." And it was further held that the result was not affected by the fact that, under an erroneous construction of the usage and practice of the church, the excommunication was by a vote of the majority without notice to the accused of the charges against them or opportunity to vindicate themselves, the court taking the view that the excommunication was an act of the church which could not be reviewed or interfered with by the civil court. This decision was upon the assumption that, prior at least to the expulsion of the minority faction by majority faction, there had been no abandonment of the original faith and practice by the majority.

So, in Shannon v. Frost (1842) 3 B. Mon. (Ky.) 253, it was held that excommunicated members of a Baptist church have no such interest therein as will authorize them to maintain a suit in relation to the church property.

In this connection, however, though the case is not within the scope of the note, since no schism was involved, attention is called to Hendryx v. Peo- ple's United Church (1906) 42 Wash. 336, 4 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1154, 84 Pac. 1123, 7 Ann. Cas. 764, holding that equity would aid a member of a church who had been expelled for the fraudulent purpose of devoting the church property to purposes entirely foreign to that of the church organization, to preserve the trust property, notwithstanding the rules of the organization permit the expulsion of members without formal trial.

In Predestinarian Baptist Church v. United States Baptist Church (1910) 139 Ky. 110, 129 S. W. 546, where the deed to the church property expressed a trust for the support of the "doctrine of predestination, particular redemption, total depravity, effectual calling, the certain perseverance of the saints, and believers in baptism by immersion," the court, without going into the question whether the majority faction had departed from the doctrines thus declared, refused relief to the successors of the minority faction upon the ground of laches, the suit not having been brought until nineteen years after the separation and withdrawal of the minority faction, none of whom was living at the time of the suit.

In Turpin v. Bagby (1897) 138 Mo. 7, 39 S. W. 455, where property was conveyed in trust while the church should be governed by the "rules, usages, and faith of the Missionary Baptist churches of the state of Missouri," it was held that the legal title to the property was vested in the trustees regularly appointed, and could not be divested by the vote of a small minority, acting independently, although they may alone of the entire membership truly represent and be governed by the "rules, usages, and faith of the Missionary Baptist churches of the state of Missouri," and notwithstanding that in consequence of the departure by the majority from such rules and faith the property may be diverted from the trust impressed upon it under the grant. Under this decision it is not apparent how the express trust to which the property was subject could be vindicated as against the action of the heretical majority.

III. General rule of majority control.

In the absence of a breach of trust, express or implied, the majority rule prevails in independent or congregational societies, so that in societies like those of the Congregational or Baptist denominations, which have no organic connection with any external ecclesiastical body, the will of the majority, when duly and regularly expressed through the appointed channels of the society, ordinarily prevails, not only when its effects are confined to the domain of purely religious, spiritual, or ecclesiastical concerns over which the civil courts have no jurisdiction, but also when its action or decision directly or indirectly affects civil or property rights over which the civil courts do have jurisdiction.

Wisconsin.—Lutheran Trifoldhged Cong. v. St. Paul's English E. L. Cong. (1914) 159 Wis. 56, 150 N. W. 190.

The principle is well formulated in the first syllabus by the court in KENESAW FREE BAPTIST CHURCH v. LATTIMER (reported herewith), though the opinion includes a clearer recognition that the principle is subject to the limitation that the action does not amount to an abandonment of the original purpose of the society.

The principle is recognized, expressly or impliedly, by most of the cases cited in this annotation, even by those which, like BAPTIST CITY MISSION SOC. v. PEOPLE'S TABERNACLE CONG. CHURCH (reported herewith) ante, 98, actually applied an exception. Doubtless, in the absence of facts upon which to base a charge that the majority have attempted to carry over the property to another denomination or otherwise to divert it from the support of the fundamental and characteristic doctrines or polity of the society, the principle is commonly acquiesced in without litigation. Hence, its potency for the settlement of the ordinary disputes and contentions among the members of independent societies is not adequately reflected in the cases cited in the annotation, which, for the most part, presented some color at least for the contention that the action of the majority was so heretical or revolutionary as to form an exception to the rule.

The application of the general principle by which the civil courts, in the absence of statute to the contrary, without inquiring into the merits of the controversy between the respective factions, accept and abide by the action of the majority when regularly taken, if there is no contention that such action involves a departure from fundamental doctrines of faith or practice, although property or civil rights are involved of which the civil courts have jurisdiction, is well illustrated by German E. L. Trinity Cong. v. Deutsche Evangelisch Lutherische Dreieinigkeits Gemeinde (1910) 246 Ill. 328, 92 N. W. 868, 20 Ann. Cas. 404, where the division grew out of the action of a majority in voting for the removal of the church building to a new site. The supreme court held that the meeting at which the vote was taken having been held and conducted in conformity with the provisions of the Constitution, a court of equity should not decree a partition of the property at the instance of the minority faction desiring to remain at the old site. And see for a similar case Le Blanc v. Lemaire (1901) 105 La. 539, 30 So. 135, supra.

So, in Lutheran Trifoldhged Cong. v. St. Paul's English E. L. Cong. (1914) 159 Wis. 56, 150 N. W. 190, the court upheld a sale of the church property by a majority faction against the protest of the minority, the sale having been authorized and ratified at meetings of which the members had actual notice, although the formal notice by the clergyman, contemplated by the rules of the society, was not given because he refused to read such a notice. In this instance, the constitution contained an express provision that in the event of a division the majority shall be considered as the proper congregation and shall keep the property unless the majority fails to remain true to the Lutheran faith, in which case the minority, provided that it remains true, shall be considered the proper congregation and keep the property. The court observed that both factions had remained true.

The applicability of the principle after the elimination of the exception is also illustrated by Tucker v. Paulk (1918) 148 Ga. 228, 96 S. E. 339, where the supreme court said in effect that, the trial court having found as a matter of fact and law that the majority faction of a Primitive Baptist church (an independent church) had not departed from the organization and doctrine of the church, it was beyond its power to inquire into or pass upon and control the decision of the majority respecting the moral and legal qualifications of the minister.

So, in Gewin v. Mt. Pilgrim Baptist Church (1909) 166 Ala. 345, 139 Am. St. Rep. 41, 51 So. 947, the decision was in favor of a majority faction of a Baptist church, congregational in polity, the division not having been on any question of religious doctrine or denominational practice. And in Tucker v. Denson (1918) — Ala. —, 80 So. 373, the court, without discussing the cause or nature of the division, decided in favor of the majority faction of a Baptist church.

So, in Mokn v. Little (1916) 122 Ark. 7, 182 S. W. 511, where the division in a Primitive Baptist church grew out of a controversy over the reinstatement of a former member who had been expelled, the decision was in favor of the majority faction, notwithstanding that a council of members of the denomination, upon which the two factions of the local church had called for advice, had decided that the merits of the original controversy were on the side of the minority faction. The court said, in effect, that the council, not being a judicial body, its action was not conclusive of any rights.

In Smith v. Charles (1899) — Miss. —, 24 So. 968, where the complaint filed by one faction of a Baptist church alleged that one of the defendants had been illegally elected pastor, and that the defendants in their attempt to foist him upon the church as its pastor had "abandoned the laws, faith, usages, and customs" of the church, and prayed that the defendants be enjoined from the use of the property until they shall have returned to the laws, faith, usages, and customs of the church, the supreme court merely declared that it concurred with the chancellor in dismissing the bill for want of jurisdiction.

IV. Necessity of formal action.

The general principle, previously stated, that the civil courts will abide by and give effect to the action or decision of the majority faction of an independent society so far as civil or property rights are concerned, doubtless presupposes some formal vote or action at a meeting called in substantial compliance with the rules of the society, or at least one which affords an opportunity for the membership of the society to be represented. None of the cases cited in this note appears to have determined the majority by a mere count of adherents of the respective factions as they are aligned in the action, without reference to some previous meeting of a more or less formal character. In Barton v. Fitzpatrick (1914) 187 Ala. 273, 65 So. 390, the court, speaking of an independent church, said: "Nor can the court have regard for the wishes of the majority unless expressed in valid form, and that a paper circulated among the members of the congregation, however numerous signed by them, cannot supply the place of a decision by the congregation acting as an organized body in conformity with the law and practice of the church." In that case, the meeting upon which defendants relied, at which it was assumed to elect two new officials, was found by the court not to have been so authorized or held as to afford the membership an opportunity to express their wishes.

The decision in Stogner v. Laird (1912) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 145 S. W. 645, in favor of the faction of a Baptist church represented by the defendant, was upon the ground that resolutions upon which the plaintiff faction based its right, even though they were adopted by a majority vote of the members then present, did not have the effect to divide the membership into two separate and distinct organizations, each claiming to be the church, and consequently the action subsequently taken by the defendant faction in rescinding the previous resolutions was the action of the church and binding upon the plaintiff faction.

V. Decision of council.

The decision of the ruling body of an association, whatever its name, with which an independent society is voluntarily, and not organically, connected, is advisory only, and not conclusive or binding upon the civil courts in the determination of property rights. Bouldin v. Alexander (1873) 15 Wall. 131, 21 L. ed. 69; Monk v. Little (1916)

122 Ark. 7, 182 S. W. 511; Smith v. Pedigo (1893) 145 Ind. 361, 19 L.R.A. 433, 32 L.R.A. 838, 33 N. E. 777, 44 N. E. 363; Ingleheart v. Rowe (1898) 20 Ky. L. Rep. 821, 47 S. W. 575; Pulis v. Iserman (1904) 71 N. J. L. 408, 58 Atl. 554; Gudmundson v. Thingvalla Lutheran Church (1915) 29 N. D. 291, 150 N. W. 750; Jarrell v. Sproles (1899) 20 Tex. Civ. App. 387, 49 S. W. 904, infra, VI. b.

In the Gudmundson Case, the majority were of the opinion that the ruling was of no effect and could not even be regarded as supporting the finding of the trial court to the effect that plenary inspiration of the Bible was a fundamental and characteristic doctrine of the denomination and the local society.

In Smith v. Pedigo (1893) 145 Ind. 361, 19 L.R.A. 433, 33 N. E. 777, the court was apparently inclined to the view that the decision of an association of Baptist churches to which both factions of a local church belonging to the association had submitted their claims was conclusive in the determination of property rights; but held that even if merely advisory, it was entitled to great weight with the courts on the question of religious doctrine, discipline, faith, and practice. On rehearing ((1893) 145 Ind. 361, 32 L.R.A. 838, 44 N. E. 363) the court conceded that the decisions of these ecclesiastical tribunals were not conclusive on the parties, according to the governmental polity of the church; but were nevertheless persuasive evidence on the question of doctrine out of which the schism arose. And to the same effect are Bouldin v. Alexander (U. S.) supra, and the Mt. Zion Baptist Church v. Whitmore (Iowa) infra, VI. b.

In Windham v. Ulmer (1912) 102 Miss. 491, 59 So. 810, however, involving a dispute over the church property between two factions of the "Union Seminary Baptist Church in Jasper County," a decision as to the use and occupancy of the church, made in regular conference assembled, by the "Union Seminary Baptist Church," having, as the court said, full authority under the Baptist polity, was held conclusive. If, as is apparently the case, the latter body was an association or conference of churches, the decision that its ruling would be binding upon the local church is opposed to the general view.

VI. Diversion of property from implied trust.

a. Generally.

The United States Supreme Court in the Watson Case (U. S.) supra, I. thus declares the principle which should govern the civil courts in the determination of property rights not subject to an express trust between contending factions of an independent or congregational church: "The second class of cases which we have described has reference to the case of a church of a strictly congregational or independent organization, governed solely within itself, either by a majority of its members, or by such other local organism as it may have instituted for the purpose of ecclesiastical government; and to property held by such a church, either by way of purchase or donation, with no other specific trust attached to it in the hands of the church than that it is for the use of that congregation as a religious society.

"In such cases, where there is a schism which leads to a separation into distinct and conflicting bodies, the rights of such bodies to the use of the property must be determined by the ordinary principles which govern voluntary associations. If the principle of government in such cases is that the majority rules, then the numerical majority of members must control the right to the use of the property. If there be within the congregation officers in whom are vested the powers of such control, then those who adhere to the acknowledged organism by which the body is governed are entitled to the use of the property. The minority, in choosing to separate themselves into a distinct body, and refusing to recognize the authority of the governing body, can claim no rights in the property from the fact that they had once been members of the church or congregation. This ruling admits of no inquiry into the existing religious opinions of those who comprise the legal or regular organization; for, if such was permitted, a very small minority, without any officers of the church among them, might be found to be the only faithful supporters of the religious dogmas of the founders of the church. There being no such trust imposed upon the property when purchased or given, the court will not imply one for the purpose of expelling from its use those who by regular succession and order constitute the church, because they may have changed in some respect their views of religious truth."

While the principles above quoted from the Watson Case undoubtedly furnish the general rules for the guidance of the civil courts in the determination of questions in relation to civil or property rights arising out of schisms or divisions within independent or congregational societies when no express trust is involved, they appear, when viewed in the light of actual decisions, to have been stated too broadly and without proper qualification, in that they do not make proper allowance for the possibility that the action of the majority—assuming that by the law of the society the majority rule prevails—may involve so wide a departure from the fundamental and characteristic beliefs or polity of the society that to give it effect as to property rights would involve a perversion of the property from the implied trust to which it is subject, and because they fail to recognize that in such case the real identity of the society is no longer lodged with the majority faction, but resides with the minority faction, which remains faithful to the fundamental and distinctive beliefs and polity of the society.

This limitation of the sweeping principles declared in the Watson Case is sanctioned not only by cases falling within the present note, but also by cases belonging to the third of the classes enumerated in that case, and so beyond the scope of the note. A notable instance is the decision by the House of Lords in General Assembly v. Overtoun [1904] A. C. (Eng.) 515,

It may be observed here that the right of the civil court to interfere in the circumstances above outlined involves, theoretically at least, no invasion of freedom of worship, since, however wide and clear the departure from fundamental beliefs or polity may be, the courts only interfere when, and to the extent that, civil or property rights are involved, and neither faction, whether in the majority or in the minority, will be disturbed by the civil courts so long as the dispute is confined in its effects to religious or ecclesiastical matters, and does not affect property or civil rights.

For example, in Mt. Zion Baptist Church v. Whitmore (1891) 83 Iowa, 138, 13 L.R.A. 198, 49 N. W. 81, where, as subsequently shown, the decision was in favor of a minority faction as against a majority faction, which was found to have departed from the fundamental doctrines of the church, the court said: "Let it be understood at the outset that we are not adjudicating the right of any person to a religious belief or practice, nor are we to determine the truth or falsity of the doctrine of 'sanctification,' or 'sinless perfection.'" So, in Park v. Chaplin (1895) 96 Iowa, 55, 31 L.R.A. 141, 59 Am. St. Rep. 353, 64 N. W. 674, the court, having decided in favor of the minority as against the majority faction of a Free Will Baptist church, observed: "Nothing we have said is to be construed to affect any right the defendant church has to withdraw, as a church, from the Free Baptist and to unite with the Baptist denomination; but the withdrawal, if carried out, must be so effected as not to change or cloud the title to the property in controversy."

When there is no avowed change of denominational relations, but a mere difference as to doctrine or polity, the question whether the general principle as laid down in the Watson Case, or the limitation above suggested, is to prevail, is often a difficult and delicate one. There is less difficulty when there is an avowed purpose on the part of the majority, or other governing body, of an independent or congregational society to divert the property to another denomination, or to the support of a system of doctrine radically opposed to the characteristic and distinctive doctrines of the original society. Though the case involved a society of the Presbyterian type and is therefore beyond the scope of the note, the following quotation from the opinion of Cobb, P. J., in Mack v. Kime (1907) 129 Ga. 1, 24 L.R.A. (N.S.) 688, 58 S. E. 184, suggests, perhaps, as clearly as it is possible to do in general language, the dividing line between cases where the action of the majority of the society is binding on the civil courts and cases where the civil courts will interfere to prevent the diversion of property from implied trusts: "If property is acquired by a Baptist church which, at the time of its organization, is teaching the doctrines of the Baptist faith as it is ordinarily understood, and thereafter a majority of the congregation should determine to dissolve the organization and unite with an ecclesiastical body which is teaching doctrines utterly antagonistic to what are commonly understood as the doctrines of the Baptist church, the civil courts would protect the minority, who adhere to the doctrines of the original organization, in their right to hold the property, even though such minority consisted of only one person. But if the question should arise in a Baptist congregation as to what is the doctrine of the Baptist church, and the difference should be such as that it was manifest that there could be, in the light of the history of the particular church and other churches of similar faith, doubt as to what was the true rule to be followed by a Baptist church, and the church tribunal, constituted according to the customs and usages of Baptist churches, should decide these differences, the civil courts would not attempt to interfere with the judgment of this tribunal determining the doctrinal differences between the members of the congregation."

In harmony with the first part of the above quotation from the Mack Case, supra, VI. a, it is established by the weight of authority that the majority faction of an independent or congregational society, however regular its action or procedure in other respects, may not, as against a faithful minority, divert the property of the society to another denomination or to the support of doctrines radically and fundamentally opposed to the characteristic doctrines of the society, even though the property is subject to no express and specific trust.

The principle is also supported by Atty. Gen. ex rel. Mander v. Pearson 3 Meriv. 409, 36 Eng. Reprint, 153, 17 Revised Rep. 100, though the facts of the case do not bring it within the scope of the note.

[While the rule above stated is but a specific application to independent societies of an exception—applicable also, when the necessity arises, to societies belonging to an ecclesiastical system—to the general principle which makes adherence to or sanction by the governing body of the church the criterion of property rights between contending factions, it is to be observed that in case of a local society organically connected with an ecclesiastical system, as in First Constitutional Presby. Church v. Congregational Soc. (1867) 23 Iowa, 567, for example, a decision in favor of a minority faction which adheres to the highest judiciary of that system and to the fundamental characteristic doctrines of the denomination lends no additional support to the rule above stated with regard to independent societies, since the result which in the latter case can only be reached by the aid of an exception to the general principle in the former case is but a specific application of the general principle itself. It is only when the court, upon the ground that the supreme governing body of a church of the Episcopal or Presbyterian type has itself departed from the fundamental doctrines or polity of the church, decides against a faction, whether in the majority or minority, of a local society, which adheres to or is sanctioned by that body, and in favor of a faction which is not recognized or sanctioned by it, that the decision can be legitimately invoked as an authority by a minority faction of an independent society. See further, as to the distinction, the opinion of the vice chancellor in Karoly v. Hungarian Reformed Church (1914) 83 N. J. Eq. 514, 91 Atl. 808, affirmed in (1915) 84 N. J. Eq. 203, 93 Atl. 1085.]

The principle that the civil court will, even in the absence of an express trust, recognize an implied trust arising from and coextensive with the fundamental and characteristic doctrines of the church as held at the time the property was acquired, and will exercise its jurisdiction, at the instance of the faction of the society, however small, which remains loyal to those doctrines, to prevent the diversion of the property from such trust by the majority, and to that end will determine upon the evidence offered the original and characteristic doctrines of the society, is well formulated in the following quotation from the conclusions of law by the trial judge, which were approved by the appellate court in Peace v. First Christian Church (1898) 20 Tex. Civ. App. 85, 48 S. W. 534: "The courts of this country have no power to determine for religious bodies ecclesiastical or doctrinal questions, and they have never evinced a disposition to invade that domain, and will only inquire into such questions when property rights become involved, and are the subject of litigation, and then only so far as to determine those rights. It is a rule of law that when property had become dedicated to the support of some specific form of religious doctrine, it becomes a trust, and the courts will hear evidence and determine what that doctrine is, regardless of its ecclesiastical, sectarian, or denominational bearing, in order to ascertain the trust, and, having so found, will enforce the trust, and not permit it to be diverted to other and different doctrinal uses; and it is the duty of the court to decide in favor of those, whether a majority or minority of the congregation, who are adhering to the doctrines professed by the congregation and form of worship in practice at the time the trust became fixed." That the civil court, when property or civil rights are involved, will, if necessary in order to determine the nature and extent of the implied trust, investigate and determine fine points of doctrine, is illustrated by this case, where one of the vital points of controversy between the two factions was with respect to the nature and efficacy of baptism. The case also emphasizes the refusal of the civil courts to permit the diversion of the church property from the support of the fundamental and characteristic doctrines of the church, as the decision was against a faction, though a large majority, which was found to have departed from the original fundamental doctrines of the church.

In Bouldin v. Alexander (1873) 15 Wall. (U. S.) 131, 16 L. ed. 69, the court said that it might be conceded that withdrawal from a church and uniting with another church or denomination are a relinquishment of all rights in the church abandoned, but that in the case at bar there was no sufficient evidence that any new congregation was formed or that there was any withdrawal from the church by the majority.

So, in Baker v. Fales (1820) 16 Mass. 487, where the original grant of the church property was to the "church in Dedham," it was held that the members of the church, though in a minority, who continued connected with the parish after a majority of the members of the church had separated themselves therefrom, were entitled to the property.

In Baker v. Ducker (1889) 79 Cal. 365, 71 Pac. 764, declaring that a majority of the members of a religious society have no right and no power to divert property to another and different church corporation, it does not appear whether or not the society was an independent one.

In Christian Church v. Church of Christ (1906) 219 Ill. 503, 76 N. E. 703, supra, the court, speaking of an independent or congregational church, declared the broad principle that when the members of a religious congregation divide, and one faction breaks away from the congregation and forms a new congregation, the title to the property of the congregation will remain in that part of it which adheres to the tenets and doctrines originally taught to the congregation to whose use the property was originally dedicated. While the decision in that case was in favor of the majority faction, it having been found that that faction adhered to the original tenets and doctrines of the church, it is clear that the decision would have been in favor of the minority if it had been found that that faction rather than the majority faction adhered to the original doctrine.

In Smith v. Pedigo (1893) 145 Ind. 361, 19 L.R.A. 433, 32 L.R.A. 838, 33 N. E. 777, 44 N. E. 363, supra, the court decided in favor of the minority faction of a Baptist church which adhered to the doctrine that sinners are regenerated by personal contact with the Holy Spirit without means or any instrumentality whatever, as against the majority, which had become known as the "means" party and believed in the use of "means" for purposes of regeneration. The bearing of this case on the effect of a decision of a church council is shown in supra, V.

In Mt. Zion Baptist Church v. Whitmore (1891) 83 Iowa, 138, 18 L.R.A. 198, 49 N. W. 81, supra, it appeared that at the time the church acquired its property it was under a profession of faith and practice limited by the "articles of faith and church government published in the minutes of the Des Moines Baptist Association of the year 1848," which, the court understood, was in accord with the teachings of the Baptist denomination; and the decision was against the majority upon the ground that they were attempting to divert the property from the trust thus implied. In this case, a Baptist council convened on the joint call of both factions of the local church, which agreed to accept its decision as final, had decided that the doctrines taught by the majority faction were not in harmony with the teaching of the denomination; and it was held that that decision might be adopted by the court as the basis of its action in giving the control of the church property to the minority faction. The court said: "The power of the majority to govern is derivative, and the source of derivation limits the power. The organization gave birth to the church, and a power to govern the church. The church is Baptist because of the faith and covenants that make it so. It is not the faith and covenants that need or are to be governed, but the members in the enjoyment and fulfilment of the same. The power to govern the church gives no power to change the church or the faith and covenants that fix its character. The property of this church is the common property of all its members, and each has such an interest therein that he may insist that it shall be devoted to the religious faith for which it was given. The manner of the application is delegated to the judgment of a majority of the members of the church, but there is no delegation of authority to the majority to apply it to the advancement of a church of another faith by a direct transfer, or by changing the faith of a majority of the members of the church. It is when such an attempt is made that a court of equity will interfere to protect the rights of a minority in having the trust property applied in accord with the original intent."

In Park v. Chaplin (1895) 96 Iowa, 55, 31 L.R.A. 141, 59 Am. St. Rep. 353, 64 N. W. 674, supra, it was held that a majority of the members of a Free Will Baptist church could not, against the will of the minority, transfer property obtained for the use and benefit of that denomination which holds the doctrines of Arminius, to the Baptist denomination, which is Calvinistic, notwithstanding a provision in the manual of church government of the Free Baptist denomination to the effect that a church in good standing may have a letter of dismission and recommendation to another evangelical denomination, as this appears to refer to the church as an ecclesiastical, rather than as a purely legal, body. The court said: "It is not any part of our duty to decide whether the difference between the respective articles of faith, covenants, and practice of the two denominations is substantial. It may be true that changes in such matters are constantly going on, and that it is beyond human power to prevent them; that in those things which make for worldly prosperity, as popularity, wealth, and numbers, the defendant church would be greatly benefited by its union with the Baptist denomination as proposed; but considerations of that kind have nothing to do with the legal rights of the parties to this action, and cannot be given weight in determining the questions of which we have jurisdiction. It is enough for the purpose of this case that the two denominations are now separate and distinct; that the property in controversy was acquired by the defendant church for the special benefit of one of them; and that the plaintiffs, being members of that church and of that denomination, object to the proposed change and insist that it shall not be made."

In Mt. Helm Baptist Church v. Jones (1901) 79 Miss. 488, 30 So. 714, supra, a faction of the "Mt. Helm" Baptist Church had by their declaration, made on the minutes of the church, declared that they repudiated the name of "Baptist" and adopted in its stead the name "Church of God," and had repudiated the name "Mt. Helm" and adopted in its stead "Tabernacle of Christ," and had repudiated all creeds and denominations as man-made devices. The court said that by such declaration it was relieved of all difficulty as to what the Baptist creed or faith is; that it was clear that the original donor of the property constituting the Mt. Helm Baptist Church edifice and grounds donated it for use as a Baptist church, and more specifically the particular Baptist church known as the "Mt. Helm Baptist Church;" and that its dedication to that use could not be altered by those openly proclaiming that they are not Baptists, although they may constitute a majority in number of the old church.

In Lindstrom v. Tell (1915) 131 Minn. 203, 154 N. W. 969, supra, the court affirmed a judgment in favor of a faction of a Lutheran church remaining faithful to the doctrines of that church as against a faction which adhered to the society of Mission Friends, which rejected many of the orthodox doctrines of the Lutheran Church, the latter faction (defendants) having wrongfully excluded from the church a regularly called pastor of the Lutheran faith and those who desired to hear him. The court, after referring to the fact that the defendants had placed in the pulpit as its regular pastor a minister of the denomination of Mission Friends who rejected the teachings and ceremonials of the Lutheran Church, said: "These defendants had no such authority. It would be useless here to enter into any dissertation as to the importance of questions of doctrinal belief. The members of this church deem them of importance. They have a right to worship in their own manner, and if they choose to establish a church which gives importance to matters of doctrine, and which requires that services and ceremonials be conducted in accordance with established form, that is their right, and that right is invaded when part of the congregation, without authority, place in the pulpit ministers of other beliefs, and who conduct the services of the church in a manner not according to the established rules and practices of their denomination. Any such use of the church edifice by even a majority, if less than all the congregation, is an unwarranted diversion of the church property. . . . True, the deed by which the church property was acquired did not in terms impress it with a trust for the carrying out of any particular religious purpose. But this was not necessary. The church corporation was formed for certain well-defined purposes. It is the law of all corporations that a mere majority of its members cannot divert the corporate property to uses foreign to the purposes for which the corporation was formed. There is no difference between church and other corporations in this regard. Where a church corporation is formed for the purpose of promoting certain defined doctrines of religious faith, which are set forth in its articles of incorporation, any church property which it acquires is impressed with a trust to carry out such purpose, and a majority of the congregation cannot divert the property to other inconsistent religious uses against the protest of a minority, however small. The manner of use of the property of the church corporation, within the range of its corporate powers, may be determined by the majority of the congregation, but no majority, even though it embrace all members but one, can use the corporate property for the advancement of a faith antagonistic to that for which the church was established and the corporation formed."

In Stallings v. Finney (1919) 287 Ill. 145, 122 N. E. 369, the majority of a congregational society known as the "Apostolic Faith Assembly," after having withdrawn to become members of a society known as the "Church of God," held a meeting, and the decision to go into the Church of God was announced, and they took possession of the church property for the new church to the exclusion of the members of the original society. The decision was in favor of the minority, who adhered to the original society, notwithstanding the contention that the majority had merely voted to change its name and practices and that there was no secession from the original organization. The court said that it was apparent from the record that the action of the majority was taken after those participating were no longer members of the Apostolic Faith Assembly, and hence could not affect the property rights of that society nor its identity if there still remains any membership of that society adhering to and teaching its doctrines and practices.

In Kicinko v. Petruska (1917) 259 Pa. 1, 102 Atl. 286, where the charter expressed the purpose to support a church in accord with the "faith, doctrine, discipline, government, and forms of the United Greek Catholic Church," which title, the opinion said, signified an ecclesiastical body in union with the Roman Catholic Church and acknowledging the supremacy of the Pope, the court affirmed a decree which, in effect, enjoined a faction—whether a majority or not does not appear—from diverting the property to the support of the “Orthodox” Church. The court quoted with approval the statement in the opinion below that the congregation was self-governing in temporal affairs, but that whether or not it was wholly independent was not decisive of the question at issue.

In Hale v. Everett (1868) 53 N. H. 9, 16 Am. Rep. 82, supra, the decision was in favor of a faction, though in the minority, of a Unitarian society, which was opposed to the continuation of a pastor who had renounced both the name of Unitarian and Christian, and against the majority faction, which was in favor of continuing him in his position. The majority opinion lays down the general principle that where a conveyance is made or trust created for the benefit or use of a religious society by its denominational name, with no other particular designation in the deed of the tenets or doctrines which it is to be used to advance and support, the denominational name may be a sufficient guide to the nature of the trust, so far as respects doctrines which are fundamental, and that in such case those having control of the property hold in trust for the benefit of such religious society, and may be restrained from applying the same or the use of it to the promotion of religious tenets and doctrines clearly opposed and adverse to the fundamental doctrines and faith of such sect or denomination at the time and immediately after such trust was created. The real ground of decision in this case, however, was that the majority faction had abandoned and intentionally seceded from the original society, although they claimed on the trial, and attempted to make it appear, that they had not seceded, but were claiming to represent and to be the original society. The report of this case is very extended and contains a long and elaborate dissenting as well as prevailing opinion. The majority opinion is of great value for its vindication of the right and duty of the civil courts to interfere when property rights are concerned, even when it involves an inquiry into questions of doctrine or polity which in any circumstances the civil courts are reluctant to undertake and which they absolutely decline when civil or property rights are not involved; and for its exposition of the conditions and limitations of the exception to the general principle that the action or decision of the majority is binding upon the civil courts. The court said: “Now, suppose such a society should, in the course of time, become equally divided; just half of its members should secede from the faith and doctrines of the sect which formed the society, and the other half should adhere to such faith and doctrines, and each half should separately undertake to control the use of the house according to its own religious views, and the views of the two divisions were antagonistic, and the court were called on to enforce the trust,—Can there be a doubt that equity would require that the control of the house should be given to the division which adhered to the original faith? Would not that be carrying out the wishes and intentions of the original founders of the trust? But suppose that the party which had seceded from the faith of the denomination should outnumber the other by one or more, could that change the reason of the case or its controlling equities? Would it not be the duty of a court of equity to look beyond the mere form of the thing to its material substance, and to say, in such a case, that the portion of the religious society who adhered to the faith of the sect that founded the society were entitled to control the use of the house, rather than the portion who, being still members of the society in form, had renounced the faith of the sect which formed, and whose fundamental doctrines had given name to, the society?”

“We do not deny the right of individuals to change their religious faith, nor the right of members of religious societies to do the same, nor the right of whole societies as a body to apostatize from their original faith, and adopt a new one antagonistic to the first. This is but exercising those very rights of conscience which are asserted in art. V. of the Bill of Rights as the inalienable birthright of every inhabitant of the state. Nor is it the province of the court to decide or to inquire which faith is most consistent, or what doctrines are true or what are false; and it seldom becomes necessary for the court to turn its attention to theological studies in order to decide questions of law, except in cases like the present, where they are called upon to see that a trust is administered according to the intention of the original founders of such trust. If a trust is created or a charity given for the benefit or use of a sectarian society by its sectarian and denominational name, it is to be presumed that it was intended to be used to advance the peculiar doctrines of that sect; and if a meetinghouse is conveyed in trust for certain persons, to be under the control of a society of Christians, it would be the duty of the court, upon proper application and proofs, to see that the house was controlled by a society of Christians, and not by Mohammedans, pagans, or infidels, even though a majority of the original society have apostatized from the faith of the sect which formed the society."

Later in the opinion the court said: "It would seem, then, that the proper principles to be applied in this case upon the weight of authority (not taking into consideration those authorities which are based upon the peculiar provisions of the statute of New York, and which can, therefore, have no application here) are, in substance, as follows: That the denominational name of a religious society to which or to whose use a donation or grant is made, and the doctrines actually taught therein at the time of the gift or grant and immediately after, and the length of time they continue to be thus taught without interruption, may be resorted to, to limit and define the trust in respect to doctrines deemed fundamental; that where the conveyance is merely to the religious corporation by name, with no other designation of its purposes or trusts (as in this case), the denominational name, in connection with the contemporaneous acts of the incorporators, may be a sufficient guide as to the nature of the trust; that where there is no specific designation in the deed as to the particular religious tenets or doctrines which it is to be used to advance or support, the denominational name may indicate the nature of the trust, so far as respects doctrines admitted to be fundamental; and that, if a society of one religious sect or denomination becomes incorporated with a strict denominational name, descriptive of the fundamental doctrines of the sect to which it belongs, it will be presumed that it was constituted for the purpose of advancing the vital doctrines of such sect or denomination, and that the society, or those having control of property held in trust for the benefit of such religious society, should be restrained from applying the property or the use of it to the promotion of tenets or doctrines clearly opposed and adverse to the fundamental principles of the faith and doctrines of such sect or denomination at the time and immediately after the trust was created."

It is interesting to contrast the argument of the opinion and the conclusion reached in the Hale Case with the opinion in Atty. Gen. ex rel. Abbot v. Dublin (1859) 38 N. H. 459, which was written by Perley, Ch. J., who concurred with the general conclusions and results reached in the majority opinion in the Hale Case. Much of his opinion in the Dublin Case is devoted to the vindication of the proposition that the distinctive and characteristic feature of congregationalism is polity or form of government, and not doctrine or creed. The decision on its facts, however, seems to be reconcilable with the decision in the Hale Case, although the dissenter in the latter case makes frequent reference to the Dublin Case in support of his position. The Dublin Case involved a controversy over the income of a fund which the minister of a Congregational church in the town of Dublin, who died in 1817, by his will executed in that year, gave to the town of Dublin "to be kept at interest by said town forever, for the sole purpose of supporting the Christian religion in the Congregational Society, so-called, in said town; the interest thereof to be paid quarterly to the minister of the Congregational persuasion who shall be regularly ordained and statedly preach in said society." In 1819, certain inhabitants of the town, a part or all of whom had been members of the church or congregation to which the testator had ministered, associated themselves into an incorporated society under the name, "First Congregational Society in Dublin." In 1827, a number of persons, some of whom had been members of the church and congregation during the testator's ministry, on account of the doctrinal opinions of the minister then in charge, withdrew from the congregation and organized a new church, which was at first known as the "Second Congregational Society of Dublin," but afterwards as the "Trinitarian Congregational Society in Dublin." The decision was to the effect that the minister of the old organization, which was in general Unitarian in doctrine, was entitled to the fund as against the minister of the other organization, which adhered to the orthodox Trinitarian position. The view of the court that the terms of the trust "minister of the Congregational persuasion" were broad enough to embrace both Unitarians and Trinitarians was aided by the fact that differences in doctrine represented by the Unitarians and the Trinitarians had become known and recognized by 1817 (the date of the will and testator's death), and by the further fact that the Trinitarian party seems to have been treated as seceders from the original society. The court was of the opinion that evidence as to the doctrinal opinions of the testator was not admissible, but intimated that the evidence offered in that regard, viewed in the light of the history of congregationalism and the controversy between the Unitarians and Trinitarians, would not warrant the inference that the testator intended to limit his bounty to the support of the Trinitarian doctrine. The opinion contains an exceedingly interesting account of the origin and history of congregationalism in New England, and a very clear exposition of the view that the distinctive feature of congregationalism was in polity or form of government, and not in doctrine or creed. That the writer of the opinion, however, did not regard this view as absolute and without limitations is apparent from his concurrence with the majority opinion in the Hale Case.

The fundamental question involved in Atty. Gen. ex rel. Mander v. Pearson (1817) 3 Meriv. 353, 36 Eng. Reprint, 135, 17 Revised Rep. 100, was quite similar to that in the Dublin Case, the question being whether the teaching of Unitarian doctrines was a diversion from the purpose declared in a trust deed of a meetinghouse "for the worship and service of God," it being contended by the plaintiff and relators that the intention was to promote the doctrine of the Holy Trinity, and the defendants insisting that the intention was as general as the purpose expressed and had no regard to any particular tenets. The case was referred to the master to inquire, inter alia, with respect to the worship and doctrine for which the trust was created, to the end of preventing a diversion of the property from the trust if the plaintiff's contention as regards the trust was well founded.

In Kniskern v. St. Johns's & St. Peter's Lutheran Churches (1844) 1 Sandf. Ch. (N. Y.) 439, supra, the minority faction of a local Lutheran church, which adhered to the Augsburg confession, that being the standard of the faith of the church at the time the property was acquired, and continued their connection with the synod with which the church was previously connected, were held entitled to the control of the property as against the faction which dissolved their connection with that synod, and united with other churches in forming a new synod, which adopted a declaration of faith essentially different from the Augsburg confession. There was no trust in this case other than that implied from the fact that the grant was to the trustees of an Evangelical Lutheran congregation for the common use and benefit of said Lutheran congregation forever. This case is to be distinguished from those subsequently cited (infra, VII.) upholding the right of a majority faction of an Evangelical Lutheran church to sever its synodical relation, by the fact that in this case there was not merely a severance of synodical relations, but a departure from fundamental doctrines.

In Madison Ave. Baptist Church v. Baptist Church (1871) 46 N. Y. 131, it was held that the supreme court had no jurisdiction to authorize a conveyance of church property by one Baptist church society to another pursuant to a scheme to effect a union of the two churches by which the grantee was to absorb all the grantor's property, assume its debts, and take its corporate name, and all its corporations and the congregation worshipping in its church; no price having been agreed upon as the value of the property which the grantor was to pay, and it being a part of the plan that the grantor was to be dissolved as a corporation. The decision was upon the ground that by the common law then in force in New York religious corporations were restrained from alienating their real estate, and that when the conveyance in question was made they could alienate their real estate only when authorized by the court under § 11 of the act "to Provide for the Incorporation of Religious Societies," passed April 5, 1813, or when authorized by some other act of the legislature, and that the facts did not show a sale within the meaning of § 11. The court adhered to this position on a second appeal (1878) 73 N. Y. 82, the opinion on that appeal being concerned merely with the terms on which relief should be granted to the church which made the conveyance.

There are a few cases that apparently lend some support to the extreme view apparently sanctioned by the Watson Case (see supra, VI. a), which admits of no inquiry by the civil courts as to the existence of an implied trust from which the majority will not be permitted to divert the property.

Thus, in First Baptist Church v. Fort (1899) 93 Tex. 215, 49 L.R.A. 617, 54 S. W. 892, it was held that, even conceding that the majority of a Baptist church had abandoned the confession of faith to which the church subscribed at the time the property was acquired, yet the majority should control, as the property was not subject to an express trust, and no implied trust arose from the conveyance of the site of the church to trustees "for the sole and exclusive use and benefit of the said Paris Baptist Church," or from the contributions made for the purpose of erecting the church structure. The court said: "It is not within the province of courts to determine which of two factions is right from a biblical or theological point of view, nor which conforms to the faith originally adopted by the church, except when that is, in explicit terms, made a condition of the donation. Granting that the defendants have abandoned the New Hampshire confession of faith, the rules of that church prescribe that a majority should control. The minority took membership with those rules in force, and must abide the result." Assuming that the tenets and doctrines which the majority had repudiated were fundamental and characteristic of the denomination to which the church belonged, the decision in this case seems to be opposed to the weight of authority. See also Wehmer v. Fokenga (1899) 57 Neb. 510, 78 N. W. 28, subsequently set out.

In Jarrell v. Sproles (1899) 20 Tex. Civ. App. 387, 49 S. W. 904, where the decision was in favor of the majority faction of a Baptist church which, the minority charged, had adopted the heresy known as "Martinism," the trial court found that there had been no adoption of "Martinism" by the majority faction; and the court of appeals said that, even if it were conceded that the majority had adopted the doctrines or dogmas implied by that name, there was no evidence to show that they amounted to divergence from the true doctrine of the church, and that court could not assume that they did, even though the Baptist General Convention, whose action was necessarily merely advisory, had denied recognition to anyone who believed in Martinism. The court said that it was not called upon to determine whether, in a case like that at bar, where the deed under which the property was held did not specify any particular creed or form of belief to be observed or taught in the church, but merely named the denomination, a court of equity should examine into the professed belief, doctrines, or practices of those controlling the property, for the purpose of ascertaining whether or not they are in accord with the essential doctrines, beliefs, and practices prevailing among churches of such denominations, and thereupon wrest from the majority, and vest in the minority, control of such property.

In Gipson v. Morris (1903) 31 Tex. Civ. App. 645, 73 S. W. 85, asserting and applying the principle that when a division occurs in an independent society (a Baptist church) during a regular meeting of the organization, which leads to a separation into distinct and conflicting bodies, the rights of such bodies must depend upon which of the two had a majority of the members of the original organization at the time of the division, unless by the rules governing the method of transacting business adopted by the organization, the majority failed to assert its right to control the meeting in the proper manner or at the proper time,—there was no attempt to change the denominational character or doctrinal standards of the society, but a mere dispute as to the result of a vote on a motion to adjourn a meeting of the society, which gave rise to a question as to which of two factions represented the society and was entitled to control its property.

In Mendelsohn v. Gordon (1913) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 156 S. W. 1150, the court merely affirmed an order modifying a temporary injunction granted to preserve the status quo pending a suit over the control of the synagogue and other property of a religious corporation, it being charged that the defendants, the majority faction, had departed from fundamental doctrines.

In Swedish Evangelical Lutheran Church v. Shivers (1863) 16 N. J. Eq. 453, the court, apparently in answer to the contention of counsel that, a Lutheran church having merged in or affiliated with the Episcopal Church, there had been a diversion from the trust, said that a change in the ecclesiastical relation of the church did not necessarily involve any perversion of the trust. Whether or not this was upon the assumption that there was a minority faction does not appear. The action was by the church with reference to certain ground rents; and it was held that in any event the defendant could not raise the question, it being one in which the cestuis que trust were alone concerned.

In Keyser v. Stansifer (1834) 6 Ohio 364, it appeared that a Baptist society, at a regular meeting, by unanimous action abrogated the declaration of faith under which it was organized and adopted a new declaration before a conveyance of property to the trustees of the "First Baptist Church of Dayton," and after such conveyance the majority faction abolished all former creeds, and declared the New Testament to be the only rule of faith and practice. It was held that the majority faction could not be deprived of the right to control the property at the instance of the minority upon the theory that the majority had lost its identity as the church. The court said: "It does not follow that they (the majority faction) lose their property by ceasing to entertain certain opinions. The declaration of faith under which they were organized, contains no attempt to bind them to abide in the same belief. It is shown in proof that each Baptist church is in itself a whole, separate, and independent—at liberty to form its own creed, and looking to others for counsel and social intercourse only. The opinions of such a body cannot but change. . . . It (the church) was organized under the predominance of opinions which the complainant would now repudiate as heretical. They, the minority, at best, can have no right to divert it from the uses to which it is devoted, by the expressed will of the corporation, upon account of any supposed errors of doctrine or of faith."

So, in Louisville & N. R. Co. v. McCoy (1917) 177 Ky. 415, 197 S. W. 801, one of the reasons for holding that the petition of one of the factions of a Baptist church for the recovery of church property was bad was that it did not appear that the complainant's faction constituted a majority, although the petition alleged that the division arose out of a departure of some of the members, presumably intending the defendants, from the articles of faith and doctrine peculiar to the church. There were, however, other grounds for the decision.

A novel point was made by the holding in Hall v. Hall (1917) 177 Ky. 430, 197 S. W. 799, that the petition in a suit by a faction of a Baptist church for the recovery of the church property and records was insufficient because it did not aver that the complainants and those whom they represented were members of the church at the time of the divisions, and if, as must be inferred, they became members after that time, they were estopped to sue for the recovery of the property upon the ground that the faith and doctrine adhered to by the defendants were a departure from that to which the church was committed at the time of its organization, it being admitted that the defendants and those affiliated with them had been continuously in possession of the church property and in control of its affairs since the division so that without their action the complainants could not have become members.

It is to be observed that the rule, stated and exemplified in supra, VI., that the majority faction of an independent or congregational society may not divert the property from the denomination to which the society belongs or from the fundamental and distinctive doctrines or tenets to which it originally subscribed, does not prevent the majority faction of such a society, over the objection of the minority faction, from severing a voluntary ecclesiastical connection of the society with another body. Thus, in a number of cases the right of the majority faction of a local Lutheran church to sever its synodical relations, or at least to call a pastor from another synod, has been upheld upon the assumption or finding by the court that according to the Evangelical Lutheran polity the church is independent in government and does not lose its character as such by voluntarily coming for a time in association with a synod.

In Bartholomew v. Lutheran Congregation (1880) 35 Ohio St. 567, upholding the right of a local Evangelical Lutheran society to change its synodical relation, the resolution to that end was unanimously adopted, although there was a subsequent attempt by a faction to reorganize the society and maintain the former synodical relation.

In Gudmundson v. Thingvalla Lutheran Church (N. D.) supra, it was held that a resolution adopted by the synod, at the instance of the minority faction, and without notice to the majority faction, recognizing the minority faction, and declaring that the majority faction had violated the constitution of the society and of the synod, was of no effect. The court in this connection notes the distinction between a society like the one in question, which was independent of government and voluntarily associated with the synod, and one which is organically connected with a superior ecclesiastical body.

But in Moseman v. Heitshusen (1897) 50 Neb. 420, 69 N. W. 957, the court reversed a decree restraining the defendants from interfering with the exclusive rights claimed by the plaintiffs in the church property, the real purpose of the plaintiffs being to prevent the defendants from turning over the church property to the control of the Missouri synod, the plaintiffs desiring to join the general synod. The deed to the property in this case provided that "if the said Lutheran Church shall be dissolved, or if some other religious society shall occupy said church property," then a part of the property should revert to the grantors. The court said that if the action were brought by the grantors to enforce the conditions of their deed, there might be good reason for determining whether or not the donation had been diverted to an improper or unauthorized use, but the real question in the case being one of mere doctrine, the civil courts were not equipped to inquire into it. From the allegations of the petition it would seem that the plaintiffs represented the majority faction. If so, it is not apparent why the court should have refused to vindicate their control over the property.

In Stein v. Hauser (Sask.) supra, deciding in favor of a minority faction of a congregation of the Evangelical Lutheran Church, which adhered to the Missouri synod, and against the majority faction, which adopted the doctrines of the general council, and, later, of the Ohio synod, the court found from the evidence that the doctrine of the Missouri synod was different from that of the Ohio synod, and that by the law of the church a congregation organized, as the one in question was found to be, by the Missouri synod, could leave that synod only by unanimous action. The court added that the result was not affected by the fact that a considerable part of the debt of the church was paid after the trouble arose, it having all been paid before the congregation joined the Ohio synod. It will be observed that the difference in results between this case and those previously cited in this subdivision is due, not to a difference in legal principles, but to a difference in the findings or assumptions of fact respecting the law of the church as regards the right of a local congregation to change its synodical relations. In view of the finding of the court in this regard the case was governed by the principles applicable to a local society organically connected with an ecclesiastical system; and the court cites a case of that type in support of its decision (General Assembly v. Overtoun [1904] A. C. (Eng.) 515, 91 L. T. N. S. 395, 20 Times L. R. 730). The opinion does not disclose whether the differences found to exist between the doctrines of the Missouri and Ohio synods respectively were fundamental and characteristic. If they were there would seem to have been an independent ground for the decision under the principle or exception stated and exemplified supra, VI. b.

The right, in the absence of a violation of an express trust, to withdraw from a voluntary ecclesiastical connection, assuming that there is no departure from fundamental and characteristic doctrines of the society, is also upheld in Miller v. Gable (1845) 2 Denio (N. Y.) 492, reversing (1844) 10 Paige, 627. In that case a church organized as a German Reformed church, and not originally in connection with any other ecclesiastical body, subsequently came under the jurisdiction of the Dutch Reformed Church. The court of errors, contrary to the opinion of Chancellor Walworth, held that no perversion of the property from an implied trust was involved in the action of a portion of the trustees of the church, which had become incorporated, in attempting to sever the ecclesiastical connection with the Dutch Reformed Church and employing Lutheran pastors. The various opinions, including those of the chancellor (10 Paige, 628) and the vice chancellor (2 Denio, 492),—whose decision was reversed by the chancellor and upheld by the court of errors,—and the different members of the latter court, contain learned and interesting discussions of the subject. Gardiner, President, said: "If a society incorporated by the name of Unitarian has for its pastor a Unitarian minister, we could with safety infer that it was not the intention of the founders that their bounty should be applied to the dissemination of Trinitarian doctrines. But beyond this, in all matters not deemed indispensable, a discretion would be vested in the congregation and their trustees as the representatives of the donors. . . . I do most cordially agree with him (Chancellor Walworth) in opinion that it must be a plain and palpable abuse of trust which will induce a court of equity to interfere respecting a controversy growing out of a difference in religious and sectarian tenets. Between that extreme which confers all power upon the congregation or the trustees, and the doctrine which subjects the property to forfeiture for departures from doctrine or forms of government, in matters not indispensable to the great ends to be obtained by religious organization, there is a wide interval where we may take our stand, sustained by the law and by a sober and enlightened public sentiment." The chancellor's decision was predicated, not only upon the severance of the relations with the Dutch Reformed Church, but also on the existence of irreconcilable differences in the fundamental doctrines held by the Dutch Reformed Church and the Lutheran body, respectively. Apparently the majority of the court of errors were of the opinion that the differences in doctrine were not so fundamental as to require the interference of a civil court.

So, in Manning v. Yeager (1919) — Ala. —, 82 So. 435, it was held that unless the new association held to a faith essentially different from a Missionary Baptist denomination, the majority of a local society of that denomination might, without forfeiting the control of its property, sever the existing relation with an association of churches and unite with other churches in forming a new association. The court said that, even assuming the truth of the allegations of the complaint by the minority faction, that the pastor of the church, who took the part of the majority, and through them dominated the church, was opposed to foreign missions and an educated ministry, it could not hold that thereby the pastor and his majority congregation had put themselves without the Baptist pale, or that by using the church property in the service of these beliefs they have diverted it to a use fundamentally different from that contemplated in its acquisition. Referring to the fact that the pastor had on divers occasions indulged in ribald, coarse, and scurrilous language with reference to the foreign missionary board, the court said that that involved no question of diversion of property, but was rather a matter of taste and decency, to be judged by the church.

In Pulis v. Iserman (1904) 71 N. J. L. 408, 58 Atl. 554, holding that a local society might withdraw from the "classis" of the True Reformed Church without loss of its identity, the decision to withdraw was by the unanimous vote of those present at the meeting. Subsequently, under the sanction of the "classis," certain persons who at one time had been members or adherents of the congregation assumed to choose a new set of officers. The court denied the latter leave to file an information requiring the old officers to show by what au-

In Aiken's Estate (1893) 158 Pa. 541, 27 Atl. 1102, the question was as to the identity of the beneficiary described in a will as "The New Jerusalem Society of Pittsburgh and its Vicinity." A society of that name, which seems originally not to have been in connection with any other body, later connected itself with the General (Swedenborgian) Church of Pennsylvania, and subsequently, by a vote of the majority of its members, severed its connection with that body. A minority, desiring to maintain its relation with the general body, organized a church under another name. It was held in effect that the faction which severed its connection with the General Church was the proper and legal representative of the original church and as such entitled to the legacy.

In Wehmer v. Fokenga (1899) 57 Neb. 510, 78 N. W. 28, supra, deciding in favor of the majority faction of a German Evangelical Lutheran church which called a minister from the Iowa synod of the denomination, the church having been previously in connection with the general synod, the court said: "Whether the religious teachings, faith, and church polity of these synods differed in essential particulars was and is a question for the ecclesiastical tribunals, not the civil courts. It is neither pleaded nor proved that an ecclesiastical tribunal having final jurisdiction to decide this question has determined it in favor of the contention of the appellees; nor is it shown that no such an ecclesiastical tribunal exists, having jurisdiction to decide the question. Until such tribunal—if one exists—shall decide the question, the civil courts will not assume to do so. When some ecclesiastical tribunal having jurisdiction in the premises shall determine that, according to the organic law of the church, this congregation may or may not subject itself to the jurisdiction of the Iowa synod and select for its pastor a minister of that synod, then the civil courts will recognize this judgment and, if called upon, enforce it. . . . But it would be an unseemly thing for the secular courts to assume to themselves the right to decide in the first instance whether a certain doctrine or tenet of faith possessed and practised by one religious organization was contrary to the organic and fundamental doctrines and creed of another religious organization."

In North Carolina Christian Conference v. Allen (1911) 156 N. C. 524, 72 S. E. 617, the rule that a voluntary association with which an independent church is affiliated has no control over it was applied by holding that a "conference" had no right or interest in the church property and was not a proper party to a suit involving the control of the church property, which grew out of the refusal of the majority of the local body to accept a pastor sent by the "conference." The decision on the merits was in favor of the majority faction.

In Martin v. German Reformed Church (1912) 149 Wis. 19, 134 N. W. 1125, where the defendants, in whose favor the appellate court decided, seem to have been in the majority, the decision was upon the ground that the church continued to be an independent religious organization, and never became legally affiliated with the "classis" of the Reformed Church, although the pastor had joined the classis, and the congregation had used the ritual and service books of the Reformed Church.

In KENESAW FREE BAPTIST CHURCH v. LATTIMER (reported herewith) ante, 98, affirming a decree quieting the title to the church property in a local Baptist church, notwithstanding the severance of its relations with a "yearly meeting" with which it had been previously associated, and its adherence to a plan of union adopted by a "general conference," which the yearly meeting had disapproved, it is stated that the plaintiff (the local society) represented every member of the present congregation, so that the individual rights of members of that society were not involved. The defendants seem to have represented the yearly meeting, which had refused to recognize delegates from the plaintiff church on the ground that it had taken itself out of the denomination, and had refused to deed the church property to the plaintiff,—the title having been vested in the executive committee of the yearly meeting in trust “for the Free Will Baptist Church of Kenesaw,”—and was claiming the right, if it deemed proper, to hold the property for the use of another congregation conforming to the present views of the yearly meeting. The decision is upon the assumption that the property was subject to no trust other than that it was for the use of the local church, and that there were no such differences of belief between the old organization and the union as to show an intention on the part of the governing body of the local church to violate such implied trust and abandon the purposes for which the church was organized.

Though the contrary is suggested by the quotation previously made from Wehmer v. Fokenga (Neb.) supra, it would seem that the right of an independent society to withdraw from a voluntary association, or at least its right to the continued control of the property of the local society, presupposes that it has not by such withdrawal or otherwise departed from the fundamental and distinctive doctrinal beliefs of the society. This is clearly recognized in Gudmundson v. Thingvalla Lutheran Church (1914) 29 N. D. 291, 150 N. W. 750, supra. The decision in that case in favor of the majority faction, which had withdrawn from the synod, being based not only upon the right of the majority to determine the synodical relations of the church, but also upon the conclusion reached after a somewhat elaborate examination of the evidence, that there was no competent evidence supporting the claim of the minority faction, and the finding of the trial court that the doctrine of plenary inspiration of the Bible—the acceptance of that doctrine by a resolution of the synod being the cause of the withdrawal by the majority faction—was a presupposed and accepted fundamental doctrinal belief of the Icelandic Lutheran Church, and as such presupposed by the church constitution and its confessional documents. In other words there was in the view of the majority of the court no competent evidence that the majority faction had departed from the fundamental and characteristic doctrines of the church. See also in this connection KENESAW FREE BAPTIST CHURCH v. LATTIMER (reported herewith) ante, 98, Manning v. Yeager (1919) — Ala. —, 82 So. 435, and Stein v. Hauser (1913) 6 Sask. L. R. 353, 15 D. L. R. 223, supra.

In Bendewald v. Ley (1917) — N. D. —, 168 N. W. 693, the majority of the court conceded in effect that a majority faction of an independent church could not, as against the protest of a minority faction, divert the property from the support of the fundamental and characteristic doctrines of the society; but held that the civil courts, even when property rights are involved, should not undertake to pass upon doctrinal questions, as that is the exclusive privilege of the ecclesiastical authorities; in other words, “the proper rule in such case as the one at bar, we are fully convinced, is for the civil courts to confine their jurisdiction exclusively to the one question of property rights, and to determine such property rights only after all doctrinal questions, or questions relating to faith, practice, and teachings of the particular religious denomination involved, have been disposed of by ecclesiastical authority vested in such religious organization.” In accordance with the principle thus announced the majority held that a complaint in a suit by a minority faction of a Lutheran church, which adhered to the “Missouri synod” with which the local church had previously been associated, for the control of the church property against the majority faction, which had affiliated with the Iowa synod, was demurrable, notwithstanding the allegations of fundamental and essential differences in doctrines and belief and in spite of the allegation that the plaintiffs (minority faction) had been recognized and adjudged by the Missouri synod as remaining true to the original confession, for the reason that the complaint did not allege that the doctrinal questions in controversy had been submitted to or decided by any ecclesiastical tribunal.

It is to be observed that the rule as regards the severance by the majority of an independent or congregational society of a voluntary connection with an external association is quite different from the rule that applies to an attempt by a majority of a society of the Presbyterian or Episcopal type to sever its organic connection with the general ecclesiastical body. So, if a society, though originally organized as an independent church, or, at least, not originally in connection with any other ecclesiastical body, has lost its character as an independent church by coming under the jurisdiction of another ecclesiastical organization, that relation cannot be severed by the majority faction so far as property rights are concerned. Thus, in Winebrenner v. Colder (1862) 43 Pa. 244, where a congregation of the denomination calling itself the "Church of God," which was originally organized with an independent government, or was, at least, not originally in connection with any other ecclesiastical body, subsequently came in connection with an "eldership" and a "general eldership," so-called, formed by the different churches of the denomination; and a schism or division arose because of the refusal of the majority of the local congregation to accept the appointee of the eldership, and their adherence to their former minister, who had been expelled from the church or denomination, it was held that the minority faction, which adhered to the eldership, was entitled to the property of the church. The real question in this case appears to have been whether the local church had lost its original character as an independent church; and the decision seems to rest upon an affirmative answer to that question.

Assuming that there may be a difference of opinion whether the connection is organic or merely voluntary, the result in a particular case may be affected by the showing or assumption by the court in that regard. This is illustrated by Dochkus v. Lithuanian Ben. Soc. 206 Pa. 25, 55 Atl. 779, reversing a decree requiring the trustee to convey the church property to the archbishop. The supreme court said that the error of the trial court in assuming that because a local congregation was a Roman Catholic congregation it was therefore subject to the authority of the Roman Catholic Church, affected the entire proceedings, observing that that question was one of fact to be determined by the evidence, and referring to the testimony of the archbishop that congregations may hold Catholic doctrines and yet ecclesiastically and in the sight of the Roman Catholic Church have no existence.

See also Stein v. Hauser (Sask.) supra, where the decision was rendered upon a different finding or assumption as regards the independence of local Lutheran congregations from that found or assumed in most of the cases dealing with that denomination.

In App v. United Lutheran & German Reformed Cong. (1847) 6 Pa. 201, a minority of a Lutheran church, which had kept possession of the church and adhered to the original faith and synodical relation, was held entitled to the benefit of a fund bequeathed, prior to the division, to the "Lutheran congregation in Selinsgrove," the majority faction having left the church and erected a new church building and changed the synodical relation. The court declared generally that it is the duty of the court to decide in favor of those, whether a minority or majority of the congregation, who are adhering to the doctrine professed by the congregation, and the form of worship, and are also in favor of the government of the church in operation, with which it was connected at the time the trust was declared. There is no reference in the opinion to the point whether or not the connection of the church with the synod was voluntary.

It is further to be observed that the right of the majority faction of an independent society to sever its voluntary relation with another ecclesiastical body is, so far as property rights are concerned, dependent upon the absence of any express trust, or special circumstances raising any implied trust, by which the continuance of the connection is made a condition of the use of the property.

Thus, the refusal of the court in Sarver's Appeal (1874) 81 Pa. 183, to accept as conclusive in the determination of property rights the action of a majority faction of a Lutheran church in continuing as pastor one who had dissolved his relation with a certain synod, was upon the ground that it was expressly provided by the charter of the society that the pastor should be a member of the synod.

So, in Rodgers v. Burnett (1901) 108 Tenn. 173, 65 S. W. 408, the bill of the complainant faction—whether a majority or not does not appear—of a Lutheran church, for the control of the church property, was dismissed upon the ground that the withdrawal of that faction from the synod violated the condition in the deed of the property “for the only use as a church, and controlled by the Evangelical Lutheran Church of the Holston Synod.”

So, while the court in Suter v. Spangler (1861) 4 Phila. (Pa.) 381, held, contrary to the contention of the complainants, that the local society, which was originally not in connection with any other ecclesiastical organization, did not, by its subsequent union with the Synod of the Reformed Dutch Church, become indissolubly connected with, and permanently subject to the jurisdiction of, the synod, it nevertheless granted an injunction in their favor to prevent one who did not receive the Calvinistic theology from officiating as clergyman, the church having been founded as a Calvinistic church.

A civil court may, of course, refuse to give effect, so far as property is concerned, to an attempted change of voluntary relations, if the action to that end was not taken in substantial compliance with the laws of the society.

Thus the decision in Rottmann v.

Barthling (1887) 22 Neb. 375, 85 N. W. 126, against a faction of an Evangelical Lutheran church which had undertaken to change its synodical relations, was upon the ground that the action was taken without giving the notice required by the constitution and without complying with its terms in other respects. The court observed that in determining the question of the legitimate succession of a religious society where a separation has taken place, the court will adopt the rules of such society and enforce its polity in the spirit and to the effect for which it was designed.

VIII. Adhering to voluntary ecclesiastical connection.

As a majority faction of an independent society may sever a voluntary connection with another body (supra, VII.), so it may adhere to a voluntary connection against the wishes of the minority, who desire to sever it, at least where the continuance of that connection involves no repudiation of the fundamental doctrine or tenets of the society. Thus, in Dressen v. Brameier (1881) 56 Iowa, 756, 9 N. W. 193, the decision in favor of a majority faction which had decided to adhere to the Iowa synod under whose jurisdiction the church had voluntarily placed itself and against the minority who had voted to withdraw from that synod and join the Missouri synod, notwithstanding the allegation that the Iowa synod had departed from the Lutheran faith and doctrine. The court said that, conceding that it was its province to determine whether or not the Iowa synod conformed to the Lutheran faith and doctrine, it would conclude from the evidence, though with some doubt, that that synod had not departed from such faith and doctrine.

In Windley v. McCliney (1913) 161 N. C. 318, 77 S. E. 226, where the deed was made to “Trustees of the Free Will Baptist Church of Pantego,” the congregation afterwards united with other churches and changed its designation to the “United American Free Will Baptist Church.” Subsequently a minority of the local church objected to a revision of the discipline for which the delegate of the local church had voted, his action being indorsed by a majority of the members. The minority, styling themselves simply the "Free Will Baptist Church," claimed control because that was the original designation of the church at the time the deed was made. The court, after an examination of the discipline, having found that it did not change in any way the identity of the local church, affirmed a judgment which excluded neither faction from the use of the building, but recognized the ownership and control of the property as being in the whole membership "and that their will must be controlled by the majority." The court observed in effect that the local church did not lose its independence or its identity as the "Free Will Baptist Church of Pantego" by joining the association.

So, in Landis's Appeal (1883) 102 Pa. 467, the decision was in favor of the majority faction of a Mennonite congregation, independent in government, which adhered to a general conference, and against the minority faction which gave their adherence to a new conference. In this case, however, the minority were professedly dissenters from the Mennonite doctrines and seem to have had no color of right except that they had been permitted by the majority faction to use the church property on alternate Sabbaths for a number of years.

The report of Hadden v. Chorn (1847) 8 B. Mon. (Ky.) 70, involving a controversy between rival factions of a Baptist church over the church property, is not very clear as to the nature or cause of the schism; but the main decision was against a faction, found to be in the minority, that had assumed to dissolve the relations of the church with the North District Association. The court was also of the opinion that, independently of the complainants being the majority faction, they should be regarded as the church, they, unlike the defendants (minority faction), not having altered the meeting days, or professed to "come out" from the church, or having had any new organization or convention. There was also a question in the case under the Kentucky statute providing for a divided use of the church property in certain circumstances, which is not within the scope of this note.

When a religious society or congregation becomes incorporated, the temporalities, agreeably to the terms of the statute, become subject to the control of the trustees of the corporate body, which is to be distinguished from the church as such. So long as they act within the powers conferred upon them by the statute under which the corporation is created, and do not divert the property from the express or implied trusts to which it is subject, these trustees are entitled to the management and control of the property even if their acts and policy are opposed to the wishes of the members of the church as such. Thus, in Baptist Congregation v. Scannel, 3 Grant, Cas. (Pa.) 48, the court, at the instance of the trustees of an incorporated Baptist society, elected by the members of the incorporated society, enjoined interference with their control of the church property by defendants who were acting under a resolution of a regular church meeting, that is, a meeting of the communing members of the church. The court observed that a meeting of the church members as such is not a meeting of the incorporated society, and cannot instruct the trustees in their duties or assume any power over them. It does not appear in this case that there was any claim on the part of the defendants that the trustees were recreant to any fundamental doctrines, or to the distinctive polity of the Baptist denomination. Some courts, however, have adopted the view that the trustees of the corporation are independent even of restraints imposed by the fundamental religious doctrines or characteristic polity of the denomination to which the church belongs; in other words, that the corporation bears no ecclesiastical or denominational character at all. In First Baptist Church v. Witherall (1832) 3 Paige (N. Y.) 296, 24 Am. Dec.

228, Chancellor Walworth held that the decision of a council of Baptist churches in favor of the minority faction of a local society upon questions of faith and practice was not binding upon the trustees elected by the majority of the society or congregation, which became incorporated after such decision, even if they had been rightfully excluded from the communion and fellowship of the church. The decision depended upon a distinction which the chancellor made between the congregation, which was the incorporated body, and the church, strictly so called. He observed that the church members had no greater right than the other members of the society who statedly attended with them for the purposes of divine worship so far as the management of the incorporated society and its property was concerned. The allegations of the bill filed by the minority faction in this case were not sufficient to show that there had been a diversion of the property by the trustees from the implied trust in respect of fundamental doctrines of the denomination. The chancellor, however, confessed that he had always entertained serious doubts whether any civil tribunal in the state could interfere to prevent a majority of the corporators in a religious society from introducing such changes in the doctrines or modes of worship in their churches as they might deem fit, and which they could introduce through their trustees elected in the manner prescribed by law. In harmony with this intimation a doctrine at one time prevailed in New York which in effect put it within the power of the majority of an incorporated society, acting through the trustees of the corporation, elected by them, to determine the ecclesiastical connections and religious doctrines to the support and maintenance of which the property of the society, not subject to express conditions subsequent, should be devoted. In other words, the temporalities of the church, in the absence of an express trust, were subject to the absolute control of the trustees of the legal corporation, which bore no denominational character.

This doctrine was applied in Petty v. Tooker (1860) 21 N. Y. 267, by holding that the trustees of the corporation, representing a majority faction of a church organized as a Congregational church, could apply the property to the support of the majority faction, which had been received in connection with the Presbyterian Church, against the minority faction, which desired to adhere to the original congregational polity. The court said that the change in the character of the congregation of which the plaintiff complained had been brought about, not by the proceedings of the presbytery or the resolutions of the society, but by the action of the trustees in employing a Presbyterian clergyman, and opening the meeting-house to his ministrations, and that this they had the right to do. This doctrine, while in force, was applied in other cases in New York, which are not within the scope of this note because they did not involve independent or congregational societies. It, however, never met with general approval outside of New York. Thus, in Hale v. Everett (1868) 53 N. H. 9, 16 Am. Rep. 82, the court said that it saw very little evidence of any disposition by the courts of any other state to follow the decisions made by the New York court in Petty v. Tooker (N. Y.) supra, and similar cases in that state, unless it may be in some that have statutes similar to that of New York. The doctrine was abrogated in New York, at least as to churches of a denominational character, by a statute passed in 1875, providing, inter alia, that the trustees of a religious corporation should administer the temporalities of the church, and hold and apply the estate and property for the benefit of such corporation, "according to the discipline, rules, and usages of the denomination to which the church members of the corporation belong," and that it should not be lawful for them to divert such property or estate to other purposes.

The general scope and effect of that statute are beyond the scope of the note; but in this connection attention is called to a recent decision of the supreme court at special term, in Re Lloyd's Memorial Cong. Church (1919) 178 N. Y. Supp. 104, denying an application for a change of a corporate name from "Lloyd's Memorial Congregational Church" to Lloyd's Memorial Colored Methodist Episcopal Church," it being admitted that the requested change was an incident of an attempt by the majority against the opposition of the minority faction to affiliate the church with the Colored Methodist Episcopal Church. The court held that the church in question, being organized as a Congregational church, was plainly within the statutory provision above quoted. It, however, was of the opinion that the Religious Corporations Law recognizes a distinction between a "Congregational Church" and an "independent church," and there is, perhaps, an indication that an "independent church," strictly speaking, that is, a church not belonging to any denomination, would not be within the operation of the provision.

X. Divided use.

In Kentucky provision has been made by statute for a divided use of the church property in case of a division within the society; and that statute was applied in Poynter v. Phelps (1908) 129 Ky. 381, 24 L.R.A.(N.S.) 729, 111 S. W. 699, involving a division in an independent religious society. However, as the construction and operation of this statute have involved somewhat intricate and technical points not peculiar to independent societies, no attempt has been made here to deal with it.

In a few instances, apart from statute, the civil courts have considered the question whether the property should be divided or a divided use should be permitted to the rival factions of an independent church.

Thus, in Immanuel's Gemeinde v. Keil (1899) 61 Kan. 65, 58 Pac. 973, it was held not error for a court of equity to decree a sale of the property of a Lutheran church and divide the proceeds among the members who were nearly equally divided by irreconcilable differences in matters of faith and doctrine regarded as vitally essential by each, neither having forfeited any rights to the property under the constitution of the church. Though the church in this case was an independent one, subject to no ecclesiastical superior, the division in the organization was due to the adherence by the respective factions to different synods of the denomination which held vitally different doctrines. The court observed that if the plaintiffs below, among whom were the donors of the land on which the church was built, were asserting that the use of the property should be devoted to the dissemination only of the faith held by the synod to which they adhered, the court would be inclined to sustain their claim under the findings that at the time of the donation of the land on which the church was built, the donors were adherents of that synod, and the minister in charge, at whose solicitation funds were contributed for the erection of the building, was teaching the same belief. The decree for the sale and division of the property, however, was asked for by those plaintiffs, so that they had no cause of complaint.

In Wicks v. Nedrow (1889) 28 Neb. 386, 44 N. W. 457, where a division arose among the members of a Baptist church in regard to matters of discipline, and resulted in a conveyance to the trustees of one faction of an undivided one half of the church property which had been originally conveyed to the trustees of the "German Baptist Church," and thereafter the respective factions occupied the church on alternate Sundays, that arrangement having been continued for four years, the court refused to disturb the arrangement or to cancel the conveyance.

In Huffins v. Sheriff (1916) — Okla. —, 162 Pac. 491, declaring, according to the syllabus by the court, that where irreconcilable conflict has arisen between members of a church (a Baptist church), due to personal differences, and not upon any question of faith or doctrine, a judgment apportioning the use of property is proper. The decision is rendered upon the finding and assumption that the original society had been dissolved so that neither faction represented the society as it existed before the division. It will be observed that upon that hypothesis there was no scope for the principle recognized by the court that if either party voluntarily withdraws from the organization it forfeits and the other party is entitled to, all the property.

In Le Blanc v. Lemaire (1901) 105 La. 539, 50 So. 135, it was held that a small minority of a Baptist church which had seceded from the majority, not on doctrinal grounds or questions of religious faith or worship, but on differences of church government, refusing to acquiesce in the will of the majority, was not entitled to a partition of the property. See also German E. L. Trinity Cong. v. Deutsche Evangelisch Lutherische Dreieinigkeits Gemeinde (1910) 246 Ill. 328, 92 N. E. 868, 20 Ann. Cas. 404, supra, denying a partition between the contending factions.

In Bottom v. Tinsley (1911) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 184 S. W. 833, a suit to enforce specific performance of an agreement by which one faction of a Baptist church was for a consideration, to convey the church property to the other and withdraw, it was held that a good defense was set up by a special answer which, in effect, alleged that a majority had rescinded the previous action, looking to a division.

In a few instances the charter or by-laws of a society has contained an express provision on the subject.

Thus, in Wiswell v. First Cong. Church (1862) 14 Ohio St. 31, the court, while recognizing that members who secede from a church organization thereby forfeit all right to any part of the church property, nevertheless held that a decision by the majority of an incorporated Congregational church, that the interests of the church would be promoted by a division of the membership into two ecclesiastical bodies and an equitable division of the church property, involved no breach of trust, in view of the provision of the charter giving the church the power, with the consent of a majority of its members, to dispose of the property "for the purpose of promoting the interests of their church."

In Peterson v. Christianson (1904) 18 S. D. 470, 101 So. 40, affirming a decree which protected the Swedish faction of an incorporated Lutheran church in the use of the church property part of the time, the by-laws expressly provided that if the two nationalities, Swedes and Norwegians, of which the corporation was composed, should wish to call a minister separately, the church should be used every Sunday and service day in turn.

In Nelson v. Benson (1873) 69 Ill. 27, it was held that the schism contemplated by the constitution of an Evangelical Lutheran church, providing for the partition of property in case of schism, was a division or separation of the church into two religious bodies, and that such a schism did not result where the defendants,—pretending, contrary to the fact, that three of the four trustees who had been previously elected such, and whose terms of office had not expired, had resigned and refused to act,—held a meeting and unlawfully elected three other trustees without the knowledge or consent of the complainants, and thereafter defendants took possession of all the common property of the congregation and excluded complainants therefrom. Limitation of actions — effect of general limitation statute.

1. The limitation imposed in § 1429, creating a right of action for death, is independent of the Statute of Limitations as found in § 7577, Rev. Stat. 1913.

— death — time.

2. Section 1429, Rev. Stat. 1913, creates a right of action which did not exist at common law. It is a condition precedent to the right of recovery granted in this section that the action be brought within two years after the cause of action accrues.

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the District Court for Douglas County (Troup, J.) sustaining a demurrer to the amended petition in an action brought to recover damages for alleged wrongful death of plaintiff's decedent. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Gurley, Fitch, West, & Hickman, for appellant:

Except where it has been otherwise provided by statute an action is deemed commenced so far as the parties to it are concerned, from the time that the writ of summons is sued out.

1 Cyc. 747; 1 R. C. L. ¶ 20, p. 338.

Messrs. Brogan & Ellick, for appellee:

The limitation of two years contained in Rev. Stat. § 1428, is absolute, and is not extended by the absence of the defendant from the state.

25 Cyc. 1021, 1233; Rodman v. Missouri P. R. Co. 65 Kan. 645, 59 L.R.A. 704, 70 Pac. 642; Kavanagh v. Folsom, 181 Fed. 401; Anthony v. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. 108 Ark. 219, 157 S. W. 394; Bretthauer v. Jacobson, 79 N. J. L. 223, 75 Atl. 560; Beebe v. Doster, 36 Kan. 666, 14 Pac. 150; Cushing v. Winterset, 144 Iowa, 260, 122 N. W. 915.

The petition filed by the plaintiff against "J. C. Mardis," without alleging that the first real name of the defendant was unknown to the plaintiff and without the affidavit required by the statute, was void, and did not give the court jurisdiction to proceed.

Gillian v. McDowall, 66 Neb. 814, 92 N. W. 991; Herbage v. McKee, 82 Neb. 354, 117 N. W. 706; Stratton v. McDermott, 89 Neb. 622, 131 N. W. 949, Ann. Cas. 1912C, 616.

The filing of the petition against a defendant who did not reside within the county, and was not in the county at the time of the filing of the petition, gave the court no jurisdiction over the case, unless a valid attachment was secured against the defendant's property.

Mosher v. Huwaldt, 86 Neb. 686, 126 N. W. 143; Coffman v. Brandhoeffler, 33 Neb. 279, 50 N. W. 6; Hoagland v. Wilcox, 42 Neb. 138, 60 N. W. 376; Davis v. Ballard, 38 Neb. 830, 57 N. W. 527; Lamb v. Finch, 87 Neb. 565, 127 N. W. 903.

The pretended attachment in this case was void and conferred no jurisdiction on the court, for the reason that no defendant was named.

Gillian v. McDowall; Herbage v. McKee; and Stratton v. McDermott, supra.

The rule that, in order to suspend the running of the statute, an action shall be deemed commenced at the date of the summons which is served upon the defendant, or at the first publication, applies as well to an action under Rev. Stat. § 1428, as to any other action.

Burlingim v. Cooper, 86 Neb. 78, 53 N. W. 1025; Reliance Trust Co. v. Atherton, 67 Neb. 305, 98 N. W. 150, 96 N. W. 218; Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. v. Young, 67 Neb. 568, 98 N. W. 922.

The appearance of the defendant to the amended petition filed after the statute had run did not relate back to the attempted commencement within the two years.

Hotchkiss v. Aukerman, 65 Neb. 177, 90 N. W. 949; Reliance Trust Co. v. Atherton, 67 Neb. 305, 98 N. W. 150, 96 N. W. 218.

The petition does not state a cause of action, as it does not show that the plaintiff is entitled to recover the damages alleged to have been sustained.

Aldrich, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

On the 15th day of November, 1911, one John Butera came to his death at Omaha, while employed as a workman on what is known as the Flatiron Building. Afterwards, one Paul Gengo became administrator de bonis non of the estate of the said John Butera, deceased, and as such administrator, on December 5, 1913, filed an amended petition against the said John C. Mardis, doing business as the J. C. Mardis Company, charging them with the wrongful death of the decedent. This action was commenced under and by virtue of the provisions of § 1429, art. 8, chap. 17, Rev. Stat. 1913: "Actions by or against executors." A demurrer was filed to this petition, and, after submission and argument, was sustained; the decision being that the petition did not state a cause of action, as more than two years had elapsed from the accruing of said cause to the beginning of the action. The purpose of said § 1429, commonly known as Lord Campbell's Act, was to prescribe limitations and a remedy for a cause of action which did not exist at common law, for at common law the cause of action died with the death of the claimant. This statute was enacted to provide a remedy and to entitle representatives of the deceased person to begin a cause of action because of wrongful death of the deceased, and that it should be commenced by an administrator, duly qualifying and acting; so that said injured relative might obtain a pecuniary benefit resulting from said wrongful injury, or death.

It is also provided in said act that every such action shall be commenced within two years after the death of said person. This provision is contrary to the general statutory provision with respect to limitations, for that section of said general statute provides that when the party wanted places himself without the jurisdiction of the court, absconds, or stays in hiding so that service cannot be had upon him, then in that case the statute shall cease to operate; while, in the case at bar, the section of the statute under which this action is brought has its provisions checked and hemmed in as hereinbefore stated, and every action brought under it must be commenced within two years. Then the proposition is: As this action was not commenced for more than two years, does the petition state a cause of action? We are met with the proposition that we should construe the Statute of Limitations as provided for in § 1429, together with § 7577, Rev. Stat. 1913, and the toll for the time which defendant stayed away from the jurisdiction of the court should be allowed, and, if this was done, then the petition states a cause of action. We are deciding the proposition and construing § 1429 for the purpose of ascertaining whether the limitations provided in said section should be construed so as to give it effect, or whether it should be construed so as to modify and limit its provisions so as to bring it under the general Statute of Limitations in § 7577. While it is true that § 7577 provides that the Statute of Limitations will not run during the time the defendant is absent from the state, absconds, or keeps himself from the jurisdiction of the court, it is also true that in square contradiction to this, and against it, is the section on the Statute of Limitations provided in § 1429. The question is: Which shall prevail? This is an important case, because it contains a proposition that is decisive of this question and determines the issue.

It is our opinion that as § 1429 is a mere paragraph that comprises an entire act beginning with 1420, and was made with reference to this principal act and independent of any other, it was made to control and provide absolutely a time within which an action shall be commenced. If it were not so, then it would have been very easy for the legislature to have the same saving clause that is found under § 7577, but inasmuch as it does not contain any exception, or any such provision, and no saving clause whatever, it is evident that it means just what it says; and, if it does, then the demurrer in this case was rightly sustained, and the action properly dismissed. If there was any saving clause provided for in this § 1429, why was it not placed there? If it intended to provide a condition which modifies and stops the Statute of Limitations, then why did it not say so? The answer is: It was never intended to be any other way than the way that we find it. This statute is not alone peculiar to Nebraska in this provision, but is a provision that has been enacted in many other states of the Union. Lord Campbell's Act is in force today, and has been for many years in the states of New York, Arkansas, and Kansas, and we have interpretations given by the supreme courts of each of these states with reference to the particular matter in hand. See Kavanagh v. Folsom (C. C.) 181 Fed. 401. Also it may be stated that both by principle and analogy the legislature meant to put in this statute the limitation which it did, and which has been interpreted as above stated by the courts. Whenever the legislature makes a law to meet a situation not met by the common law, the legislature has the inherent right to provide whatever it may deem proper and essential to meet a particular situation not heretofore met. For instance, the Nebraska legislature has enacted statutes fixing the limitation thereto different from the general Statutes of Limitations. For instance, the common law did not provide a remedy for one receiving an injury while traveling over a county bridge, and to meet this demand the legislature passed an act, § 2995, Rev. Stat. 1913 (Laws 1889, chap. 7), for the purpose of making counties liable for damage to person or property. Section 2995 reads in part: "Provided, however, that such action is commenced within thirty days of the time of the injury or damage occurring."

Then here in this statute is another statute with reference to the county's liability in an action growing out of defective bridges that makes a Statute of Limitations peculiar to and especially provides for the very act itself. Then when the legislature passed Lord Campbell's Act, and gave it a Statute of Limitations peculiar to itself, it simply was doing what it had heretofore done, and so has been, and is, recognized as peculiar to the inherent power of the legislature itself. This act, with this special provision of the statute of thirty days' limitation, has been held by this court to be constitutional. If then it is constitutional to enact a Statute of Limitation limiting liability to within thirty days, why is it not constitutional and proper to pass a statute limiting an act to twenty-four months? The same authority, or body of lawmakers that enacted § 2995, enacted § 1429, and each law-making body operated and worked and passed this law under the same

Constitution, and if, as has been held, it was constitutional to do the one, under the same, or similar circumstances, it would be constitutional to do the other under a like situation. In the case of South Omaha v. McGavock, 72 Neb. 382, 100 N. W. 805, it is held: "Where a statute grants a new remedy, and at the same time places a limitation of time within which the person complaining must act, the limitation is a limitation of the right as well as of the remedy, and, in the absence of qualifying provisions or saving clauses, the party seeking to avail himself of the remedy must bring himself strictly within the limitations."

Now by analogy this case is absolutely pat, and on the proposition that the legislature in making a special act has a right to attach to this provision a Statute of Limitations that will provide for a different time than the time provided for in the general statute, and this court has sustained that proposition and the constitutionality of such law. Then the plaintiff in this action, it follows, is bound in seeking his remedy to bring himself strictly within the limitations provided in Lord Campbell's Act. See Swaney v. Gage County, 64 Neb. 627, 90 N. W. 542. In the case of Ellis v. Kearney, 80 Neb. 51, 113 N. W. 803, we have by analogy a case absolutely in point. We have in that case the situation where plaintiff was physically incapacitated to perform a duty enjoined by law; that is, in bringing the action within a certain time. This court held that the law does not excuse nonperformance, and that such a situation is not available to extend the time, or offer an opportunity to fix statutory liability upon another, and in support of this proposition cites Schmidt v. Fremont, 70 Neb. 577, 97 N. W. 830. In that case, which by analogy is the precise situation we have here, we find this court following the same and approving it. In this case (Ellis v. Kearney, supra) the court says:

"The plaintiff asks this court to hold that the oral notice would suffice. To do so would be to nullify the statute. It is not the province of the courts to make the law, or read into it exceptions not intended by the lawmakers."

Where is there a scintilla of an excuse to read something into Lord Campbell's Act that was not intended by the lawmakers? Nor is there, directly or indirectly, any intention to do the thing which they did not do. To do so would be to nullify the statute and place a construction and meaning that was never intended by the legislature. In Madden v. Lancaster County, 12 C. C. A. 566, 27 U. S. App. 528, 65 Fed. 188, we have a case that went to the Federal court on the question of the Statute of Limitations in the special statute in the Special Road Act, which provided that an action must be "brought within thirty days after the injury." The court held: It "does not violate the Constitution of that state, either by granting to counties a special immunity, or by amending the general Statute of Limitations without containing or repealing the section amended, since, before the passage of said act, counties were not liable to suit, and the act imposed a new liability, which might be limited in any way the legislature saw fit."

That is the precise situation in the case at bar. Before the passage of the Lord Campbell Act, there was no provision for damages growing out of injury by death, and this act meets that situation. Therefore the legislature had the right to limit it in any way it saw fit. It always follows that where a statute creates a new right of action, as Lord Campbell's Act does, a provision and limitation of time within which an action must be brought, an objection cannot be made that the time is unreasonably short and cannot be entertained. Thus in said action of Madden v. Lancaster County, supra, we find a very learned discussion and the statute upheld, in an opinion handed down by Judge Sanborn.

It has also been held by this court, in the case of Woods v. Colfax County, 10 Neb. 552, 7 N. W. 269, that a county is not liable for an action, or negligence of action by its officers, unless made so by legislative enactment, and sustain the action under the act of 1889 making counties liable. Then the proposition looks, both from the standpoint of principle and analogy, that these decisions settle the question at bar, and it cannot be denied that the legislature has the right to fix any time it pleases in the matter of limitations to any special act passed by it.

In the case of Anthony v. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. 108 Ark. 219, 157 S. W. 394, it was held: "In an action against a railway company for damages for the wrongful killing of plaintiff's father, when the complaint shows on its face that the action was not brought within the two years required by the statute, . . . the defendant may avail himself of the objection by demurrer."

Now this is a case in which the Statute of Limitations requires the action to be brought within two years, and if in that case, under a statute similar to our own, a defendant may avail himself of the objection by a demurrer, why can he not do it in this case? In the Arkansas case the court also held: "In actions for wrongful death, such actions shall be commenced within two years after the death of such person, since the two statutes relate to different subjects, and there is no necessary repugnance between their provisions."

Then we have a case here that is the same, or similar, with respect to statutes of limitations, that we find in the case at bar, wherein, in the state of Arkansas, we have a general Statute of Limitations providing for a longer and different time than under Lord Campbell's Act. We find the Arkansas supreme court upheld absolutely the limitation of two years as provided for in Lord Campbell's Act.

In the case of Rodman v. Missouri P. R. Co. 65 Kan. 645, 59 L.R.A. 704, 70 Pac. 642, we have the same situation, the same question that we have in the case at bar, and that is: What are the limitations of actions growing out of death by wrongful act? In § 422 of the Code of Civil Procedure (Kan. Gen. Stat. 1901, § 4871), we have what is known as the Lord Campbell's Act, providing for damage growing out of death by wrongful act which did not exist at common law. Therefore it is interesting to note what the Kansas supreme court holds upon that point. This Kansas court says: "The limitation of two years prescribed in the act in which such action must be commenced is a condition imposed upon the exercise of the right of action granted, and this time is not extended by the pendency and dismissal of a former action, as provided in § 23 of the Code."

Thus these courts hold, wherever Lord Campbell's Act has been interpreted, that the right conferred in such statute is a conditional one, and that plaintiffs in such actions must bring themselves clearly within the prescribed conditions necessary to conferring the right of action. So the plaintiff in this case, in seeking remedy under the provisions of Lord Campbell's Act, had to bring himself clearly within the prescribed conditions necessary to conferring the right of action. In support of these views, see Bretthauer v. Jacobson, 79 N. J. L. 223, 75 Atl. 560; Anthony v. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. supra; and Beebe v. Doster, 36 Kan. 666, 14 Pac. 150. Therefore both from fact and analogy, and from the plain provisions of Lord Campbell's Act, we conclude that as the plaintiff, John Butera, was killed on November 15, 1911, and this action was instituted on December 5, 1913, that more than two years have elapsed from the death to the filing of the petition, and the issuance of the summons.

Lord Campbell's Act is denominated by the New Jersey supreme court as the "death act," and, continuing, that court says: "But this provision of the death act is not an ordinary Statute of Limitations. It operates, not only as a limitation of the remedy given the plaintiff, but also as a limitation of the liability which it creates against defendants."

See Bretthauer v. Jacobson, 79 N. J. L. 225, 75 Atl. 562.

This is the real tenor of this act, and this interpretation is put upon it by all the courts speaking with respect to the provisions of the act. New York, Kansas, and Arkansas, without qualification, have held, in cases precisely like the one at bar, that the Statute of Limitations, here involved, fixed not only the limitation of the liability, but the time in which cases may be brought, and by analogy, in a state having a special limitation, this court has held the same thing.

Then, in view of this discussion herein submitted, we conclude that § 1429, Rev. Stat. 1913, creates a right of action for damages by death by wrongful act, which did not exist at common law. The enactment of Lord Campbell's Act provides a rule —death—time. for the Statute of Limitations which must operate as a condition precedent to a right of action; the time the statute fixes is two years, and the provision is absolute; as it has no saving clause, it must be strictly adhered to.

The finding of the trial judge is in accordance with law and must be affirmed.

Rose, J., took no part in the decision.

Sedgwick, J., dissenting:

Ancient rules for construing statutes were more or less arbitrary, but formerly they were pretty strictly followed by some courts. In some cases those rules resulted in giving to statutes a meaning that clearly the lawmakers never intended. In modern times the courts, at least some of them, are more careful to ascertain the real intention and meaning of legislation. If, from the purpose of the statute, that is the defect in the law that it was proposed to remedy, in view of existing conditions that are known by everybody, and the form and language of the statute itself, the real intention and meaning of the legislature can be ascertained, that intention and meaning should control the courts.

Under the present decision, a defendant who has laid himself liable for damages under the statute construed can defeat the claim for damages and relieve himself from all liability by absconding or concealing himself until the limitation named in the statute has expired. No other Statute of Limitations is construed to permit this result. Did the legislature intend such a result? They reduced the limitation for ordinary actions for which there is no specific limitation provided in the general Code, from four to two years, which is a longer period than is provided for various actions particularly specified. They gave the injured party a new right of action, a remedy which he did not have before, and we all agree that he must accept the limitation which the legislature saw fit to place upon that remedy. Did the lawmakers intend to make that remedy depend upon a contingency that might be under the control of the very party against whom the remedy is given? There is a general provision of the Code: "If, when a cause of action accrues against a person, he be out of the state, or shall have absconded or concealed himself, the period limited for the commencement of the action shall not begin to run until he come into the state, or while he is absconded or concealed." Rev. Stat. 1913, § 7577.

The act we are construing has a special limitation, which is in positive language, "Every such action shall be commenced within two years after the death of such person" (Rev. Stat. 1913, § 1429), and will not admit of an exception or qualification. This is an established rule of construction and has been frequently applied in this state, and in fact the plaintiff concedes in his brief that this rule applies in this case; but the majority opinion is entirely devoted to its discussion. Conceding then that such actions "must be commenced within two years," what shall we say as to the intention of the legislature as to when such action shall be deemed to be commenced? There is a general provision of the Code that "an action shall be deemed commenced, within the meaning of this chapter, as to the defendant, at the date of the summons which is served upon him." Rev. Stat. 1913, § 7580.

This is in derogation of the common law. The general rule is that an action is deemed commenced, within the meaning of the limitation statutes, when the pleadings are filed in court and summons issued, and a good-faith attempt to get service is made. 1 Cyc. 747; 1 R. C. L. p. 338, § 20. In enacting the statute we are construing, did the legislature intend that this special statute should apply to the new act, or was the act made complete in itself as to this as well as the other special provisions of the Code, relying upon the common-law rule? This is the question discussed and relied upon by the plaintiff in his brief, but ignored in the majority opinion, which discusses at large, and with some repetition, the point which is conceded. The statute expressly names and fixes the period of limitation, and, although so much depends upon the meaning which it was intended to give to the words, "shall be commenced," there is no express explanation or provision upon that point in the act. The defendant properly urged this fact as indicating that it was intended that the special provision of the Code as to when an action is deemed to be commenced shall apply to this act. But this suggestion is not, as it seems to me, sufficient to determine the matter. Section 7580 expressly limits its application to the actions specified in the chapter of which it is a part, "An action shall be deemed commenced within the meaning of this chapter," thereby expressly limiting its application to statutes under which the limitation is not allowed to run while the defendant conceals himself and cannot be served. Since, in this act, the two years' limitation is absolute whether service can or cannot be made, it begins to run when the action is commenced. As to when an action should be deemed commenced, a peculiar provision, not one generally recognized, expressly made applicable to a particular chapter of the Code, would not necessarily be thought to apply to a separate and distinct act which disregarded other important provisions of the general Code. If the thought had occurred to the lawmakers that the courts might technically apply some ancient rules of construction and hold that one special provision of the general Code had been rejected and another retained, and so their remedy would be rendered nugatory whenever the defendant could evade service, they would have declared more definitely the intention of the statute. When we consider the defect in the law which this statute was intended to remedy, the conditions then existing which are well known by all, and the statutes then existing, we must conclude from a consideration of this statute itself, that the intention of the legislature was that under this statute an action is deemed commenced as the common law declares. In this case the plaintiff acted in good faith and commenced an action before the two years expired, had summons issued, and had a summons in garnishment also issued. The garnishment summons was properly served, and the garnishee appeared specially and made some objections to the form of the petition, and a new garnishment summons was issued, so that, if Lord Campbell's Act is complete in itself and an action is deemed to be commenced as at common law and without reference to the special provisions of the Code, the action was in time.

The legislature never intended that a just cause of action could be defeated as this action is now defeated.

NOTE.

The applicability to the limitation prescribed by a statute which creates a cause of action for death, of exceptions, express or implied, which attach to general Statutes of Limitation, is the subject of the annotation following KERLEY v. HOEHMAN, post, 145, the exception as to nonresidence being specifically treated in subdivision IV. of that note.

W. W. KERLEY, Plff. in Err.,
v.
ARTHUR P. HOEHMAN et al.

(— Okla. —, 188 Pac. 980.)

Limitation of action — action for death — time as condition — effect of general statute.

1. The time fixed for the commencement of an action unknown to the common law, by statute which creates or permits the action, is a condition of the liability and action thus created, and not a statute of limitation. It is a statute of creation, and the commencement of the action within the time it fixes is an indispensable condition to the liability and of the action which it permits.

Death — concealment of cause — extension of time for action.

2. Section 5281, Rev. Laws 1910 (§ 4313, Stat. 1893), creates a right of action for damages for death by wrongful act which did not exist at common law, and which does not obtain in the absence of such act. The limitation of two years prescribed in the act, in which such action must be commenced, is a condition imposed upon the exercise of the right of action granted, and this time is not extended by reason of the fraudulent concealment of the cause of death.

ERROR to the District Court for Caddo County (Linn, J.) to review a judgment in favor of plaintiffs in an action brought to recover damages for the death of their child, alleged to have been caused by defendant's wrongful act. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the Commissioner's opinion.

Mr. A. J. Morris, for plaintiff in error:

The limitation of time in which the action must be commenced is an indispensable condition of the liability and of the action which it permits; and if the action is not commenced within the time specified by statute, the right of action ceases to exist; and no excuse, no matter what it may be, for the delay in bringing the action, will avail.

Edwards, C., filed the following opinion:

For convenience the parties will be referred to as plaintiffs and defendant, according to their position in the lower court.

The record discloses: That the plaintiffs are husband and wife and parents of Robert Hoehman, deceased. That defendant is a practising physician and was the attending physician at the birth of said Robert Hoehman, a normal, healthy child, born July 6, 1911. That a few days after the birth of said Robert Hoehman the defendant, as a physician, had prescribed for one Hoops, a cousin of the plaintiff Arthur P. Hoehman. The said Hoops was a young man, about grown, who lived near and on the same farm as the plaintiffs. That on the 20th day of July, the plaintiff Arthur P. Hoehman went to the office of the defendant, paid him for his services as attending physician at the birth of said Robert Hoehman, and the defendant then inquired about the boy, meaning the cousin, Hoops, the inquiry, however, being understood by the plaintiff Hoehman as referring to his infant son, Robert Hoehman, and the plaintiff Arthur P. Hoehman thereupon answered in substance that the boy was suffering from stomach trouble, and asked the defendant to give him something for the trouble, and thereupon the defendant wrote and gave to the plaintiff Arthur P. Hoehman a prescription, believing that the same was intended for the cousin, Hoops. The plaintiff had the prescription filled at a drug store, returned home, and some time in the afternoon was about to administer a dose of the medicine to the infant; but, the medicine appearing to him to be laudanum, before administering same he called up the defendant by telephone and inquired if it would be all right to give the medicine, as it looked like laudanum. The defendant answered, in substance, that if the prescription was filled as given by him it would be all right. The plaintiff then gave the infant a dose of the medicine, and later, observing that the child appeared to be turning purple in color and was very ill, again called up the defendant and requested his presence. The defendant went to the farm occupied by the plaintiffs, but, on arriving there, first went to the house of Hoops, still believing that he was the person for whom he had been called upon to prescribe. There, finding Hoops apparently well, he inquired who had called him, and was then directed to the house of the plaintiffs. Upon reaching the house of plaintiffs, he found the infant child very ill from the effects of the medicine prescribed, and from the effects of which it died during the night following. There is some controversy as to exactly what occurred when the defendant arrived at the house and during his attendance there; but it is uncontroverted that he poured out the medicine which had been prescribed and used the bottle as a container or measure for other medicines then administered by him. On the following morning, the defendant went to the druggist who had filled the prescription and substituted another prescription for the one which he had given plaintiff the day before, and the former prescription was withdrawn from the files but retained at the drug store. After the death of the child, the plaintiff Arthur P. Hoehman called at the drug store for a copy of the prescription, and was given a copy of the one which had been substituted by the defendant. This substitute prescription plaintiff had filled and later analyzed, and from the analysis believed that the prescription was not, within itself, dangerous, but had been incorrectly compounded. The evidence is somewhat controverted, yet it appears that it was some eighteen months later before he learned the real facts as to the change in prescription. It was considerably more than two years from the death of the child until this suit was instituted.

The amended petition sets out the circumstances substantially as stated, and alleges that no administrator has been appointed, and sets out the concealment of the cause of the death as a reason for bringing the suit after two years. Damages in the sum of $20,000 are prayed. A demurrer was filed by the defendant, overruled, and exceptions saved, and an answer by way of general denial then filed. The evidence supports the allegations of the petition as to the manner and cause of death. It is also admitted by the defendant that the death of the infant child was caused from administering the medicine as prescribed. Judgment was for the plaintiff in the sum of $1,000. Motion for a new trial was filed, overruled, and exceptions saved, and in due time the defendant prosecutes his appeal to this court.

The question to determine, then, is whether or not this action, being an action for wrongful death, instituted more than two years after the cause of action accrued, can be maintained. The action is based upon § 5281 of the Revised Laws of 1910, which is as follows: "When the death of one is caused by the wrongful act or omission of another, the personal representatives of the former may maintain an action therefor against the latter, if the former might have maintained an action had he lived, against the latter for an injury for the same act or omission. The action must be commenced within two years. The damages must inure to the exclusive benefit of the widow and children, if any, or next of kin, to be distributed in the same manner as personal property of the deceased."

Under this section of the law the defendant contends that the limitation, being contained in that section of the law which gives the right of action, is not the usual statute of limitations which operates against the remedy, but is a limitation upon the very right itself, and that no excuse for delay in commencement of the action for more than two years will avail.

The plaintiff, on the contrary, contends that the right of action is given by § 7, art. 23, of the Constitution, which reads: "The right of action to recover damages for injuries resulting in death shall never be abrogated and the amount recoverable shall not be subject to any statutory limitation," and that the sentence in § 5281, supra, which provides that the action must be commenced within two years, is nothing more than a statutory limitation, and is no part of the right of action, and such fixing of the time can only be construed as a statute of limitation.

From an examination of the Constitution and statutes, we believe it is clear that the Constitution does not create the right of action, but merely continues the right which had, before the adoption of the Constitution, been created by statute, and was, at the time of the adoption of the Constitution, a part of the statute law.

Upon the question of whether or not the limitation expressed in this section of the statute is a limitation upon the right to maintain the action, as contended by defendant, or is the usual statutory limitation, we find the authorities to uniformly hold that it is a limitation upon the very right itself. The general rule upon this subject is expressed as follows:

"Inasmuch as the act which creates the limitation also creates the action to which it applies, the limitation is not merely of the remedy, but is of the right of action itself." Tiffany on Death by Wrongful Act, 2d ed. § 121.

"It seems that provisions in the statutes authorizing actions for wrongful death which limit the time within which the actions shall be brought are not properly statutes of limitation as that term is generally used. They are qualifications restricting the rights granted by the statutes, and must be strictly complied with. As the statutes confer a new right of action, no explanations as to why the suit was not brought within the specified time will avail unless the statutes themselves provide a saving clause." 6 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. 875.

"Where the statute, giving a right of action for death by wrongful act, limits the time within which such action must be brought to a certain designated period, and contains no saving clause, an action sought to be brought after the expiration of such period, is barred, and no excuse will be recognized for such delay." 13 Cyc. 339.

This statute was adopted from Kansas, and has several times been before the supreme court of that state. In the case of Rodman v.

Missouri P. R. Co. 65 Kan. 645, 59 L.R.A. 704, 70 Pac. 642, the court holds: "Section 422 of the Civil Code . . . creates a right of action for damages for death by wrongful act which did not exist at common law, and which does not obtain in the absence of such act. The limitation of two years prescribed in the act in which such action must be commenced is a condition imposed upon the exercise of the right of action granted, and this time is not extended by the pendency and dismissal of a former action, as provided in § 23 of the Code."

The courts of other states having a statute in substance the same as the section under consideration, except generally for a difference in the time within which the suit is to be brought, likewise hold that the limitation is upon the right to maintain the action, and that no excuse for not bringing the action within the time fixed by the statute will avail.

In Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Chamblee, 171 Ala. 188, 54 So. 681, Ann. Cas. 1913A, 977, it is said: "This period of two years is of the essence of the newly, by the statute, conferred right of action, and the plaintiff has the burden of affirmatively showing that his action was commenced within the period provided. It is not a limitation against the exercise of the remedy only."

In Taylor v. Cranberry Iron & Coal Co. 94 N. C. 525, the court holds: "This is not strictly a statute of limitation. It gives a right of action that would not otherwise exist, and the action to enforce it must be brought within one year after the death of the testator or intestate, else the right of action will be lost. It must be accepted in all respects as the statute gives it. Why the action was not brought within the time does not appear, but any explanation in that respect would be unavailing, as there is no saving clause as to the time within which the action must be begun."

In Lambert v. Ensing Mfg. Co. 42

W. Va. 813, 26 S. E. 431, the court says: "But here the cause of action did not exist at common law, but is created by statute. The bringing of the suit within two years from the death of the person whose death has been caused by wrongful act is made an essential element of the right to sue, and it must be accepted in all respects as the statute gives it. And it is made absolute, without saving or qualification of any kind whatever. There is no opening for explanation or excuse. Therefore, strictly speaking, it is not a statute of limitation."

To the same general effect are the following cases: Barker v. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. 91 Mo. 86, 14 S. W. 280; Williams v. Quebec S. S. Co. (D. C.) 126 Fed. 591; Western Coal & Min. Co. v. Hise, 132 C. C. A. 482, 216 Fed. 338; Anthony v. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. 108 Ark. 219, 157 S. W. 394; Gulledge v. Seaboard Air Line R. Co. 147 N. C. 234, 125 Am. St. Rep. 544, 60 S. E. 1134; Poff v. New England Teleph. & Teleg. Co. 72 N. H. 164, 55 Atl. 891; The Harrisburg, 119 U. S. 199, 30 L. ed. 358, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 140.

In Partee v. St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. 51 L.R.A.(N.S.) 721, 123 C. C. A. 292, 204 Fed. 970, a case appealed to the circuit court of appeals from the eastern district of Oklahoma, involving a construction of § 5945 of the Compiled Laws of 1909, being the same as § 5281 of the Revised Laws of 1910, except for omitting the limitation upon the amount of the recovery as contained in the Laws of 1909, the circuit court of appeals construes this particular section, cites many authorities in support thereof, and holds (syllabus):

"The time fixed for the commencement of an action unknown to the common law, by act of Congress or statute which creates or permits the action, is a condition of the liability and action thus created, and not a statute of limitations.

Limitation of action—action for death—time as condition—effect of general statute.

"A special statute upon a particular subject and a general law must stand together, the one as the law of the specific subject and the other as the general rule, unless it clearly appears that it was the intention of the legislature to modify or repeal one or the other."

The cause of action accrues at the death for which the recovery is sought. Tiffany, Death by Wrongful Act, § 122, note; Kennedy v. Burrier, 36 Mo. 128. There would seem, then, to be no question but that the limitation imposed by § 5281, supra, is absolute; that the right of action is tendered on the condition that suit be commenced within two years; that no excuse for failure to bring the suit within that time will avail.

It follows that the action must be reversed and remanded, with directions to the lower court to sustain the demurrer to the petition and dismiss the action.

I. Introductory.

This note deals with the question whether a limitation period specifically prescribed in a statute creating a right of action for death is affected by the express or implied exceptions to the running of the general Statute of Limitations. Those cases are not included which involve a statute in which no period of limitation is provided, except where the statute which is the basis of the action is considered as impliedly limited by a period prescribed in another similar statute. No consideration is taken of cases wherein it appears that the period of limitation for the bringing of an action for death by wrongful act has been included in the general Statute of Limitations.

II. Appointment of representative.

It has been held in some jurisdictions, in accordance with the general rule, applicable to the Statute of Limitations, that a limitation period prescribed in a statute creating a cause of action for wrongful death, etc., does not begin to run until a representative has been appointed for the decedent. American R. Co. v. Coronas (1916) L.R.A.1916E, 1095, 144 C. C. A. 599, 230 Fed. 545, 12 N. C. C. A. 49; Bird v. Ft. Worth & R. G. R. Co. (1918) — Tex. —, 207 S. W. 518.

American R. Co. v. Coronas (Fed.) supra, was an action brought by an administrator to recover for the death of his intestate from injuries incurred while employed by the defendant. The death occurred in December, 1908, letters of administration were granted to the plaintiff in May, 1914, and this action was commenced in December of the same year. The Federal Employers' Liability Act (35 Stat. at L. 65, chap. 149, Comp. Stat. § 8657, 8 Fed. Stat. Anno. 2d ed. p. 1208), under which the suit was brought, provided that "no action shall be maintained under this act unless commenced within two years from the day the cause of action accrued," and the question arose whether the cause of action was to be considered as accruing at the death of the intestate, or at the time of the appointment of an administrator. The court called attention to the fact that ordinarily a statute of limitations was considered as running from the appointment of an administrator where the cause of action arose after death and no one else was capable of suing, and said: "In view of the well-recognized rule heretofore pointed out as to when a right of action accrues,—which Congress must have had in mind when enacting the present law,—and in view of the fact that Lord Campbell's Act, upon which the Employers' Liability Act was modeled, expressly provided that the limitation should run from the death of the injured party, and that, in the enactment of the present law, Congress declined to adopt such a limitation, and fixed the period from the time the action accrued, we are of the opinion that the proper construction of the statute is that the right of action did not accrue, so that the limitation attached, until the administrator was appointed, and that the demurrer was properly overruled."

In Bird v. Ft. Worth & R. G. R. Co. (Tex.) supra, it appeared that the plaintiff's husband was killed on October 11, 1911, that suit was instituted March 21, 1913, and that an amended petition was filed thereto on April 17, 1915, after the plaintiff's appointment as administratrix on June 3, 1914. The court held that, under the Federal Employers' Liability Act, the basis of this action, the cause of action did "not accrue until the appointment of a personal representative of the deceased," and that consequently the suit was brought within the limitation period of two years, as prescribed by that act.

Some jurisdictions hold that when a statute prescribes a period of limitation for the commencement of an action for death by wrongful act, this period begins to run at the death of the intestate, and not on the appointment of his representative, although the rule governing the running of the general Statute of Limitations may be otherwise. Radezky v. Sargent & Co. (1904) 77 Conn. 110, 58 Atl. 709. Compare Andrews v. Hartford & N. H. R. Co. (1867) 34 Conn. 57; Lake Shore

& M. S. R. Co. v. Dylinski (1896) 67 Ill. App. 114. See also Staunton Coal Co. v. Fischer (1905) 119 Ill. App. 284; Hanna v. Jeffersonville R. Co. (1869) 32 Ind. 113; Rugland v. Anderson (1883) 30 Minn. 386, 15 N. W. 676; George v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. (1881) 51 Wis. 603, 8 N. W. 874.

In Andrews v. Hartford & N. H. R. Co. (1867) 34 Conn. 57, an administrator brought an action to recover for the death of his intestate, due to the alleged negligence of the defendants. The statute which was the basis of the right of the action prescribed a period of "one year after the cause of action arises" as the time within which such a suit must be brought. The present action was brought within one year from the appointment of the administrator, but not one year after the death of his intestate. The court held that the action would have been barred if there had been an executor, but applied the general exception to the Statute of Limitation, "that a cause of action accruing to an administrator after the death of the intestate is not complete and does not arise and exist so that the Statute of Limitations can begin to run upon it until an administrator is appointed who can bring suit," and decided consequently that the action was not barred. The cause of action, it was pointed out, could not "arise and exist in favor of an administrator until he comes into existence as such."

But in Radezky v. Sargent & Co. (1904) 77 Conn. 110, 28 Atl. 709, an action was brought to recover for the death of the plaintiff's intestate, due, it was alleged, to the defendant's negligence. The action was brought within a year of the appointment of the administrator, but about thirteen months after the death of his intestate. It was held that the action based on the statute must be commenced within one year from the time of the death of the person on whose account it is sought to recover, and that the limitation period could not be measured from the appointment of an administrator; the holding being said to be a result of the legislative action taken following the decision in the case of Andrews v. Hartford & N. H. R. Co. (Conn.) supra.

In Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. v. Dylinski (1896) 67 Ill. App. 114, an action brought for the recovery of damages for the death of plaintiff's intestate, caused by wrongful act, the court decided that the statute providing for the extension of the period of limitation where certain actions were brought by the representative of a decedent was not applicable, since "the deceased never had any cause of action."

In Hanna v. Jeffersonville R. Co. (1869) 32 Ind. 113, an administrator sought to recover, under the statute, for the death of his intestate, which was due to the carelessness of the servants of the defendant. The plaintiff's intestate died in April, 1864, administration was granted in August, 1867, and suit was commenced February, 1868. The statute under which this action was brought prescribed a period of two years within which the suit must be commenced. The court held that the specified period began to run from the death of the decedent, and not from the appointment of an administrator, and it was pointed out that to adopt the latter view would defeat the purpose of the imposition of the limitation period, viz., the requirement that suit be brought in such cases while the constantly changing staff of corporation servants might be in a position to discover the facts thereof; for the appointment of an administrator might be postponed indefinitely.

In Rugland v. Anderson (1883) 30 Minn. 386, 15 N. W. 676, the defendant, on account of his alleged wrongful acts, was sought to be charged with liability for the death of the plaintiff's intestate, who died as the result of injuries on August 5, 1880. The plaintiff was appointed administrator on September 18, 1882, and the action was instituted August 30, 1882. It was provided in the statute on which the suit was based that the action must be commenced within two years after the act or omission causing death, and the court construed this strictly, holding that the time between the death of the intestate and the appointment of his administrator must be included in the computation of the period of limitation.

In George v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. (1881) 51 Wlu. 603, 8 N. W. 374, an action brought to recover for the death of the plaintiff's intestate, it appeared that the plaintiff had not been appointed as administrator until more than four years after the death of his intestate, and the action was held to be barred by the provision in the statute creating the right of action, which limited the time for bringing suit thereon to two years from the death of the decedent.

III. New action after prior failure.

Where an action to recover for the death of another, based on a statute creating the cause of action, is commenced within the period prescribed in the statute therefor, and fails otherwise than on the merits, it has been held that the rule in such a case, tolling the general Statute of Limitations, applies, and that suit may be instituted anew within a specified time, though the limitation period prescribed for the bringing of the action has expired. Wall v. Chesapeake & O. R. Co. (1914) 189 Ill. App. 234 (construing Ohio statute); Meisse v. McCoy (1867) 17 Ohio St. 225.

In Meisse v. McCoy (Ohio) supra, an action seeking compensation for causing the death of the plaintiff's intestate, it appeared that the plaintiff, as administrator, had brought an action on the same ground within two years of the death of his intestate, and failing therein, otherwise than on the merits, had instituted the present suit within a year thereafter, but more than two years after the accident complained of. The statute creating a cause of action for death by wrongful act, etc., provided that suit thereon shall be commenced within two years after the death of the person for whose loss compensation is sought; but the court construed this provision together with the section of the Code saving a right of action to those commencing suit within a statutory period, and bringing a new action within one year of the failure thereof, and held in consequence that the plaintiff was not barred in the present case.

In Wall v. Chesapeake & O. R. Co. (Ill.) supra, it was sought to recover for the death of the plaintiff's intestate, alleged to be due to the negligence of the defendant. The action was brought under the Ohio statute creating a right of action in such a case, the accident having occurred in that state, and it was contended by the defendant that the period of two years, prescribed by such statute for the bringing of the action, was not subject to the exception made in that state to the running of the general Statute of Limitations, whereby one bringing an action within a statutory period, and meeting with failure therein, otherwise than upon the merits, may bring a new action within one year thereafter. The court followed the Ohio case of Meisse v. McCoy, supra.

Where a statute creating a cause of action for death prescribes a limitation period for the institution of such an action, a suit so commenced, and failing otherwise than on the merits, in some jurisdictions, may not be brought anew beyond the statutory period, though the general Statute of Limitations would be tolled in such circumstances. Western Coal & Min. Co. v. Hise (1914) 132 C. C. A. 482, 216 Fed. 338, writ of certiorari denied in (1916) 241 U. S. 666, 40 L. ed. 1228, 36 Sup. Ct. Rep. 551 (construing Arkansas statute); Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. v. Dylinski (1896) 67 Ill. App. 114; Rodman v. Missouri P. R. Co. (1902) 65 Kan. 645, 59 L.R.A. 704, 70 Pac. 642. Compare Swift & Co. v. Hoblawetz (1900) 10 Kan. App. 48, 61 Pac. 969; Cavanagh v. Ocean Steam Nav. Co. (1890) 19 N. Y. Civ. Proc. Rep. 391, 13 N. Y. Supp. 540 (construing act of Parliament).

In Western Coal & Min. Co. v. Hise (Fed.) supra, an action brought by a widow and child to recover for the death of the husband and father, by reason of the negligence of the defendants, it appeared that a prior suit on the same cause of action had been instituted within the period prescribed by the statute, and later terminated by a voluntary nonsuit, the present action having been brought more than two years after the death of the husband, but within six months of the voluntary nonsuit. A statute of the state (Arkansas) provided that actions brought within the period of limitations might be recommenced within one year from the time of any "nonsuit suffered or judgment arrested or reversed." The statute creating the cause of action for wrongful death, on which the claim of the plaintiff was founded, provided that such actions should "be commenced within two years after the death of such person." It was held that this statute created a new liability, and that the provision as to the time within which an action might be brought was "not a statute of limitations," but "an indispensable condition to the liability." Consequently the exception made by the statute concerning limitations did not apply in this case.

Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. v. Dy-linski (1896) 67 Ill. App. 114, was an action brought to recover for the death of the plaintiff's intestate, as a result of an accident on the defendant's road. The statute creating a right of action for death caused by wrongful act provided that any suit based thereon must be commenced within two years after the death of the decedent. The court held that this "time was not extended by a nonsuit in a previous action." The statute providing for the extension of the period of limitation, in event of nonsuit, did not include actions brought under the statute providing for recovery in case of death by wrongful act.

In Rodman v. Missouri P. R. Co. (1902) 65 Kan. 645, 59 L.R.A. 704, 70 Pac. 642, it appeared that an administratrix, who sought in this case to recover for the death of her intestate, due to the alleged wrongful act of the defendant, as the widow of the decedent, had instituted a prior suit, based on the same cause of action, and had removed the same from the state court to the United States circuit court, wherein it was dismissed by the plaintiff "without prejudice to the bringing of a future action." The statute under which both actions were brought provided that "action must be commenced within two years," and the former suit was so brought; the dismissal from the circuit court, however, occurred more than two years after the death of the decedent, and the present action was instituted a few weeks later. The plaintiff, however, relied on the section of the Code which provided that those commencing an action in due time, and failing therein, otherwise than on the merits, might begin a new action within one year thereafter, if the statutory period had expired; but the court held that the period of limitation here imposed was part of the right of action created by the statute, and was not subject to the exception to the general Statute of Limitation specified in the Code.

In Cavanagh v. Ocean Steam Nav. Co. (1890) 19 N. Y. Civ. Proc. Rep. 391, 13 N. Y. Supp. 540, an action to recover for the death of the plaintiff's intestate, it appeared that a former action on the same cause had been brought within one year of the death of the decedent, and, having been dismissed for want of jurisdiction, was followed by the present suit, instituted within a year after the said dismissal, in accordance with § 405 of the Code, which saves a cause of action from the bar of the general Statute of Limitations in such a case. But the death of the intestate occurred on a British ship on the high seas, and the cause of action arose by virtue of Lord Campbell's Act, in which Parliament had included a limitation period of one year, and the court held that this limitation, inherent in the right itself, was not subject to the above-mentioned provision of the Code, which had been invoked by the plaintiff as the law of the forum.

IV. Nonresidence.

The limitation period prescribed in a statute creating a cause of action for death, in some jurisdictions, is not considered to be subject to the rule tolling the general Statute of Limitations in case of nonresidence, etc., of the parties. Stern v. La Compagnie Générale Transatlantique (1901) 110

In Stern v. La Compagnie Générale Transatlantique (Fed.) supra, it was sought to recover for the death of one Poussa, due, it was alleged, to the wrongful act of the defendant. The action was based on the New Jersey statute which provided that suit should be commenced within twelve months after the death of the decedent. This action was not commenced until some twenty-two months after the drowning of Poussa, but it was urged by the plaintiff that the action was nevertheless well brought, it being contended that the limitation period prescribed did not run because the defendant was a nonresident of New Jersey, whose general Statute of Limitations provided that the time of nonresidence of a party in the state should be computed as part of the period of limitation. The court pointed out that if such were the case, "the period of limitations would be according to the law of the forum where the suit was brought," and that consequently many means might be resorted to to defeat the provisions of the New Jersey statute on which the action was based. It was said: "The language of the act seems intended to exclude any such indefinite liability, whether the defendant is a resident or a nonresident, an individual or a corporation. The proviso, it has been held, is attached as a condition of the right of action itself, and not merely as a designation of the ordinary period of limitation for such actions, operating merely as a part of the New Jersey Statute of Limitations on the remedy alone. If the latter were the proper construction, it might be subject to the extension provided by the general Statute of Limitation of New Jersey; but the one-year proviso would in that case be operative ex proprio vigore in that state alone. On the contrary, however, the proviso must be held to be attached to the right of action itself; and it must, therefore, run with the statute into every forum wherein any action under the statute may be instituted."

In GENGO v. MARDIS (reported herewith) ante, 134, it was sought to recover for the death of the plaintiff's intestate, which resulted from the alleged wrongful act of the defendant. The death of the decedent occurred November 15, 1911, and this action was commenced December 5, 1913. The statute creating the right of action prescribed a limitation period of two years for the institution of suit. The court held that an action brought under this statute was subject to the control of the limitation prescribed therein, and was not to be considered within the saving provisions of the statute which tolled the general Statute of Limitations in a case where the party wanted places himself without the jurisdiction of the court, absconds, etc. The limitation prescribed by the act "must operate as a condition precedent to the right of action."

Infancy, recognized, expressly or impliedly, as tolling the general Statute of Limitations, is no exception to the running of a limitation period prescribed by a statute creating a cause of action for death. Anthony v. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. (1913) 108 Ark. 219, 157 S. W. 394; Elliott v. Brazil Block Coal Co. (1900) 25 Ind. App. 592, 58 N. E. 736; Goodwin v. Bodcaw Lumber Co. (1902) 109 La. 1050, 34 So. 74; Foster v. Yazoo & M. Valley R. Co. (1895) 72 Miss. 886, 18 So. 380.

In Anthony v. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. (Ark.) supra, wherein a daughter brought suit to recover for the death of her father, as a result of the alleged negligence of the defendant, it was shown that the action was not commenced within two years after the death of the decedent, as prescribed by the statute on which the suit was based. The plaintiff relied on another statute, which provided that minors entitled to bring an action might proceed thereon at any time within three years after attaining their majority. The court, however, found that the limitation stated in the statute under which the action was brought was not merely of the remedy, but was of the right of action itself; and no intention on the part of the legislature to repeal that limitation was found by the adoption of the disability provision. The court said: "The two statutes relate to different subjects, and there is no necessary repugnancy between their provisions."

In Elliott v. Brazil Block Coal Co. (1900) 25 Ind. App. 592, 58 N. E. 736, an action for the death of a father, brought by a child who had just attained his majority, it appeared that the accident occurred more than three years prior thereto. Construing the Coal Mining Act under which the action was brought, together with the other statutes granting a cause of action in case of death by wrongful act, the court determined that "the action must be commenced within two years," and that "infants as well as adults" were bound thereby. The court said: "In this case, the action being purely statutory, it must be brought within the time fixed by the statute, and the infancy of appellants can make no exception."

In Goodwin v. Bodcaw Lumber Co. (1902) 109 La. 1050, 34 So. 74, the plaintiff, a widow, sought to recover for herself and as guardian of her three minor children for the death of her husband, due to the alleged fault of the defendant. The statute on which the action was based stated that the right of action is given "for the space of one year from the death." This action had been begun more than a year after the death of the decedent. A provision in the Code that minors might not be prescribed "except in the cases provided by law" did not save the right of action to the plaintiff in this case, as the court held that here "the right of action itself is conditioned upon its being exercised within a year from the time of death."

In Foster v. Yazoo & M. Valley R. Co. (1895) 72 Miss. 886, 18 So. 380, an action brought by an infant, by his next friend, to recover for the death of his father, resulting from the alleged wrongful act of the defendant, it was contended by the defendant that the suit was barred by the expiration of the two-year period of limitation, prescribed in the act creating the right of action. The plaintiff claimed the protection of a general statute saving a right of action to those under the disability of infancy, but the court held that the plaintiff was barred, since the statute giving the cause of action provided its own special statute of limitations containing no exception in favor of minors, and the statute tolling the Statute of Limitations in personal actions was not applicable.

In KERLEY v. HOEHMAN (reported herewith) ante, 141, it appeared that a statute creating a cause of action for death caused by a "wrongful act or omission" provided that the action must be commenced within two years, and the court held that this period ran from the death of the decedent in spite of the concealment of the right of action by the defendant. The court considers the period not as a statutory limitation, but holds that "the right of action is tendered on the condition that suit be commenced within two years; that no excuse for failure to bring the suit within that time will avail."

In Kavanagh v. Folsom (1910) 181 Fed. 401 (construing New York statute), wherein it appeared that the action, brought to recover for the death of the plaintiff's intestate under the New York statute providing therefor, had not been commenced within the limitation period of two years, specified in the statute, the court said: "When a statute, like the one upon which the complaint is based, creates a liability, provided the suit for its enforcement is brought within a prescribed time, the time fixed operates as a limitation of the liability itself, and not of the remedy alone. A condition of the right to sue at all is that the action be brought within the stated time. The statutory provision is not a mere statute of limitation, and consequently the provisions of other New York statute suspending the operation of statutes of limitation are inapplicable." But see Sharrow v. In-

The New York "death statute" grants a right of action provided the suit is commenced within two years from the death of the decedent, and in the only decision directly on the point it was held by a Federal court, construing the statute, that the limitation period begins to run at the death of the decedent, and not from the time of the appointment of his representative. Williams v. Quebec S. S. Co. (1903) 126 Fed. 591 (construing the New York statute).

There is a statement to the same effect in Barnes v. Brooklyn (1897) 22 App. Div. 520, 48 N. Y. Supp. 36, wherein the court, considering the limitation period of the "death statute," said: "The time thus limited for the commencement of an action is not open to any question. It terminates within two years after the death complained of." This case and the later case of Crapo v. Syracuse (1906) 183 N. Y. 395, 76 N. E. 465, 19 Am. Neg. Rep. 429, have been cited as holding to the contrary. These two cases did decide that under a statute requiring that notice be given within a certain period after a cause of action accrues, where damages are sought to be recovered from a city for the death of a person, the cause of action must be considered as accruing at the time of the appointment of a representative of the decedent, and not at the time of his death. This statute, however, is not the one creating the right of action for wrongful death, etc., so that the decisions of these two cases have no direct bearing on the question under consideration.

In Williams v. Quebec S. S. Co. (1903) 126 Fed. 591 (construing the New York statute), it was sought to recover for the death of plaintiff's intestate, alleged to have resulted from the negligence of the defendant. The statute creating the cause of action provided that such actions "must be commenced within two years after the decedent's death." The court declared the language of the statute to be plain and clear, and consequently decided that the action brought in 1903, based on the death of the intestate in 1899, must fail, and they rejected the contention of the plaintiff that the cause of action did not accrue until the grant of letters testamentary, from which time the statutory period should be computed.

Under the New York Code the courts of that state have held that an action under the death statute, commenced within the period of limitation prescribed therefor, failing otherwise than on the merits, may be brought anew within the period specified by the section of the Code relative thereto, which is considered applicable to this special limitation period as well as to the general Statute of Limitations. Hoffman v. Delaware & H. Co. (1914) 163 App. Div. 50, 148 N. Y. Supp. 509, affirming (1914) 85 Misc. 535, 147 N. Y. Supp. 475; Boffee v. Consolidated Teleg. & Electrical Subway Co. (1916) 171 App. Div. 392, 157 N. Y. Supp. 318.

In Hoffman v. Delaware & H. Co. (N. Y.) supra, it appeared that a former action had been brought to recover for the death of the decedent, and that action, instituted within the prescribed period of two years, had been dismissed without an award of a new trial, whereupon the present suit was commenced within one year thereafter, in accord with the saving provisions of § 405 of the Code. The so-called "death statute" provided a limitation period of two years for the bringing of an action, but it was held that, since the statute had been incorporated in the Code, the general exceptions to limitations, provided by the Code, might be applied thereto. The court said: "The death statute prescribes a limitation of two years, but does not purport to be an entire statute of limitations upon the subject, and does not indicate an intent to exclude the provisions of the Statute of Limitations which prescribe disabilities and circumstances under which, in given cases, the Statute of Limitations is suspended. Bringing the death statute into the Code shows an intent that it shall be governed by the general provisions of the Code which are not inconsistent with it." Consequently the saving provisions of § 405 of the Code were held to be applicable to this case.

In Boffee v. Consolidated Teleg. & Electrical Subway Co. (N. Y.) supra, it appeared that an action had been commenced to recover for the death of the decedent, due to the alleged negligence of the defendant, before letters of administration had been granted to the plaintiff. On judgment rendered for the plaintiff in that action, the defendant appealed, and the court, holding that an action to recover for the death of another must be brought by his personal representative, as provided by the statute, dismissed the action, but pointed out that since the dismissal was not on the merits, another action might be brought within a year thereafter, in accordance with § 405 of the Code, which was considered applicable to actions brought under § 1902, "the death statute."

In Londrigan v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. (1902) 5 N. Y. Civ. Proc. Rep. 76, 12 Abb. N. C. 273, 17 Jones & S. 526, an action arising under the section of the Code (1902) creating liability for death caused by wrongful act, etc., the court was called on to decide whether § 401 of the Code was applicable to the limitation period prescribed in the former section,—whether that period was tolled by the absence from the state or nonresidence of the defendant. It was held that § 414 of the Code governed the interpretation of the case, and by specifying that the provisions of the chapter were applicable except "where a different limitation was specifically prescribed by law," eliminated the applicability of § 401 to § 1902. And even construing the "provisions of this chapter" to refer to "the times especially declared within which actions might be begun,—e. g., twenty years for ejectment, six years for contracts not under seal, etc.," the enlargement of time given by § 401 is necessarily included therein, since it "is in an exact sense a limitation of time."

In Taylor v. Cranberry Iron & Coal Co. (1886) 94 N. C. 525, it appeared that the plaintiff's action to recover for the death of her husband, due to the alleged wrongful act of the defendant, had not been brought within a year after the death of the decedent, as provided by the statute creating the right of action under which the suit was brought. The court said: "Why the action was not brought within the time does not appear, but any explanation in that respect would be unavailing, as there is no saving clause as to the time within which the action must be begun."

Gulledge v. Seaboard Air Line R. Co. (1908) 147 N. C. 234, 125 Am. St. Rep. 544, 60 S. E. 1184, was an action brought by the plaintiff as administrator to recover for the death of his intestate, and commenced in January, 1906, although the death upon which the action was founded occurred in April, 1902. It was contended by the plaintiff that a contest over the administration of the estate of the intestate had extended from a few months after the death of the intestate to June, 1905, and that this time was expressly excepted from the limitation period by a section of the Code (Revisal, § 369), tolling the Statute of Limitation in such an event. The court, pointing out that a collector might have been appointed to bring the action in such a contingency, held that the limitation period of one year was not a statute of limitations, and had not been complied with.

An action brought to recover for death due to wrongful act, etc., of another, must be commenced within a year after the death of the decedent in order to comply with the limitation period of the statute, and an attempt to bring an action beyond that time, but within a year of the appointment of an administrator, will be of no avail. The rule tolling the general Statute of Limitations in that respect is not applicable to this special limitation. Best v. Kinston (1890) 106 N. C. 205, 10 S. E. 997; Hall v. Southern R. Co. (1908) 149 N. C. 108, 62 S. E. 899.

An action brought under the North Carolina statute, to recover for the death of a person, and commenced within the period prescribed by the statute therefor, may, on its failure otherwise than on the merits, be instituted anew in accordance with the section of the Code tolling the general Statute of Limitations in that respect. Meekins v. Norfolk & S. R. Co. (1902) 131 N. C. 1, 42 S. E. 383; Trull v. Seaboard Air Line R. Co. (1909) 151 N. C. 545, 66 S. E. 586.

In Partee v. St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. (1913) 51 L.R.A.(N.S.) 721, 123 C. C. A. 292, 204 Fed. 970 (construing Oklahoma statute), the plaintiff sought to recover for the death of one McCain, alleged to have been due to the wrongful act of the defendant. This action was not brought within two years of the act or death complained of, but an action on this ground had been begun within the period of two years therefrom, and on the failure thereof, not, however, upon its merits, the present action was commenced within one year after the failure. The statutes of Oklahoma provided, inter alia, that actions for the wrongful act of another, resulting in death, must be commenced within two years, that statutes providing a peculiar limitation for special cases must govern those cases, and that an action commenced in due time, and failing otherwise than upon the merits, may be started anew within one year thereafter. The court held that the last-mentioned provision was obviously intended to apply to cases involving the general Statute of Limitations, and, indeed, under the second provision above mentioned, was specifically made inapplicable to special cases for which a peculiar limitation had been prescribed by statute. As a consequence the present action, brought more than two years after the death of the decedent, was not aided by the exception applicable to the general Statute of Limitations, and the commencement of a new suit within a year after the failure of one properly brought was of no avail. It was said: "A statute which, in itself, creates a new liability, gives an action to enforce it unknown to the common law, and fixes the time within which that action may be commenced, is not a statute of limitations. It is a statute of creation, and the commencement of the action within the time it fixes is an indispensable condition of the liability and of the action which it permits."

In Casey v. American Bridge Co. (1912) 116 Minn. 461, 88 L.R.A.(N.S.) 521, 134 N. W. 111 (construing Oklahoma statute), the plaintiff sought to recover for the death of her intestate, which occurred in Oklahoma, March 17, 1901, and was due to the defendant's negligence. This action was brought in January, 1911, although the Oklahoma statute creating the right of action specified that suit must be commenced in two years; another section of the Oklahoma Code provided that the general Statute of Limitations should not run until an absentee, against whom a cause of action had accrued, had returned to the territory, etc. The court decided that the exception specified in the latter section was applicable to the construction of the limitation period prescribed in the section creating the right of action, and that the two sections must be construed together; and this in spite of the fact that a third section of the same Code provided that "where, in special cases, a different limitation is prescribed by statute, the action shall be governed by such limitation;" which provision, the court said, had no reference to the tolling section in question. NORFOLK & WESTERN RAILWAY COMPANY
v.
PUBLIC SERVICE COMMISSION.

West Virginia Supreme Court of Appeals — May 7, 1918.

(82 W. Va. 408, 96 S. E. 62.)

Carrier — duty to furnish facilities — effect of war.

1. A common carrier will not be excused from its duty of furnishing shipping facilities to one offering commerce to it, upon the ground that all of its energies are required to meet government needs, brought about by the present state of war, where it does not appear that the granting of such facilities would divert any of the carrier's energies, or require of it service which would make it less able to perform its public duty.

Commerce — power of Commission — intrastate shipments.

2. The act of Congress to regulate commerce, as amended (Feb. 4, 1887) conferring upon the Interstate Commerce Commission authority to compel railroads engaged in interstate commerce to provide shipping facilities for shippers tendering interstate shipments sufficient to justify the construction and maintenance of the same, does not deprive the Public Service Commission of jurisdiction to require such a railroad to provide such facilities to a shipper offering intrastate commerce in such quantities as warrants the installation of the facilities demanded, even though such facilities, when provided, may be used in the shipment of interstate as well as intrastate commerce.

Public Service Commission — findings — effect.

3. Findings of fact by the Public Service Commission based upon evidence to support them will not be reviewed by this court.

Headnotes by RITZ, J.

PETITION by the defendant railway for the setting aside of an order of the Public Service Commission requiring it to furnish shipping facilities to the complainant coal company. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. John H. Holt, Lucian H. Coker, Theodore W. Reath, and Joseph I. Doran, for petitioner:

An order for switch connections takes property, and this cannot be done without compensation.

Lack of steel, labor, and cars due to war conditions, and special duties imposed upon the railways by the war, preclude for the present the ordering of any new facilities such as would spread the carriers' effort.

Ritz, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The Trace Coal Company made application to the Public Service Commission to compel the Norfolk & Western Railway Company to furnish it shipping facilities for coal mined at its plant in Wayne county. Upon a hearing the Commission entered an order requiring the railway company to make its election, within thirty days, of one of three things which would furnish the facilities desired, and to thereafter permit the complainant to furnish the material and labor required to provide that one of the facilities so selected by the said railway company. The railway company procured a suspension of this order from this court, and seeks to have the same set aside.

It appears that a number of years ago, for the purpose of furnishing facilities for the shipping of coal from several mines, the railway company constructed a spur off its main line at Dingess. This branch was something like a mile in length, and upon it were several small coal operations. After operating a few years, these operations, about the year 1908, ceased to do business, the situation being such that they were unable to operate their mines profitably. From that time until quite recently no use had been made of this branch by the railway company, or by anyone else, and it was allowed to fall into an unusable condition. A short time since a lumber company established quite a large mill on this branch line at a point some 2,000 feet from its connection with the main line of the railway company. In order to furnish service for this lumber company the branch was rehabilitated and repaired up to the lumber company's plant, and is now being used to that point for the purpose of serving said lumber company. The Trace Company acquired a lease on a tract of land which had theretofore been operated by one of the companies that had gone out of business in 1908, and desired to commence shipping coal from this property. In fact, it has been mining and shipping some coal by hauling the same to the station at Dingess and loading it in cars at that point. This necessitates, however, a haulage of something more than a mile in wagons from the mouth of the mine to the place of loading, and, of course, makes it very expensive for the company to market its product. It appears that it has a tipple at its mine, and it desires this track rehabilitated from the lumber company's plant up to its mine, a distance of some 2,000 feet, and a siding put in, so that it might load coal from its tipple; or that the siding used by the lumber company be extended and it allowed to use the old main line track of the branch to haul coal to the lumber company siding, and there load it into the cars; or else that it be allowed to rehabilitate the main line of the branch and load the cars standing on such main line at its mine. The railway company declined to accede to any of these requests, and refused to allow the Trace Company to provide any facilities for the loading of its coal other than hauling it to its station at Dingess and loading it in cars at that point. The proposal of the Trace Company is to furnish all of the material and do all of the work at its own expense, in such manner as the railway company desires that it be done, and the Commission's order gave the railway company the privilege of choosing which of the three facilities it would prefer, and after such selection made by it that it allow the Trace Company to provide the facility so selected, to the end that it might load its coal and ship the same without being subjected to the disadvantage of hauling it a long distance from the mouth of its mine to the siding at Dingess station.

The first contention of the railway company is that the Trace Company's freight is not sufficient to justify the expense of the improvement. A large amount of the testimony is directed to this proposition. The railway company contends that the coal in the mine of the Trace Company is of such character that it will be impossible for the Trace Company to mine it and ship it at a profit, and that it will only be a short time until the mine will have to close down. On the other hand, the Trace Company shows that this coal is about 36 inches in thickness, and that it has mined and shipped two carloads thereof at a profit, after being subjected to the expense of hauling it in wagons for a distance of more than a mile. It says further that this is not a question that need concern the railway company, inasmuch as it proposes to bear all of the expense of the improvements desired, and whether it can make a profit or not, or whether it closes down in a short time or not, can in no wise affect the railway company, for if it continues to operate and furnish the railway company the freights, it will receive its charges for hauling the same, whether they are produced by the Trace Company at a profit or at a loss, and should the Trace Company go out of business the railway company will be left with its facilities, so far as the tracks are concerned, in better condition than they are at present. The railway company argues, and there is some testimony to the effect, that the rails on this branch would have to be taken up, and rails of heavier weight substituted therefor, in order to accommodate its equipment. If this were true, it would still place no burden upon the railway company. But there is a report filed in this case by the Public Service Commission's inspector, who went upon the ground, and in that report it is shown that the rails which the railway company is now using in the main line of this branch, up to the Hutchinson Lumber Company's plant, are of the same size as the rails between that plant and the mines of the defendant, so that it is a little hard for us to conceive why the railway company's equipment would require heavier rails between the lumber company's plant and the mines than it does between its main line and the lumber company's plant. The evidence offered by the Trace Company shows that it has a capacity now to produce one carload of coal a day, and if it is permitted to have these facilities in a very short time it can and will increase this output to five cars a day. It also shows that it can mine this coal at a reasonable profit at the present price, and can even make a reasonable profit thereon when the prices are much less than they are at present, if it can avoid the necessity of hauling its product to the railway line in wagons. The railway company argues that to require it to give the facilities asked would be a taking of its property, and that before this can be done it must be shown that there is a necessity therefor.

It is quite true that where a railway company is required to expend money in furnishing facilities to a shipper, there must be a showing that there is reasonable necessity therefor, and that the returns received by the railway company will be commensurate with the expenditures it is compelled to make. The application of this argument to the case here is a little difficult, however, in view of the fact that the railway company is required to make no initial outlay whatever. It is true the furnishing of these facilities contemplates that cars will be furnished for the shipment of the coal, but only such cars will have to be furnished as freights are furnished for, and the freight charges made by the railway company are the compensation for the use of its cars for this purpose. Its freight rates are so adjusted as to compensate it for the work it does in placing cars, and in removing them from the place where they are loaded to the point of destination. It is, therefore, quite clear that, however many cars the railway company is required to furnish for the shipment of this coal, it is in a position to demand and receive full compensation for that service at the time it is required to perform it. There is abundant evidence to justify the finding of the Commission that the freight offered of an intrastate character warrants furnishing the facilities desired, and we will not override the Commission's findings of fact where there is evidence upon which to base them. There is, therefore, no merit in the contention that any of the railway company's property will be taken for the purpose of making these facilities without just compensation therefor.

It is contended that the evidence offered does not justify the Commission's conclusion that commerce of an intrastate character is at all involved. It is shown that the intention is to ship the product of this mine to Williamson, West Virginia, Huntington, West Virginia, and to various cities in Ohio. The shipments to Williamson, West Virginia, would be for reshipment to other points, and it is contended that there is no real purpose to make shipments to Huntington, West Virginia, which would be intrastate commerce, because of the fact that natural gas is largely used in that city. We know judicially that Huntington is a city of considerable size, rivaling in manufacturing and commercial importance any city of the state, and we do not think the testimony is unreasonable that a considerable part of the product of this mine would be used for commercial and manufacturing purposes in that city. There is evidence upon which the Commission could base this finding, and, this being true, we will not review the same.

Public Service Commission—
Findings—effect.

The railway company further contends that the Congress of the United States has assumed exclusive jurisdiction over the matter of constructing sidings on railroads engaged in interstate commerce, and that, it having done so, neither the state of West Virginia, nor any agency created by it, has any power or authority to compel or require such a railway company as the petitioner to furnish any siding facilities to any shipper for any purpose whatsoever. Its contention is that even though these sidings may be desired for intrastate shipments exclusively, inasmuch as the said railroad is engaged in interstate commerce the jurisdiction in the Interstate Commerce Commission is exclusive. If the act of Congress to regulate commerce is susceptible of any such construction, it may be doubted whether Congress has power to accomplish such purpose. If the contention of the railway company is sustained that the Congress of the United States has power to deprive the states of any control over a carrier engaged in interstate commerce, then the power of the states to in any way interfere with or control the actions of the railroads of this country is gone. It must be remembered that these railroads are within the states, and operate therein by virtue of authority granted to them by the states. They are granted the sovereign right of eminent domain, and in exchange for this right the states have always been conceded certain regulatory powers over the carrier. If it can be said that Congress has the power to appropriate to itself the exclusive control of such carriers as are engaged in interstate commerce, then the state's right of eminent domain is taken away from it, and is enjoyed by the railroads without any corresponding obligation or duty upon their part. The exigencies of trade and business would create anomalous situations. It is not an unusual thing for a siding to be desired by some industry for purely intrastate shipments, and under the contention of the railway company such a shipper would be entirely without a remedy. The state Commission would have no authority to compel the railway company to furnish facilities, and the Interstate Commerce Commission would have no authority, because there would be no question of interstate commerce involved. Congress never intended to create such a condition as this. When § 1 of the act of Congress to regulate commerce, as amended (24 Stat. at L. 379, chap. 104, Comp. Stat. § 8563, 4 Fed. Stat. Anno. 2d ed. p. 337), is read together, it seems quite clear to us that what Congress intended to do was to assume control over interstate commerce and every agency connected therewith. Nowhere in this act do we find anything which justifies the assumption that the Interstate Commerce Commission alone has the right to compel the furnishing of facilities for a shipper, unless the shipments offered are of an interstate character. The railway company relies upon the holdings of the Supreme Court of the United States in construing the Safety Appliance Act (27 Stat. at L. 531, chap. 196, Comp. Stat. §§ 8605 et seq., 8 Fed. Stat. Anno. 2d ed. 1155), the Hours of Service Act (34 Stat. at L. 1415, chap. 2939, Comp. Stat. §§ 8677-8680, 8 Fed. Stat. Anno. 2d ed. p. 1383), and in Houston, E. & W. T. R. Co. v. United States (Shreveport Rate Case) 234 U. S. 342, 58 L. ed. 1341, 34 Sup. Ct. Rep. 833, as justifying its contention.

In passing upon the applicability of the Safety Appliance Act to the instrumentalities used by an interstate railway company in intrastate commerce, the court held in Southern R. Co. v. United States, 222 U. S. 20, 56 L. ed. 72, 32 Sup. Ct. Rep.

2, 8 N. C. C. A. 822, that the clear language of the act included every instrumentality used by such a railway. The language of that act itself includes all of the cars, engines, and other instrumentalities used by a railway engaged in interstate commerce, and the court held that it mattered not whether these instrumentalities were being used in interstate commerce, or exclusively in intrastate commerce, they were included within the language of the act. The court upheld the act as constitutional upon the ground that it was necessary to include these agencies used in intrastate commerce in order that the beneficent results sought might be attained. If a railway company was required to equip only such cars as were used in interstate commerce with safety appliances, and might use cars for intrastate commerce not so equipped, the danger to intrastate employees and travelers might be, to some extent, decreased, but the object of the act would not be fully accomplished, and the constitutionality of that act is upheld upon that ground alone. Mr. Justice Van Devanter, speaking for the court in upholding the act upon this ground, 222 U. S. at page 26, of the opinion says: "We come, then, to the question whether these acts are within the power of Congress under the commerce clause of the Constitution, considering that they are not confined to vehicles used in moving interstate traffic, but embrace vehicles used in moving intrastate traffic. The answer to this question depends upon another, which is, Is there a real or substantial relation or connection between what is required by these acts in respect of vehicles used in moving intrastate traffic and the object which the acts obviously are designed to attain, namely, the safety of interstate commerce and of those who are employed in its movement? Or, stating it in another way, Is there such a close or direct relation or connection between the two classes of traffic, when moving over the same railroad, as to make it certain that the safety of the interstate traffic and of those who are employed in its movement will be promoted in a real or substantial sense by applying the requirements of these acts to vehicles used in moving the traffic which is intrastate, as well as to those used in moving that which is interstate? If the answer to this question, as doubly stated, be in the affirmative, then the principal question must be answered in the same way. And this is so, not because Congress possesses any power to regulate intrastate commerce as such, but because its power to regulate interstate commerce is plenary, and competently may be exerted to secure the safety of the persons and property transported therein and of those who are employed in such transportation, no matter what may be the source of the dangers which threaten it. That is to say, it is no objection to such an exertion of this power that the dangers intended to be avoided arise, in whole or in part, out of matters connected with intrastate commerce. Speaking only of railroads which are highways of both interstate and intrastate commerce, these things are of common knowledge. Both classes of traffic are at times carried in the same car, and when this is not the case the cars in which they are carried are frequently commingled in the same train and in the switching and other movements at terminals. Cars are seldom set apart for exclusive use in moving either class of traffic, but generally are used interchangeably in moving both; and the situation is much the same with trainmen, switchmen, and like employees, for they usually, if not necessarily, have to do with both classes of traffic. Besides, the several trains on the same railroad are not independent in point of movement and safety, but are interdependent, for whatever brings delay or disaster to one, or results in disabling one of its operatives, is calculated to impede the progress and imperil the safety of other trains. And so the absence of appropriate safety appliances from any part of any train is a menace not only to that train but to others."

In the case of Northern P. R. Co. v. Washington, 222 U. S. 370, 56 L. ed. 237, 32 Sup. Ct. Rep. 160, it was held that Congress had entered upon the field of prescribing hours of service for railroad employees engaged in interstate commerce, and having done so its jurisdiction in that regard was exclusive. It was further held that an employee engaged in train service upon a train carrying both classes of commerce was engaged in interstate commerce, and the Hours of Service Act of Congress applied to him. This decision has no application to this case.

In Houston, E. & W. T. R. Co. v. United States (Shreveport Rate Case) 234 U. S. 342, 58 L. ed. 1341, 34 Sup. Ct. Rep. 833, the court justified the interference of the Interstate Commerce Commission with intrastate rates, not upon the ground that Congress, under the commerce clause of the Constitution, had power to prescribe regulations for intrastate commerce as such, but upon the sole ground that the regulations prescribed by the state for handling intrastate commerce operated so as to cast a burden upon interstate commerce. The whole contention in that case was based upon an attempt of the state of Texas to build up the trade of a competing Texas city at the expense of the city of Shreveport. Such rates were prescribed for the intrastate shipments to the Texas city as made it necessary for the railroad company to require much higher rates for interstate shipments than it was allowed by the order of the Texas Commission to charge for the intrastate shipments, and interference with the intrastate rate was based solely upon the ground that by prescribing this low rate for intrastate shipments an undue burden was placed upon the interstate commerce carrier by the railroad.

It will thus be observed that in these instances the interference of Congress with intrastate commerce is justified, not upon the ground that any power is possessed by Congress to regulate such commerce, but solely for the reason that the proper regulation of interstate commerce required such incidental interference. No such condition exists in this case. The furnishing of these facilities can in no way affect interstate commerce or any regulation thereof, and the only reason for the assumption of the power upon the part of Congress to regulate intrastate commerce is lacking.

The contention here relied upon by the railway company was made in the case of Washington & O. D. R. Co. v. Royster Guano Co. 122 Va. 397, P.U.R.1918C, 189, 94 S. E. 763, and that court, in upholding the order of the Corporation Commission of Virginia, requiring the carrier to furnish siding facilities for shipments in intrastate commerce, held that the fact that interstate shipments might also be made over the same siding did not deprive the Corporation Commission of its jurisdiction to require the facilities for the intrastate shipments. In the case of Jacobson v. Wisconsin, M. & P. R. Co. 71 Minn. 519, 40 L.R.A. 389, 70 Am. St. Rep. 358, 74 N. W. 893, the Minnesota supreme court upheld an order of the Public Service Commission of that state requiring such facilities to be furnished for intrastate commerce, notwithstanding interstate shipments might incidentally be involved. The court in that case also held that, in determining the question of whether the freight offered would give an adequate return to the carrier for the expenditure it was required to make in furnishing the facilities, the Commission might consider not only the intrastate shipments which were offered, but also the interstate shipments, and if all of the shipments which would be offered at the siding, both intrastate and interstate, were sufficient in amount to warrant the expense, the order would be upheld. This conclusion would seem to be justified upon the ground of common sense, for if the state Commission, in determining the question of the sufficiency of the freight offered to justify the expense, could only consider the intrastate shipments which might be offered, it might be found that they alone would be insufficient for the purpose; and likewise, in the same case, the Interstate Commerce Commission might find that the interstate shipments would be insufficient to warrant the expense, while, consolidating both characters of commerce, there would be ample freight to justify requiring the carrier to furnish the facilities. This would present a case where a shipper had ample commerce to justify giving him the facilities he desired, but he would be unable to get them because he had not sufficient of either class of such commerce.

The decision of the Minnesota supreme court above referred to was affirmed by the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Wisconsin, M. & P. R. Co. v. Jacobson, 179 U. S. 287, 45 L. ed. 194, 21 Sup. Ct. Rep. 115. In the case of Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. v. State, 53 Okla. 712, L.R.A.1916F, 1281, 157 Pac. 1039, the same question was before the Oklahoma supreme court, and that court overruled the contention made by the railway company that, it being an interstate highway, Congress had exclusive jurisdiction over the matter of providing switch connections. We are of opinion that, where a shipper has commerce of an intrastate character to offer to a carrier, warranting the construction for him of switch connections, the Public Service Commission has jurisdiction to compel the carrier to grant

intrastate

such switch connections, notwithstanding the siding, after it is constructed, may also be used for the purpose of making interstate shipments. No doubt, under the act of Congress, the Interstate Commerce Commission would have jurisdiction to compel the granting of such facilities because of the interstate commerce offered, but this fact does not deprive the state of its right to see that shippers with freight of an intrastate character are given the facilities to which they are entitled.

The argument is further made by the railway company that at this time its energies are fully required to meet the extraordinary demands made upon it because of the present state of war; that all of its resources in the way of steel rails, ties, and switches are needed for this purpose; and that it should not be required to furnish facilities to any shipper other than those already having such facilities, for the reason that to do so might require of it additional equipment, or additional work for its trains or crews, without producing any additional freight. As before stated, the granting of the facilities asked for here does not make any requisition upon the material resources of the railway company. It does not require the expenditure of 1 cent by it, and it does not show how the granting of the facilities asked for this shipper would increase its work so as to embarrass it in complying with its public duty. In the absence of such a showing we would not be justified in saying that this shipper should not be granted the facilities enjoyed by other shippers of coal. If it should turn out, in the operation of this switch connection for the business of the Trace Company, that an undue burden is imposed upon the railway company, and that its operations are crippled, and it is hindered and delayed in performing its paramount duty to the government, upon representation of such condition to the Director General of Railroads, he has ample power to give the railway company relief, and we do not doubt that, upon a showing of that character being made, such relief will be promptly afforded.

We find no reason for disturbing the order of the Public Service Commission made in this case.

ANNOTATION.

Service of government as excuse for failure of carrier to discharge duty to individual.

A carrier has been held not liable to an individual who offered goods for shipment, for refusing to receive the same, where its lines were under the military control of the Federal government, and were being operated under control of Federal officers, so that the carrier was not in the free and unrestrained exercise of its franchise. Illinois C. R. Co. v. Ashmead (1871) 58 Ill. 487; Illinois C. R. Co. v. Hornberger (1875) 77 Ill. 457; Phelps v. Illinois C. R. Co. (1880) 94 Ill. 548. But where the carrier accepted grain offered it for shipment, without limiting its liability against acts of the military authorities, it has been held that the carrier is liable for unreasonable delay in delivering it at its destination, although the terminal facilities at the destination were congested because of government service. Illinois C. R. Co. v. McClellan (1870) 54 Ill. 58, 5 Am. Rep. 83; Illinois C. R. Co. v. Cobb (1872) 64 Ill. 128. In the McClellan Case, the military authorities had given permission to transport the grain in question.

The court, in St. Louis-San Francisco R. Co. v. State (1918) — Okla. —, P.U.R.1918C, 596, 170 Pac. 1146, suspended the order of a Corporation Commission, requiring the erection of a new depot by a railroad company after the Federal government had taken charge and control of the railroad and was engaged in the management and operation thereof, saying that it knew judicially, as everyone knew, that it would require the utmost conservation of the resources and energies of this country and would require vast stores and supplies of materials, such as would be required to comply with the order appealed from, to carry on the prosecution of the war to a successful determination, and that the revenues of the railroads, their rolling stock, and the services of their employees would be taxed to the utmost in the speedy and efficient transportation of troops, munitions, and other supplies, and matters of this kind must and would have precedence over matters of private convenience and local ambitions, which should not be permitted to interfere with the successful accomplishment of its aims by the United States government.

In Lysacht v. Lehigh Valley R. Co. (1918) 254 Fed. 351, a carrier was held not relieved of liability for injury to goods from the explosion of munitions of war in the course of transportation in interstate and foreign commerce, for use in the war.

For Federal control of public utilities, see note in 4 A.L.R. 1680.

Generally, as to the right of parties to contract, the performance of which is interfered with or prevented by war conditions or acts of government in prosecution of war, see note in 3 A.L.R. 21. W. A. E.

v.

W. T. FORRESTER, Admr., etc., of Mrs. Jane Pitchford, Deceased.

(— Okla. —, 177 Pac. 593.)

Executor and administrator — effect of removal — revocation of letters.

1. The removal of an administrator of an estate appointed by the probate court of Arkansas, after his appointment, does not ipso facto vacate or revoke his letters of administration, and an answer which alleges such removal from said state after said appointment, but fails to allege that an order has been made by the court appointing him, vacating and revoking said letters, is insufficient to make an issue on the capacity of said administrator to maintain an action in the courts of this state as such administrator.

Judgment — appointing administrator — collateral attack.

2. An answer which challenges the action of the probate court of Arkansas in making an order appointing an administrator of the estate of a decedent, who was a resident of that state, on the ground that said decedent did not have or possess any personal or real property at the time of his or her death, is a collateral attack on a judgment of another court, and it is not error to sustain a demurrer thereto.

Appeal — incompetent evidence — absence of prejudice.

3. Before this court is warranted in reversing a judgment for error in admitting incompetent evidence or testimony, it must appear from the whole record that on account of the admission of such evidence or testimony there has probably been a miscarriage of justice or a violation of a constitutional or statutory right.

[See 2 R. C. L. 247.]

Trial — instructions.

4. Instruction complained of in the instant case examined, and held to fairly state the law applicable to the evidence and facts on which a recovery was sought.

Appeal — judgment fixing lien — vacation.

5. When a court renders a money judgment and attempts to fix a lien on the property of defendant to secure the payment thereof, that part of the judgment which attempts to fix said lien, although erroneous, does not require a reversal of the cause, but that part of the judgment which attempts to fix an unauthorized lien may be vacated, and the cause affirmed.

On Rehearing.

6. Refusal of the court before trial to vacate an order reviving a case in the name of the personal representative of plaintiff need not be presented to the court in a motion for new trial to secure a review on appeal.

Abatement — setting aside order of revivor — effect.

7. An order setting aside an order to revive an action in the name of the personal representative of plaintiff because of irregularities in procuring it is not a final determination of the right to revive which will prevent further action on the motion.

Appeal — necessity of motion for new trial.

8. A motion for new trial of a motion to set aside a revivor of an action is not necessary to present to the appellate court an order granting the motion to set aside.

9. Failure to perfect an appeal from an order denying a new trial of a motion to set aside a revivor which has been granted does not abandon the motion to revive so as to prevent subsequent action upon it by the court.

ERROR to the District Court for LeFlore County (Brown, J.) to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Modified and affirmed.

The facts are stated in the Commissioner's opinion.

Messrs. W. H. Moore, C. O. Blake, R. J. Roberts, J. E. DuMars, and T. T. Varner, for plaintiff in error:

The trial court was without jurisdiction to try the case or render judgment therein, for the reason that the original plaintiff, Mrs. Jane Pitchford, having died, the cause had not been properly revived.

McAdams v. Latham, 21 Okla. 511, 96 Pac. 584.

No sufficient notice was given the defendant of the application to revive.

The instructions dealing with the duties of a carrier to a passenger placed upon the defendant a higher degree of care than the law imposed.

St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. v. Fick, supra; St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. v. Dobyns, 57 Okla. 643, 157 Pac. 735.

Mr. Jo Johnson for defendant in error.

Davis, C., filed the following opinion:

This action was begun in the district court of Le Flore county, Oklahoma, by Mrs. Jane Pitchford, against the Chicago, Rock Island, & Pacific Railway Company, to recover a judgment for personal injuries alleged to have been received by plaintiff while a passenger on one of the trains of defendant. The parties will be referred to as they appeared in the trial court; that is, plaintiff in error as defendant, and defendant in error as plaintiff.

The plaintiff took passage on one of defendant's trains at Hartford, Arkansas, on the 5th day of November, 1909, for Howe, Oklahoma. When said train arrived at Howe, Oklahoma, plaintiff was injured in alighting from said train. This action was begun to recover for the injuries thus sustained. A judgment was obtained by plaintiff against defendant, and an appeal prosecuted to this court. The judgment was reversed by this court in an opinion written by Mr. Commissioner Sharp, now Chief Justice of the supreme court, and the cause remanded for a new trial. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. v. Pitchford, 44 Okla. 197, 143 Pac. 1146. Before the cause was again called for trial, plaintiff died, and the cause was revived in the name of W. T. Forrester, as administrator of the estate of Mrs. Jane Pitchford, deceased. At the trial of the cause a verdict was rendered in favor of the plaintiff for the sum of $5,000. Judgment was duly entered in favor of plaintiff for said sum, and an appeal is prosecuted to this court to have the proceedings reviewed.

The first specification of error urged by defendant for a reversal of this cause is as follows: "The trial court was without jurisdiction to try the case or render judgment therein for the reason that, the original plaintiff, Mrs. Jane Pitchford, having died, the cause had not been properly revived."

A large part of the brief filed by the defendant in this court is devoted to a discussion of the action of the trial court in entering an order of revivor in the name of the administrator of the estate of deceased. An examination of the record discloses that there was not included in the motion for a new trial any complaint of the action of the court in reviving this action in the name of the administrator of the estate of deceased. The order of revivor was entered on the 11th day of August, 1916, at Stigler, Oklahoma. On the 17th day of November, 1916, a special appearance motion filed by defendant for the purpose of having set aside the order of revivor made on the 11th day of August, 1916, was heard and overruled. This action was not tried until the 23d day of November, 1916. In order to have review of the action of the court in overruling the special motion of defendant filed for the purpose of having vacated the order of revivor made on the 11th day of August, 1916, it was necessary to have incorporated this alleged error in the motion for a new trial, and a failure to present this question in a motion for a new trial precludes this court from a consideration of this question on appeal. Elsea Bros. v. Killian, 38 Okla. 174, 132 Pac. 686; Ahren-Ott Mfg. Co. v. Condon, 23 Okla. 365, 100 Pac. 556; Stark Bros. v. Glaser, 19 Okla. 502, 91 Pac. 1040.

The second assignment of error is that the court erred in sustaining plaintiff's demurrer to section 3 of defendant's amended answer.

That part of the amended answer to which a demurrer was sustained is as follows: "Defendant further alleges that if the plaintiff was appointed administrator of the estate of Mrs. Jane Pitchford, deceased, as alleged in his amended petition, this defendant is informed and believes and alleges the fact to be that Mrs. Jane Pitchford, deceased, at the time of her death, was not the owner of any personal or real property subject to administration, that said appointment was made for the sole purpose of enabling plaintiff to maintain this suit, and that under the laws of the state of Arkansas, said court was without authority to make said appointment; and defendant further alleges that since the appointment of plaintiff as such administrator and prior to the order of revivor herein he had moved from the state of Arkansas, and is now a resident of the state of Oklahoma, and a nonresident of the state of Arkansas, and under the laws of the state of Arkansas said plaintiff at the time of said removal forfeited the letters of administration and the power to act thereunder theretofore granted."

It will be seen from the foregoing answer that the jurisdiction of the probate court to appoint an administrator of the estate of Mrs. Jane Pitchford, deceased, is not called in question. It is attempted to call in question the matters adjudicated by the probate court of Arkansas when said appointment was made. If the probate court of Arkansas had jurisdiction to make the appointment, then it had the jurisdiction to determine whether or not the conditions existed that warranted the making of said appointment, and its conclusion and judgment on such matters were final unless appealed from, and could not be retried in the instant case. The death of Mrs. Pitchford, the existence of property subject to administration, and all other matters that were necessary to be determined in order to make said appointment, were concluded by the order making the appointment, and the attempt to call them in question in this action constitutes a collateral attack upon the judgment of the probate court of Arkansas. There was no error in sustaining a demurrer to such part of the answer as attempted to bring these matters again in question. Evidence thereon could not have been admitted to establish the allegations of the answer, and the trial court rightfully eliminated them from the case. A collateral attack could not be made on the action of the probate court of Arkansas in this matter either by the laws of Arkansas or Oklahoma. Apel v. Kelsey, 52 Ark. 341, 20 Am. St. Rep. 183, 12 S. W. 703; Ark. Const. art. 7, § 34; Daugherty v. Feland, — Okla. —, 157 Pac. 1144; Blackwell v. McCall, 54 Okla. 96, 153 Pac. 815.

That part of the answer which alleged that the administrator had since his appointment moved from the state of Arkansas to the state of Oklahoma, and thereby forfeited his letters of administration, did not state a defense, and there was no error in the action of the trial court in sustaining a demurrer thereto. The removal from the state did not eo instanti vacate the letters. It was necessary that an order be entered by the probate court of

Arkansas upon a proper motion being filed to revoke said letters. The removal from said state furnished a ground sufficient to warrant the probate court in making an order revoking and vacating said letters, but the removal alone did not operate ipso facto to vacate and revoke said letters. The allegation was fatally defective in that it failed to allege that a motion had been filed in the probate court of Arkansas to revoke said letters of administration and an order entered sustaining said motion. McCreary v. Taylor, 38 Ark. 393; Warren & O. Valley R. Co. v. Waldrop, 93 Ark. 127, 123 Pac. 792.

The next error urged for a reversal is that the court erred in admitting incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial testimony offered on the part of plaintiff.

The particular testimony against which this objection is urged is the testimony of Dr. J. R. Wayne and D. E. McDonald.

Dr. Wayne was called as an expert to testify as to the probable effects that the injuries alleged to have been sustained by Mrs. Pitchford would have on a woman such as

Mrs. Pitchford was. While the questions and answers are purely academical, yet it cannot be said that any of them are prejudicial. Drs. Davenport and Routh both appeared as witnesses and testified for plaintiff. They were the physicians who treated Mrs. Pitchford, and the jury was well advised as to the exact nature and extent of the injuries, and we are not inclined to think that the testimony of Dr. Wayne materially added to or detracted from the testimony given by the attending physician.

The witness D. E. McDonald was called as an expert railroad man for the purpose of proving the duty that a common carrier owes to passengers. This testimony is subject to all the criticism urged against it. It was not admissible, and should have been excluded, but from a reading of the entire record we cannot conclude this testimony could have influenced the jury in reaching a verdict. The witness was not present and knew nothing of the facts. There were a number of eyewitnesses who appeared and testified. The testimony of McDonald proves nothing, and in view of the fact that there is ample evidence and testimony to support the verdict and judgment, we are not at liberty to reverse this cause merely for the reason that a witness who knew nothing of the material facts in the case appeared and gave his opinion upon a matter concerning which the jury was the sole and exclusive judge. Before we would be warranted in reversing this cause, it must appear from the entire record that on account of the admission of such evidence there has probably been a miscarriage of justice. This we cannot do, nor is any such contention urged by counsel for defendant. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. v. Austin, — Okla. —, L.R.A.1917D, 666, 163 Pac. 517.

The next error assigned is that the court erred in giving instructions Nos. 3, 4, and 5 in his general charge to the jury.

The instructions complained of are as follows:

"(3) A carrier of persons for reward must use the utmost care and diligence for their safe carriage, must provide everything necessary for that purpose, and must exercise to that end a reasonable degree of skill. Therefore, under the law, if you find that Mrs. Pitchford, in alighting from the defendant's passenger train with ordinary care sustained all or any of the injuries mentioned in the petition by reason of the smallest or slightest negligence of the defendant in all or any of the acts alleged as negligence, your verdict should be for the plaintiff.

"(4) As a public carrier of passengers the defendant was not an insurer of the safety of Mrs. Pitchford while a passenger against all hazards and possibilities of injury, but the law holds the defendant, as such public carrier, to have been the insurer of her absolute safety from all or any of the injuries, if any mentioned in the petition, caused by the smallest or slightest negligence, if any, in all or any of the acts charged as negligence in the petition, unless you should find that Mrs. Pitchford was guilty of contributory negligence as hereinafter defined and explained."

"(5) If you find that Mrs. Pitchford, in alighting from the defendant's train with ordinary care, sustained all or any of the injuries mentioned in the petition, this makes a prima facie case of negligence against the defendant, and the law raises the presumption that the plaintiff is entitled to recover. This presumption would not be conclusive, but would shift the burden of proof from the plaintiff to defendant to show by a preponderance of the evidence that the defendant was not guilty of the smallest or slightest negligence in any of the acts charged as negligence in plaintiff's petition; and if defendant should fail to meet this requirement of the law, your verdict should be for the plaintiff."

It is urged that the foregoing instructions place a higher degree of care on the defendant than the law imposed. The case of St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. v. Fick, 47 Okla. 530, 149 Pac. 1126, is cited as authority for this contention. An examination of the rule announced in the Fick Case discloses that the doctrine announced therein has no application to the facts in this case. The rule in the Fick Case has application to the degree of care required in keeping the platform and premises in a suitable and safe condition.

The particular act of negligence urged in the instant case is that, while Mrs. Pitchford was standing on the car steps and in the act of alighting, a brakeman of said train, who was standing directly in front of Mrs. Pitchford, and who was assisting her in alighting, directed the train to start, and when said train started the brakeman caught hold of the hand of Mrs. Pitchford and jerked her from the steps of the passenger car. In the former opinion in this case this was held to be negligence per se. The sudden starting of the train while Mrs. Pitchford was alighting, and jerking her off the steps, are the particular acts of negligence on which this cause was tried. Hence the rule announced in the Fick Case, supra, has no application here.

We are inclined to the view that the facts in this case bring it within the rule announced in the case of Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. v. Dizney, — Okla. —, 160 Pac. 880 and the case of St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. v. Nichols, 39 Okla. 522, 136 Pac. 159. The negligence which the jury found to be the proximate cause of the injuries was not a defect in the premises or failure to exercise ordinary care in furnishing a means of egress and ingress, but negligence in the operating of the train on which Mrs. Pitchford was a passenger. We are therefore of the opinion that the foregoing instructions are not subject to the criticism offered.

The last assignment of error is that the judgment rendered by the court is erroneous for the reason that it attempted to fix a lien on the property of defendant for the payment of the judgment.

It was ordered and adjudged by the court that plaintiff should have a lien upon the said railroad, its roadbed, buildings, equipment, income, franchise, right of way, and all other appurtenances of said railroad, superior and paramount, whether prior in time or not, to that of all persons interested in said railroad, as managers, lessees, mortgagees, trustees, and beneficiaries under trust or otherwise and it further provided that, if said judgment was not paid in thirty days, one James Baab should be appointed special commissioner to take charge of and sell so much of the property of said defendant as might be necessary to pay said judgment.

We are inclined to think that the trial court possibly exceeded somewhat its jurisdiction in making the foregoing order. So much of the judgment as attempted to fix a lien in excess of that provided by the laws of Oklahoma should be set aside and vacated.

But this does not require a reversal of this cause. 1 Freeman, Judgm. § 120; Koepke v. Dyer, 80 Mich. 311, 45 N. W. 143; 23 Cyc. 697.

We therefore recommend that said judgment be affirmed, and that the cause be remanded to the District Court of Le Flore county, Oklahoma, with directions to modify said judgment in so far as it attempts to fix any lien inconsistent with the lien provided by the laws of Oklahoma.

ion in this case, prepared by Commissioner Davis and adopted by the court, erroneously held that "in order to have reviewed the action of the court in overruling the special motion of defendant filed for the purpose of having vacated the order of revivor made on the 11th day of August, 1916, it was necessary to have incorporated this alleged error in the motion for a new trial, and a failure to present this question in a motion for a new trial precludes this court from a consideration of this question on appeal."

While we have frequently held that an error occurring on the trial of a cause will not be reviewed by this court unless presented to the

revivor—necessity of motion

trial court in a motion for a new trial, the action of the trial court in the instant case in refusing to set aside the revivor was not an error occurring on the trial of the cause; for, as stated in the opinion, the cause was tried on the 23d day of November, 1916, and the motion to vacate was presented and overruled on the 17th day of November, 1916. It was therefore unnecessary to incorporate this alleged ground for reversal in the motion for new trial.

But we think the assignment of error is without merit, and that the trial court did not err in overruling the motion to vacate. The record discloses that Mrs. Pitchford, who was the original plaintiff in the action, died on March 24, 1915, and that W. T. Forrester was appointed administrator of her estate on August 21, 1915. A motion to revive the action was filed on March 4, 1916, and on February 28, 1916, Judge Brown, sitting in chambers at Stigler, Oklahoma, signed an order purporting to revive said action in the name of the administrator. On April 3, 1916, the defendant filed its motion to vacate the order of revivor on account of a number of alleged irregularities in the proceedings to revive, and this motion was sustained on April 13, 1916. On April 15th following plaintiff filed a motion for a new trial on defendant's motion to set aside the revivor, which was overruled on the same day. Plaintiff excepted to this action, and was given time within which to make and serve case made on appeal, but no appeal was taken. Thereafter plaintiff had served on counsel for defendant, who resided in Oklahoma City, a notice that the motion pending in the cause to revive the action in the name of the administrator would be presented to Judge Brown, in chambers at Stigler, Oklahoma, on Monday, July 31, 1916, "or so soon thereafter as said judge may hear said matter." Thereafter, and on August 11, 1916, Judge Brown, sitting in chambers at Stigler, Oklahoma, entered an order reviving the action as prayed.

Counsel contend that, when the trial court overruled plaintiff's motion for a new trial on the order setting aside the first order of revivor, the motion to revive was finally disposed of, and, as no further motion to revive was filed, the court was without jurisdiction to enter the second order of revivor. We are not favorably impressed with this contention; for it is our view that the action of the trial court in setting aside the order of revivor for certain irregularities in procuring the same was not a final determination of the plaintiff's right to revive, and left the motion to revive still pending. Moreover, plaintiff's motion for a new trial on the order setting aside the first revivor did not perform any function in the proceedings. A motion for a new trial was unnecessary to present to the supreme court on appeal the action of the court in setting aside the order of revivor, because it did not grow out of a contested question of fact arising upon the pleadings. Powell v. Nichols, 26 Okla. 734, 29 L.R.A.(N.S.) 886, 110 Pac. 762; Boardman Co. v. Atoka County, — Okla. —, 174 Pac. 272.

Abatement—

—effect.

Appeal—necessity of motion
for new trial.

So, when the plaintiff, pursuant to said motion to revive, gave the necessary notice that the same would be presented to the trial court, said court still had jurisdiction to hear the matter and to enter the second order of revivor. By failing to perfect the appeal on the order setting aside the first revivor plaintiff, in effect, merely acquiesced in said order, but did not abandon his motion to revive.

Although the last order of revivor was made after notice to the defendant was served on counsel by the deputy sheriff of Oklahoma county, Oklahoma, in ample time to file objections thereto, the objections made in both of defendant's motions to set aside the respective orders of revivor did not go to the merits of plaintiff's right to revive, nor does the defendant contend that the action is one that could not be revived, and it never at any time filed any pleadings resisting plaintiff's grounds for revivor. We find no substantial error in the granting of the second order of revivor, and the technical objections made in defendant's brief, in our opinion, are not supported by authority or reason.

The other questions urged on rehearing were fully considered by the commissioner, and we concur with his views thereon as expressed in the opinion.

This is the second time this case has been to this court, the plaintiff recovering in both actions, and from an examination of the entire record we believe that substantial justice has been done, and that the judgment of the trial court should be affirmed, as modified in the original opinion.

All the Justices concur, except Turner and Brett, JJ., absent.

NOTE.

The general subject, "What effects removal of executor or administrator," is treated in the annotation beginning at page 175, post. The specific point as to the effect of disqualification being discussed in subdivision V. of that annotation.

W. J. SCHWENCK, Admr., etc., of John Bauer, Deceased.

(— Ohio St. —, 124 N. E. 61.)

Executor and administrator — resignation — removal — appointment of successor.

1. The receiving of the resignation of an executor or administrator by the probate court appointing such officer, and the filing of the document by the judge thereof, followed by the appointment of a successor, is a sufficient compliance with the requirements of § 10,627, General Code, and the new appointment, so made, is in all respects a valid one.

— filing of final account — effect.

2. The filing of an account in the probate court by an executor or administrator, denominated "final account," does not operate to terminate the trust, as long as there remains assets under his jurisdiction subject to the payment of valid debts of the decedent, and the failure of the fiduciary to proceed with the administration of the trust, which, under some circumstances, may justify a removal of the officer, does not constitute, ipso facto, an abandonment of the trust.

Appeal — removal of administrator.

3. A proceeding filed in the probate court to remove an administrator de bonis non for the reason that his predecessor was still rightfully in office is appealable under favor of § 11,206, General Code.

ERROR to the Court of Appeals for Crawford County to review a judgment affirming a judgment of the Court of Common Pleas (Babst, J.) in favor of defendant in a proceeding for his removal as administrator of John Bauer. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. R. V. Sears and J. W. McCarron, for plaintiff in error:

Schumacher v. McCallip, 69 Ohio St. 500, 69 N. E. 986; Todhunter v. Stewart, 39 Ohio St. 181.

Nichols, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

John Bauer died testate in October, 1883. His widow, Anna Catherine Bauer, was appointed executrix of his will. On February 28, 1885, she filed a partial account. This account, showing a balance due her of $3,688, was confirmed. December 17, 1890, she resigned. The resignation was in writing, and in the same document she recommended the appointment of R. W. Johnston as her successor. The resignation and recommendation were duly filed by the probate judge of Crawford county. There is no record to be found of the formal acceptance of this resignation.

December 30, 1890, such probate court issued its letters in due form to R. W. Johnston as administrator d. b. n. with will annexed, who duly qualified. The new officer proceeded with the administration, and in due course sold 80 acres of land and made application of proceeds to the payment of debts.

On April 11, 1914, R. W. Johnston filed an account designated "final account." This account was confirmed, there being, however, no formal discharge of the administrator by the court. The records of the probate court do not show, nor is it claimed that Johnston ever filed, any written resignation of this trust, nor do they show that he was removed therefrom.

The widow was devised a life estate in all the real estate of the testator. She died intestate in July, 1916, never having divested herself of this estate. Charles F. Schaber was appointed administrator of her estate, and took immediate steps to enforce payment of the balance found due her as executrix of her husband's estate.

On November 17, 1916, W. J. Schwenck was appointed as administrator d. b. n. with will annexed of John Bauer, such appointment having been made without the written waiver or consent of any of the heirs at law or devisees of John Bauer, although quite a number of them were residents of Crawford county; nor is there any claim that notice of the application for appointment was served on these heirs and devisees.

There remains unsold, of the real estate of John Bauer, about 243 acres of land in Crawford county, being an asset under the control of the administrator, if the debts now asserted are found to be genuine. The debts claimed to be still due from the John Bauer estate are in dispute and are in fact in litigation.

It was further agreed, as shown by the record, that R. W. Johnston, administrator, would testify that at the time he filed his so-called final account he then was, and has been at all times since, ready to proceed with any duties that might devolve on him as such administrator. No testimony was offered to dispute this state of facts.

We learn from the record that Johnston, administrator, on December 7, 1916, filed an application, duly verified, seeking the removal of Schwenck, administrator. Johnston alleges in this application that he had neither resigned his trust nor been removed therefrom, and that he is still the duly appointed administrator, and duly authorized by law to proceed with the duties of the office; that claims to a large amount have been recently asserted against the estate, which it is charged are illegal; and that he is now ready to defend the estate against such claims and to perfect and conserve the estate.

It is further alleged that in certain proceedings in partition pending in common pleas court of Crawford county Schwenck, administrator, has filed cross petition, wherein he asserts the validity of the alleged debts, and asks for a sale of the real estate in order to pay them. Such application was heard in the probate court, and the motion to remove Schwenck was overruled, the court holding that from the facts hereinbefore set forth Johnston's conduct was such as to constitute in law and fact an abandonment of the trust.

The cause was thereupon appealed to the court of common pleas, where it was heard on stipulation of the parties, as to the facts, the finding on the issues thus joined being in favor of Schwenck and against Johnston, administrator. In due course the cause reached the court of appeals, the entry in which court shows that the judgment of the court of common pleas was affirmed on the ground that substantial justice had been done.

We have no official information as to the ground of affirmation, but we do learn, both from briefs and oral statements of counsel for both parties, that it was the holding of the court of appeals that the appointment of Johnston in 1890 was invalid for the reason that there was no record evidence in the probate court of the acceptance of the resignation of Anna Catherine Bauer, the original fiduciary.

On application of Johnston, administrator, the case was admitted to this court for review.

There are three legal questions involved in this case:

(1) Do the undisputed facts of the case establish in law an abandonment of the trust by Johnston, administrator?

(2) Is it a prerequisite, before the probate court has jurisdiction to appoint a successor in office, to an executrix who has tendered her resignation, that such court shall formally accept the resignation?

(3) Is a proceeding to remove an administrator, or to revoke letters of administration, appealable under the Code?

The probate court based its decision on the finding of the court that the conduct of Johnston with respect to the office amounted to an abandonment of the trust. We are wholly unable to find anything in the facts, hereinbefore fully set forth, to justify any such conclusion. It is true that Johnston filed what was termed his final account, a great many years ago, and in the meantime made no move in the direction of exercising the functions of the office. This conduct is to be considered in the light of the facts and circumstances surrounding the estate. If there was any creditor whose claim remained unsatisfied, it was the widow, to whom there was a balance due of $3,688, as shown by her final account. She occupied the dual relation of creditor and life tenant. In order to satisfy her claim, it would be necessary to sell the property, of which, all through these intervening years, she had the beneficial enjoyment.

There is a dispute as to the validity of the debt; it being claimed to have been extinguished by agreement of the parties. But, conceding its validity, the failure of the administrator to proceed, it is to be fairly presumed, was with her full acquiescence, if not at her absolute direction.

This situation presents the very best of reasons why the administration should have been suspended until the death of the widow. She alone could complain of delay, and, as we have demonstrated, she was being benefited rather than harmed.

It is the universal holding that the authority of an executor or administrator to represent the estate continues until the estate is fully settled, unless he is removed, dies, or resigns, and that the filing of what pur-filing of final account—effect.

ports to be a final account does not extinguish the trust. Indeed, in the case of Weyer v. Watt, 48 Ohio St. 545, 28 N. E. 670, it was held that an order by the court, directing that the administrator be discharged, made at the time of the filing of a final account, does not terminate his authority if assets of the estate remain unadministered.

In the case at bar, the real estate, so far as it may have been necessary to pay any valid indebtedness, was all the while, technically at least, an asset in the hands of the administrator.

The second question in the case is that suggested by the court of appeals in its affirmance of the judgment of the common pleas. Is it necessary upon the filing by the executor of an estate of a resignation of the trust, with a recommendation that a particular person be appointed as successor, for the court, before acquiring jurisdiction to appoint such successor, to accept the resignation by formal entry of such fact upon its journal?

Counsel for Schwenck, administrator, contend that such necessity exists under the law, and cite the case of Reiter v. State, 51 Ohio St. 74, 23 L.R.A. 681, 36 N. E. 943, and § 10,627, General Code, in support of their contention. We are of the contrary opinion, and hold that the filing of the resignation of the executor, followed by the issuing of letters of administration d. b. n. with will annexed to another, is to be considered an acceptance by the court of such resignation.

removal—appointment of successor.

A consideration of the case of Reiter v. State, supra, instead of establishing the necessity of formal acceptance, when carefully analyzed, really decides such acceptance not indispensable to the authority to fill a vacancy. Especially is this true when the Reiter Case is considered in connection with § 10,627, General Code. It is held in the first proposition of the syllabus in the Reiter Case: "By the rules of the common law, a resignation of an office does not take effect, so as to create a vacancy, until such resignation is accepted by the proper authority; but the common law in this regard is not in force in this state, to its full extent, and here a resignation without acceptance creates a vacancy, to the extent at least of giving jurisdiction to appoint or elect a successor, unless otherwise provided by statute."

Accepting this syllabus as the accepted law of the state, let us examine the statute on the subject of the resignation of an administrator, and the filling of the vacant trust by the probate court, and determine whether it is "otherwise provided by statute." Let it be understood that this exception, if it does exist, and has been provided for by statute, must, like all exceptions to every general rule, be made clearly to appear. Section 10,627 reads: "The court issuing letters testamentary or appointing an administrator, if it deems fit, upon good cause shown, may receive the resignation of such executor or administrator, and appoint an administrator in his place."

In the first place, let it be noted that the language employed is not that the court may or must accept the resignation, but simply that it may "receive" it, "if it deems fit." That the court, in the case under consideration, did receive the resignation, so far at least as filing with his official signature the document purporting to be such, is an admitted fact, and the original paper, with proper file marks, is to be found in the archives of the court. To take a thing is to "receive" it. Ordinarily, if some further action is to be had by the recipient, the use of the expression "accept" would be expected, and an investigation of the statutes respectively relating to the resignation of guardians, trustees, and commissioner of insolvents discloses the fact that the term "may accept the resignation" is employed. In this connection we refer to §§ 11,035, 11,147, and 10,938, General Code.

Of course, there is a sense in which the terms "receive" and "accept" are synonymous, and when it is seen by the terms of the statute under consideration that the judge of the probate court is vested with some discretion, in that it is said that he may receive it, "if he deems fit" and upon good cause being shown, it may, with some force of reason, be urged that some further action is implied. What is meant by "if he deems fit" or upon good cause being shown, in such circumstances as these, is not easily understood.

It occurs to us that if one who has been acting as administrator or executor concludes that he does not desire to continue longer in that capacity, whether the cause inducing his decision be good or bad, or whether it be without reason at all, the court could not force him to remain in office against his will. It is supposable that if such officer had been unfaithful to his trust, the court might prefer to remove him rather than permit him to resign, although his own liability for breach of trust, or that of his bondsmen, could not be affected by the manner in which his connection with the trust was terminated.

We are not inclined, however, to decide this question on a mere technicality, or mere nicety as to shade of meaning of terms, although, if we did do so, it would be only opposing technicality to technicality; for surely the questioning of the validity of the appointment of an administrator twenty years after his induction into office, and after he had faithfully discharged important duties in connection with the trust, would be pushing formality and technicality beyond all just limits, particularly when the sole basis of the attack was that the court making the appointment had failed to enter on its journal an acceptance of the resignation of the predecessor in office. It would be dismal surrender to mere form, and a patent sacrifice of the substance of things, to so hold, especially when we consider that the administrator, then appointed without objection of either creditor, heir, or devisee, performed the functions of his office, selling real estate, paying debts, and rendering proper account of his administration.

We have facts of a most substantial nature that impel us to hold the appointment of Johnston to be valid; for the court, receiving the resignation of the executrix, acted on it and treated it as a completed transaction in that immediately after receiving the same it proceeded to fill the vacancy by the appointment of Johnston, to whom it issued letters of authority under the seal of the court.

We are of the opinion that if an acceptance of the resignation of the executrix is a condition precedent to the power of making the new appointment, then the action of the court in receiving the resignation and thereafter appointing a successor is in law tantamount to an acceptance thereof.

With reference to the third question we hold that a proceeding of the character here under consideration is appealable from the probate court, feeling that the cause is well within the spirit of § 11,206, General Code.

The judgment of the Court of Appeals is accordingly reversed, and the cause is remanded to the Probate Court of Crawford county, with directions to proceed in accordance with the finding of this court.

I. Resignation.

Where a court having power to remove an executor or administrator accepts his resignation, the power of the fiduciary so resigning is thereby terminated. Jennings v. LeBreton (1889) 80 Cal. 8, 21 Pac. 1127; Marsh v. People (1853) 15 Ill. 284; Sample v. Adams (1913) 54 Ind. App. 680, 100 N. E. 573; Balch v. Hooper (1884) 32 Minn. 158, 20 N. W. 124; Tulburt v. Hollar (1889) 102 N. C. 406, 9 S. E. 430.

  - c. Administration pendente lite, 180.
- V. Disqualification:
  - a. Generally, 181.
  - b. By marriage, 181.
  - c. By loss of office giving right to administer, 182.
- VI. Completion of administration, 183.

In Marsh v. People (1853) 15 Ill. 284, it was held that the resignation of an administrator and its acceptance by the court were equivalent to a revocation of the grant of administration to him, and thereafter his coadministrators were alone liable for maladministration of the estate.

In Jennings v. Le Breton (1889) 80 Cal. 8, 21 Pac. 1127, it was held that where an executor had resigned and filed his final account, and the court appointed another person administratrix four days thereafter, this was equivalent to an acceptance of the executor's resignation and a revocation of his letters testamentary.

In Sample v. Adams (1913) 54 Ind. App. 680, 100 N. E. 573, it appeared that an administratrix had been appointed by the Clinton circuit court to take charge of the estate of Eliza Ramseyer, and duly qualified as such. Within a short time after her appointment, the administratrix filed her final report and resignation. The court approved the report and accepted the resignation, and discharged her from further duties in said estate. Thereafter, another administrator was appointed by the court of Tipton county and an administrator de bonis non was appointed by the Clinton county circuit court, and the question was, which was entitled to administration of the estate? Both administrators had been appointed pursuant to the provision of law that the probate court of the county wherein the decedent resided at the time of his death should have jurisdiction. It was held that the acceptance of the resignation of the original administratrix amounted to an annulment of the letters issued to her, but was not an adjudication that the Clinton circuit court did not have jurisdiction of the estate.

In Balch v. Hooper (1884) 32 Minn. 158, 20 N. W. 124, it appeared that an administrator with the will annexed asked leave of the court to resign on account of ill health and advanced age, and rendered a final account, whereupon the court entered an order approving his account and accepting his resignation, but did not expressly revoke his letters. It was held that the acceptance of the resignation amounted to a removal of the administrator and a revocation of his letters.

In Tulburt v. Hollar (1889) 102 N. C. 406, 9 S. E. 430, it was held that the resignation of an administrator and its acceptance by the probate court and the appointment of a successor had no other practical effect than a removal or a revocation of letters, and therefore no action could be maintained against the administrator.

But in Flinn v. Chase (1847) 4

Denio (N. Y.) 85, it was held that an administrator was not removed from office by tendering his resignation, which the surrogate accepted, because the administrator was about to remove from the village and would find it inconvenient to act further as administrator, a surrogate not having the authority to accept a resignation except in those cases provided by law for the revocation of letters, and, consequently, that a grant of letters to another as administrator was void as the office was not vacant.

In Rumrill v. First Nat. Bank (1881) 28 Minn. 202, 9 N. W. 731, it was held that a resignation by an executor, which had been accepted by an indorsement on it and filed and no other act done in respect to it, was not sufficient to remove the administrator from office, although it might be a good ground for removing him, the court saying: "A resignation tendered by an executor or administrator might be good ground for removing him or revoking his letters, and an acceptance of the resignation by the court, if entered, in the form of an order, in the record which the statute requires the court to keep of appointment of administrators, etc., with all orders relating to the same (Gen. Stat. 1866, chap. 49, § 8, subd. 3), might be taken to have the effect of a removal or revocation of the letters. But a resignation tendered, and an acceptance indorsed on it and filed, no entry being made in the record, and no further act done in respect to it,—and that appears to have been all there was in this case,—can have no legal effect on the status of the administrator."

II. Act of court tantamount to removal.

a. Generally.

Where a court which has the power to remove an executor or administrator treats one of two joint fiduciaries as the sole executor or administrator, disregarding the other, the latter is in effect removed. State ex rel. Rucker v. Rucker (1875) 59 Mo. 17; Vosler v. Brock (1884) 84 Mo. 574.

In State ex rel. Rucker v. Rucker (Mo.) supra, where an administrator and administratrix had been appointed, and the administratrix thereafter became a nonresident of the state, it was held that while the non-residence alone did not work a revocation of her letters, the fact that the court from that time treated the remaining administrator as the sole administrator amounted to a virtual revocation of the power and authority of the administratrix.

In Vosler v. Brock (1884) 84 Mo. 574, it appeared that two executors had been appointed pursuant to the provisions of a will, and thereafter one of them removed from the state. The court then treated the other as the sole testamentary representative of the deceased. It was held that this, in effect, discharged the one who had become disqualified by nonresidence, although no formal entry to that effect appeared.

So, where ground for the removal of an executor or administrator exists, the appointment of a successor to him amounts to a removal, though no formal order of removal is made. Ragland v. King (1860) 37 Ala. 80; Berry v. Bellows (1875) 30 Ark. 198; Loveman v. Taylor (1886) 85 Tenn. 1, 2 S. W. 29.

In Berry v. Bellows (1875) 30 Ark. 198, it was held that where an administrator enlisted in the Confederate Army, the court had the right to appoint another in his place, as by enlisting he became incapable of properly managing the estate; and that the appointment of an administratrix under such circumstances was an implied revocation of the letters of the former administrator. The court said: "It would have been more regular to revoke his letters directly in the order appointing her, but his letters were by implication revoked."

In Loveman v. Taylor (Tenn.) supra, it appeared that the executor named in a will renounced his right and an administrator with the will annexed was appointed. Thereafter, in an action against the administrator for an accounting, a decree was rendered construing the will and ordering an accounting of the estate in the hands of the administrator, and appointing a trustee to take charge of the estate. It was held that the appointment of the trustee operated in law as a removal of the administrator.

In Ragland v. King (Ala.) supra, it appeared that an executor and executrix had been appointed, the executrix being the widow of the testator. The executor died, and, as the executrix refused to renew her bond, the court appointed an administrator de bonis non, with the will annexed. It was contended that as the executrix had neither died, resigned, nor been removed, the appointment of the administrator was void, as there was no vacancy in the office. It was held that the executrix had been removed, although no formal order had been entered to that effect, and with the view of sustaining the second grant of administration when collaterally attacked, it would be proper to consider the action of the court as amounting to the removal of the executrix.

b. Annulment of will.

The annulment of a will has been held to operate as a removal of an executor appointed thereunder. Heffner's Succession (1897) 49 La. Ann. 407, 21 So. 906. And a like holding has been made as to an administrator c. t. a. Kilton v. Anderson (1893) 18 R. I. 136, 49 Am. St. Rep. 751, 25 Atl. 907.

But in Floyd v. Herring (1870) 64 N. C. 409, an administrator cum testamento annexo had been appointed, there being no executor named in the will. Thereafter the probate of the will was revoked. It was held that the revocation of probate in common form did not have the effect of annulling the administration, which had been properly granted, although if it were set aside, a different question might arise.

c. Probate of will subsequently discovered.

It has been held that the probate of a will operates as a removal of an administrator appointed before the discovery of the will. Schluter v. Bowery Sav. Bank (1889) 117 N. Y. 125, 5 L.R.A. 541, 15 Am. St. Rep. 494, 22 N. E. 572. And a like effect has been attached to the appointment of an executor under a will subsequently discovered. Waltz's Appeal (Re Nelson) (1913) 242 Pa. 167, 49 L.R.A. 894, 88 Atl. 974. In that case it was held that the appointment of an executor named in a will, after an administrator had been appointed, in effect revoked the appointment of the administrator. The administrator could not thereafter administer the estate, even though all the legatees had signed an agreement to that effect, and the estate had been almost completely administered. It was not in the power of the legatees to make such an agreement, as the testator had a legal right to name the persons who should administer it, and furthermore it was a condition of the bond prescribed by law that letters of administration should be surrendered "if it shall hereafter appear that any last will and testament was made by the deceased."

In Dwight v. Simon (1849) 4 La. Ann. 490, it appeared that an administrator of an estate had been appointed, and some time thereafter a will was found and probated, but the executor therein named did not signify his intention of accepting or renouncing the executorship until over three years after the probate. In the meantime the administrator had become bankrupt. It was held that the authority of the administrator continued until the executor took office and qualified, as otherwise the estate would have been without anyone in charge. It was also held that the fact that the administrator became bankrupt did not serve to prevent him from continuing to act, but was merely a ground for his removal.

III. Expiration of statutory period for settling estate.

It has been held that where a statute fixes the time within which the estate of a decedent shall be administered, the expiration of that period terminates the authority of the executor or administrator. Deranco v. Montgomery (1858) 13 La. Ann. 513; Brown v. Williams (1840) 16 La. 344.

In Deranco v. Montgomery (La.) supra, it was held that an executor could not be held liable to pay a legacy under the will after the lapse of over thirty years, the Statute of Limitations being applicable.

In Brown v. Williams (La.) supra, it was held that the term of an executor expired at the end of the year as provided by statute, and he had no authority, thirteen months thereafter, to bring an action in his capacity as executor.

Compare Taylor v. Jeffries Estate (1836) 10 La. 435, wherein it was held that the office of an administrator did not expire at the end of a year, by operation of law, but continued, according to the Code, in at least one class of cases, until partition was made among the heirs.

In Gayoso de Lemos v. Garcia (1823) 1 Mart. N. S. (La.) 324, it was held that where an executor was given power by will to sell land, he did not cease to be executor until the sale had been completed, although several years had elapsed since letters testamentary had been issued.

In other jurisdictions, however, the termination of the statutory period does not ipso facto discharge the executor or administrator. Marfield v. McMurdy (1905) 25 App. D. C. 342; McLain v. Pate (1910) 58 Tex. Civ. App. 500, 124 S. W. 718; Poor v. Boyce (1854) 12 Tex. 440.

In McLain v. Pate (1910) 58 Tex. Civ. App. 500, 124 S. W. 718, it was held that the lapse of eighteen years did not operate to bring about a discharge of an administratrix, and she was therefore clothed with all the powers of an administratrix, and could give a good title to a land certificate belonging to the estate.

In Poor v. Boyce (Tex.) supra, it was held that where an administratrix had continued to act as such after the time for administration had expired, and her right to act as such was recognized by the court, a sale made by her could not be held void as it would be presumed that her authority had been extended by the court even though no order was entered to that effect.

In Marfield v. McMurdy (D. C.) supra, it was held that an executorship did not terminate at the end of the period of administration, but continued as long as there remained anything under the will to be executed. "The argument of the appellant, in opposition to this, is that the executorship, properly so called, ceased at the termination of the period of administration, that is, in about twelve or thirteen months after the issue of letters testamentary and the settlement of account or the lapse of the time for such settlement in the probate court; and that thereafter the appellee held the estate as trustee, with compensation, if any, dependent upon a court of equity. But this is an argument based upon words, not upon substantial things. The executor does not cease to be executor because the period of administration, so called, may be passed. He is still executor as long as he has anything under the will to execute. He is just as much a trustee during the period of administration as after it. Every executor, administrator, guardian, receiver, assignee, and other person or persons acting in a fiduciary capacity, is a trustee; and the only difference, at all events the principal difference, between an executor during the period of administration, and an executor after the lapse of the period of administration, is that the former is responsible to the probate court for the faithful execution of his trust, the latter to a court of equity. He is equally a trustee at both times, and equally an executor."

IV. Expiration of period of appointment.

a. Temporary administration.

The issuance of regular letters of an administrator effects the removal of a temporary administrator. Re Haag (1917) 100 Misc. 249, 166 N. Y. Supp. 621; Re Dayton (1917) 100 Misc. 632, 166 N. Y. Supp. 951, affirmed without opinion in (1918) 182 App. Div. 886, 168 N. Y. Supp. 1106; Re Lewis (1883) 17 N. Y. Week. Dig. 311; Re Goetz (1907) 120 App. Div. 10, 104 N. Y. Supp. 882; Hastings v. Tousey (1908) 123 App. Div. 480, 108 N. Y. Supp. 526; Re Neil (1918) 184 App. Div. 507, 172 N. Y. Supp. 79.

In Re Haag (N. Y.) supra, it was held that the appointment of an executor terminated the authority of a temporary administrator, except to make an accounting and to turn over to the executor the assets remaining in his hands.

In Re Dayton (1917) 100 Misc. 632, 166 N. Y. Supp. 951, affirmed without opinion in (1918) 182 App. Div. 886, 168 N. Y. Supp. 1106, it was held that the powers of a temporary administrator ceased on the probating of a will and the granting of letters testamentary to the executor named therein. The only power remaining to the temporary administrator was to make an account of its proceedings and to pay over to the executor the assets in its hands.

In Re Goetz (1907) 120 App. Div. 10, 104 N. Y. Supp. 882, it was held that the appointment of an administrator with the will annexed terminated the authority of a temporary administrator, the only remaining duties of the temporary administrator being to account to the surrogate's court which appointed him and to turn over the assets in his hands to the administrator with the will annexed, when directed to do so by the surrogate.

In the case of Re Lewis (1883) 17 N. Y. Week. Dig. 311, it was held that the appointment of an administrator as collector of an estate was absolutely superseded and ended by the appointment of an administrator with the will annexed. Nothing further was required to terminate his authority over the estate or his right to retain the funds which he had received during the time the letters to him continued to be in force.

In the case of Re Neil (1918) 184 App. Div. 507, 172 N. Y. Supp. 79, it was held that the formal revocation of the letters of a temporary administrator was unnecessary where permanent letters had been issued, as the issuance of the latter effected the removal of the temporary administrator in itself.

In Hastings v. Tousey (1908) 123 App. Div. 480, 108 N. Y. Supp. 526, it appeared that the plaintiff was temporary administrator of the estate of Rosalie Tousey Hastings, and in this capacity brought suit to determine the ownership of a certain share of stock which he held, and if it should be held to belong to the estate, to compel a transfer of it on the books of the defendant corporation. Pending the suit, the plaintiff was appointed executor of the estate, and it was held that he could not continue the action in the character of temporary administrator, as his appointment as executor ipso facto extinguished whatever authority he might have had as temporary administrator, and this without any formal revocation of his letters of temporary administration.

The office of an administrator appointed to act during the minority of the next of kin of an intestate terminates when the next of kin becomes of age. Riegel's Appeal (1886) 2 Sadler (Pa.) 58, 17 W. N. C. 279, 4 Atl. 173, wherein it was held that the office of an administrator appointed for the minority of the next of kin of the decedent, where the next of kin were all under age at the time, was terminated when the eldest son of the decedent arrived at full age, for although his letters did not so state, he took the letters subject to the condition expressed in the statute.

The authority of the administrator appointed pendente lite ceases with the termination of the litigation. State ex rel. Ashton v. Imel (1912) 243 Mo. 180, 147 S. W. 989; Cole v. Wooden (1840) 18 N. J. L. 15; Woolley v. Pemberton (1886) 41 N. J. Eq. 394, 5 Atl. 189.

In State ex rel. Ashton v. Imel (Mo.) supra, it appeared that the relator, Mrs. Ashton, was the widow and executrix of the will of Thomas Ashton, deceased. A daughter of the testator contested the will, making the relator a party defendant. Thereafter she applied to the probate court for an order appointing an administrator pendente lite. This application was granted, an administrator pendente lite being appointed. The executrix asked leave to appeal from the order of the probate court appointing the administrator pendente lite. The probate court refused to allow an appeal, and the executrix sued out of the circuit court of Buchanan county an alternative writ of mandamus. In reply to the writ, the probate judge filed a demurrer, and the demurrer was sustained and judgment entered denying the right of the relator to an absolute writ of mandamus. Upon appeal from that judgment, the case was sent from the court of appeals to the supreme court of the state. While these suits were in progress, the contest of the will resulted in a judgment sustaining its validity. It was therefore held that, as the powers and duties of the administrator pendente lite had ceased ipso facto when the will contest was ended, the appeal should be dismissed, as there was no longer any real substance left in the case. If the writ of mandamus were allowed there would be nothing gained by it, as the legal existence of the administrator pendente lite had long since ceased. "By analogy, his office is said to be in the nature of a receivership; and, when the contest is at an end and the validity of the will established, his term of office expires and his right to act ends."

In Cole v. Wooden (1840) 18 N. J. L. 15, it was held that the authority of an administrator pendente lite ended when the suit for the duration of which he was appointed was at an end, and no agreement of those interested to continue such administrator in office could give him any authority. The only way this could be done would be to take out letters in the regular way.

In Woolley v. Pemberton (N. J.) supra, it was held, inter alia, that the functions of an administrator pendente lite ceased when the litigation over the will was concluded, except that he would still remain liable to account for what he received and to pay whatever remained in his hands to the person pronounced by the court to be entitled thereto for further distribution.

In Diehr v. Dean (1916) — Mo. App. —, 187 S. W. 602, it was held that the authority of an administrator pendente lite did not end with the termination of a will contest, but continued until the final result of the will contest was duly certified to the probate court.

It has been held that the office of an executor or administrator is vacated by his voluntary doing of an act which disqualifies him. Poindexter's Succession (1867) 19 La. 22; Vogel's Succession (1868) 20 La. Ann. 81; Hebert v. Jackson (1876) 28 La. Ann. 377.

In Hebert v. Jackson (La.) supra, it was held that an executor forfeited his office by leaving the Federal lines and joining the Confederate Army. The office thereby became vacant, hence a confession of judgment against the estate after the war was over was a nullity.

In Poindexter's Succession (La.) supra, it was held that a curator, by refusing to take the oath of allegiance and going beyond the jurisdiction of the proper authority, became functus officio, and lost all right to control or administer the property any further, and all right to any commissions, except on sums received or recovered by him prior to his abandonment of his trust.

In Vogel's Succession (1868) 20 La. Ann. 81, it was held that an executor who had voluntarily incapacitated himself from performing the duties of his office by refusing to take the oath of allegiance required of all persons exercising functions public or private, and by registering himself as an enemy of the United States, by reason of which he was expelled from the jurisdiction of the court, ceased to be an executor of the estate, and the appointment of a dative executor, without first revoking the letters testamentary previously issued, was proper, as the office had become vacant by the executor's acts.

163, it was held that the removal of an administrator of an estate from the state after his appointment as administrator did not ipso facto vacate the letters, but merely furnished sufficient ground to warrant the probate court in making an order revoking and vacating the letters.

In some jurisdictions it is held that the marriage of an executrix or administratrix terminates her authority to act. Pistole v. Street (1837) 5 Port. (Ala.) 64; Kavanaugh v. Thompson (1849) 16 Ala. 817; Whittaker v. Wright (1880) 35 Ark. 511; Carrol v. Connet (1829) 2 J. J. Marsh. (Ky.) 195; Tribble v. Broaddus (1893) 15 Ky. L. Rep. 324, 23 S. W. 349; Wood v. Chetwood (1876) 27 N. J. Eq. 311; Re Fagin (1887) 10 Ohio Dec. Reprint, 180. Compare Cadwallader v. Evans (1857) 1 Disney (Ohio) 585, 12 Ohio Dec. Reprint, 811.

In Pistole v. Street (Ala.) supra, it was held that an administratrix, by marriage, lost her capacity to act as administratrix during the coverture, but as she survived her husband her right to administer revived, but she remained liable for his administration of the estate.

In Re Fagin (1887) 10 Ohio Dec. Reprint, 180, it was held that an unmarried woman who was appointed executrix and subsequently married thereby lost her capacity to be an executrix. Her authority was extinguished by her marriage, as a statute expressly provided that it should be. Rev. Stat. § 6022.

In Tribble v. Broaddus (1893) 15 Ky. L. Rep. 324, 23 S. W. 349, it was held that the marriage of an executrix terminated her authority to act, there being a statute to that effect, except where the widow was constituted a trustee by the will, which the court held she was not in this case.

In Wood v. Chetwood (1876) 27 N. J. Eq. 311, it was held that where an executrix married, her husband became executor in her place and rendered himself a trustee with her of the assets of the estate, and, as such, he might be compelled to account.

In Whittaker v. Wright (1880) 35

Ark. 511, it was held that where an executrix of an estate married and removed from the state, she thereby ceased to be an executrix, as neither a married woman nor a nonresident could be administratrix or executrix.

In Kavanaugh v. Thompson (1849) 16 Ala. 817, it was held that where an administratrix married, her husband became administrator in his own right, and took on himself all the duties, and was entitled to all the privileges, which belonged to the administratrix before the marriage. He was therefore the proper representative of both, and service of citation upon him would be sufficient without also serving the wife.

In Carrol v. Connet (1829) 2 J. J. Marsh. (Ky.) 195, it was held that although an administratrix became incapable by reason of marriage, yet this did not release her sureties, as they remained liable for her husband's acts, since he became administrator by reason of the marriage.

In Cadwallader v. Evans (1857) 1 Disney (Ohio) 585, 12 Ohio Dec. Reprint, 811, it was held that where a woman was sole administratrix, her subsequent marriage did not terminate her office. Her husband thereby became coadministrator with her.

In other jurisdictions the marriage of an executrix or administratrix does not ipso facto revoke the letters issued to her, though it may be a ground for her removal. Schroeder v. Superior Ct. (1886) 70 Cal. 343, 11 Pac. 651; McMillan v. Hayward (1892) 94 Cal. 357, 29 Pac. 774; Jenkins v. Jenkins (1864) 23 Ind. 79; Yates v. Clark (1878) 56 Miss. 212; Lindsay v. Lindsay (1787) 1 S. C. Eq. (1 Desauss.) 150; Hamilton v. Levy (1894) 41 S. C. 374, 19 S. E. 610. Compare Teschmacher v. Thompson (1861) 18 Cal. 11, 79 Am. Dec. 151.

In McMillan v. Hayward (1892) 94 Cal. 357, 29 Pac. 774, it was held that the marriage of an executrix did not ipso facto extinguish her authority to act as executrix, but was merely a ground for her removal, and until removed she continued to exercise all the functions of the office.

In Schroeder v. Superior Ct. (1886) 70 Cal. 343, 11 Pac. 651, it was held that the marriage of an executrix did not "eo instanti" extinguish her authority, but merely rendered her incompetent to act, and was a ground for her removal. The words "her authority is extinguished," it was held, were employed in §§ 1352 and 1350, 1411, 1436, 1437, and other sections of the Code of Civil Procedure as the equivalent of "she ceases to be competent."

In Yates v. Clark (1878) 56 Miss. 212, it was held that the marriage of an executrix did not per se revoke her authority to act as executrix, nor did the fact that her husband failed to furnish a bond, as required by statute in such cases, have that effect. It was but a ground for removal, and until the exercise by the proper court of its power of removal for this cause, her power as executrix remained in full force.

In Jenkins v. Jenkins (1864) 23 Ind. 79, it was held that a married woman was competent to act as an executrix or administratrix with her husband's consent, under the statutes relating thereto (2 Gavin & H. 486, § 1, and 2 Gavin & H. 491-493, §§ 22 and 27), and such consent did not make the husband a coadministrator with the wife.

In Hamilton v. Levy (1894) 41 S. C. 374, 19 S. E. 610, it was held that the marriage of an administratrix did not revoke her letters of administration, but made the husband her coadministrator, who would be liable for any act of administration afterwards performed by her.

In Teschmacher v. Thompson (1861) 18 Cal. 11, 79 Am. Dec. 151, it was held that where an executrix had intermarried with one of her coexecutors, her authority as executrix ceased, and therefore the action was properly brought in the name of the executors.

Where the right to act as executor or administrator is appurtenant to the possession of a public office, it has been held that the resignation of the officer or the expiration of his term terminates his power to administer.

Landford v. Dunklin (1882) 71 Ala. 594; Levi v. Huggins (1868) 48 S. C. L. (14 Rich.) 166.

In Landford v. Dunklin (Ala.) supra, it was held that, by the particular phraseology of a statute which prescribed the duties of sheriffs and coroners, and stated that where a sheriff or coroner acted as administrator, the administration should attach to the office, and not to the person, the power of the sheriff to act as administrator ended when his term as sheriff expired, and that it was not necessary for letters of administration which would thus expire by operation of law to be revoked before letters could be granted to another person.

In Levi v. Huggins (1867) 48 S. C. L. (14 Rich.) 166, it appeared that the defendant was a commissioner in equity and as such took out letters of administration on an estate. Before he had received any assets of the estate, however, he resigned the office of commissioner and turned over to his successor all the assets in his hands including all those of the estates of which he was administrator. It was held that he ceased to be administrator when he resigned the office of commissioner in equity, and no action in respect to the estate could be maintained against him.

In other jurisdictions it is held that the loss of an office does not affect an administratorship or executorship held virtute officii. Beale v. Hall (1857) 22 Ga. 431; Olsen v. Rich (1881) 79 Ky. 244; Hull v. Neal (1854) 27 Miss. 424.

In Beale v. Hall (Ga.) supra, it was held that the office of administrator did not expire, when held by the clerk of the superior court, when his term of office expired, as the office of administrator was not appurtenant to the office of clerk of the court. The ordinary had discretion by law to appoint any suitable and proper person to be administrator, and if it were held that the successor of the clerk of the court became also his successor as administrator, the ordinary would be deprived of his right to exercise his discretion, and the purpose of the law would not be accomplished; namely, to secure the administration of estates by fit and proper persons.

In Olsen v. Rich (1881) 79 Ky. 244, it appeared that the appellant, Olsen's administrator, had formerly been public administrator, but had resigned his office. After his resignation as public administrator, he commenced this action as the administrator of the estate of John Olsen. The court below was of the opinion that, his resignation of the office of public administrator having been tendered and accepted, it was a surrender of all the trusts confided to him by reason of his office, and dismissed the action. It was held that in so doing the court below erred, and that the public administrator continued to be administrator of those estates as to which he had been appointed while in office, until he should be removed from office for a cause as provided by statute.

In Hull v. Neal (1854) 27 Miss. 424, it appeared that a sheriff had been appointed administrator of an estate by virtue of his office. The law relating to this subject was thereafter repealed, so far as it related to that particular county. A son of the intestate applied to the court to be appointed administrator de bonis non, and the court made the appointment. The sheriff contended that the court had no authority to make the appointment without giving him timely notice of the application and until he had settled accounts as provided by law. It was held that, although the repeal of the law did not ipso facto revoke the letters of administration, it gave the probate court power to do so at any time and to commit the administration to the person entitled to the same by law.

VI. Completion of administration.

It has been held that an executorship ceases when all the duties specified in the will have been performed. Downey v. Kearney (1917) 81 W. Va. 422, 94 S. E. 509. In that case it appeared that a testator left his estate, consisting mainly of stocks and bonds, to his widow for life or during her widowhood. The will authorized the widow to make payment of legacies during her life if she wished to do so.

The only duties required of the executors were that they pay the debts and funeral expenses and turn over the remainder to the widow. Their executorship then terminated. They were not required even to pay specific legacies before turning over the estate to the widow. It was held that there was no implied trust created by the will whereby the executors were required to make distribution to the legatees, as the delivery to the life tenant passed all title and control of the assets from them.

So it has been held that the approval of the final account of an executor or administrator terminates his office. Anderson's Succession (1857) 12 La. Ann. 95; Decuir's Succession (1874) 26 La. Ann. 222; State ex rel. Matteson v. Probate Ct. (1901) 84 Minn. 289, 87 N. W. 783; Vandever's Appeal (1862) 42 Pa. 74; Krogman's Estate (1894) 14 Pa. Co. Ct. 567. Compare Lowry v. Tilleny (1884) 31 Minn. 500, 18 N. W. 452; Re Scheffer (1884) 58 Minn. 29, 59 N. W. 956.

In Decuir's Succession (1874) 26 La. Ann. 222, it was held that a judgment homologating the final account and tableau of an administratrix discharged her from her trust, and she had no standing, as administratrix, to bring an action a year after the rendition of the judgment, to have it set aside.

In Vandever's Appeal (1862) 42 Pa. 74, it appeared that an administrator of an estate had been appointed, had administered the estate, and had submitted an account showing distribution made, which was confirmed by the court. He credited it himself with the sum of $921.34, which he claimed to hold as trustee under an appointment of the widow and heirs, it being one third of the net amount of the proceeds of sale of the real estate, and upon which interest was to be paid for life to the widow, and after her death to be distributed among the heirs. The administrator converted the money to his own use, and lost it by a sheriff's sale of the land in which it was invested, but continued to pay interest to the widow for six years. The widow then brought suit in the orphans' court to compel the administrator to turn over the money in his possession to a successor to be appointed by the court. It was held that the relation of administrator and distributees theretofore existing between the parties was terminated by their own act in constituting the administrator a trustee, and therefore the court had no jurisdiction to compel the administrator to account. He was discharged by the confirmation of the administration account.

In State ex rel. Matteson v. Probate Ct. (1901) 84 Minn. 289, 87 N. W. 783, it was held that the office of an administrator ceased when the probate court had allowed the administrator's final account and had rendered its final decree of distribution assigning the residue of the estate. "The jurisdiction of the probate court in Minnesota is not conferred by the common law, nor by any statute of the state, but by our Constitution, and is limited to 'jurisdiction over the estates of deceased persons and persons under guardianship.' Const. art. 6, § 7. It follows that in cases where a court of probate acquires jurisdiction over the estate of a particular decedent such jurisdiction is ended, and the office of administrator, which depends upon such jurisdiction, becomes functus officio whenever such estate passes by operation of law from its final control. No argument can make this obvious proposition clearer, for it is self-evident that, if the jurisdiction is limited to the estate of such deceased person, and the sole basis of such jurisdiction, the estate, passes from its control, and the right to the possession and control thereof vests by operation of law in the heirs and distributees, it has no longer any jurisdiction in the premises."

But in Lowry v. Tilleny (1884) 31 Minn. 500, 18 N. W. 452, it was held that the fact that administrators had filed their account, that the same was allowed and an order of distribution made, did not abate the action then pending, nor relieve the administrators of their official responsibilities and duties, as they had not been discharged. Until discharged it was competent for them to collect claims due the estate.

In the case of Re Scheffer (1894) 58 Minn. 29, 59 N. W. 956, it was held that in order to effect the removal of an executor, there must be some order or decree of the court which manifested the intent of the court to bring about that result, which must appear with certainty, beyond mere conjecture. It was therefore held that as there was nothing to show that the attention of the probate court was ever directed to the closing of the administration or of changing the possession of the estate in the hands of the executors from possession as executors to possession as trustees, or any intent to discharge the executors, they still remained subject to the jurisdiction of the probate court, and were not trustees subject only to a court of equity.

In Krogman's Estate (1894) 14 Pa. Co. Ct. 567, it appeared that the final account of an executor was confirmed and a decree of distribution made, awarding a distributive share to the petitioner. Instead of taking possession of the share awarded her, the petitioner allowed it to remain with the executor for several years thereafter. The respondent claimed that he held this money as banker, agent, or attorney, or in some capacity other than executor, and that there was an agreement between him and the petitioner by which he was to honor her drafts and pay her interest on the amount remaining in his hands. It was held that the proof showed that the contention of the respondent was correct, and that the only relation existing between the petitioner and the respondent was that of debtor and creditor, and the executor, as such, was discharged.

In Anderson's Succession (1857) 12 La. Ann. 95, the residuary legatees brought an action against the executors of an estate to recover interest at the rate of 20 per cent per annum on all sums which the executors had failed to deposit in the bank. The executors set up res judicata as a defense. It appeared that the executors had filed a final account, which was contested by the agent of the residuary legatees, and, after being modified in certain respects, was approved and the agent put in possession of the property and rights of the residuary legatees. No appeal was taken from the judgment so entered. It was held that it must be presumed that the agent of the residuary legatees had been put in possession of the property thus adjudicated in favor of his principals. The functions of the executors were therefore at an end, and the right to enforce the penalty under the statute for a failure to make the deposit, even had it existed, had also ceased.

But by the weight of authority the removal or discharge of an executor or administrator is not effected by the approval of his final account without a formal order of discharge.

Washington.—Denny v. Sayward (1894) 10 Wash. 422, 39 Pac. 119.

In Fewlass v. Keeshan (Fed.) supra, it was held that a sworn statement of an administrator that he had fully administered the estate, accompanied by an affidavit of the widow of the intestate supporting his statement and asking that the statement should be accepted as his final account, was insufficient to discharge the administrator in the absence of any order of the court allowing the papers to constitute a final account and discharging the administrator.

In Ligon v. Ligon (Ala.) supra, it was held that a final settlement of the accounts of an administrator did not necessarily discharge him from further accounting unless there was an order discharging him from his office, or unless decrees were rendered distributing the residue of the estate among those entitled, and they had been paid.

In Whetstone v. McQueen (Ala.) supra, it was held that the mere fact that an administrator had made a final settlement of an estate, and had distributed all the funds thereof to the parties entitled thereto, did not necessarily show that the administrator had ever been divested of his administrative capacity, in the absence of any order of discharge entered on the records.

In McCrea v. Haraszthy (Cal.) supra, it was held that the mere allowance of the final account of an executor was not the equivalent of a decree discharging him. Until the entry of such a decree, the trust still continued in contemplation of law, and the executor remained clothed with the duty and authority of his office.

In Re Clary (Cal.) supra, it was held that an administrator who had rendered a final account and made distribution, but who had not been discharged, was subject to the jurisdiction of the probate court as administrator, and could be compelled to pay over a distributive share of the estate which he had appropriated to his own use, and in case of his refusal be punished as for a contempt. Until his final discharge, the jurisdiction of the probate court did not cease.

In Atherton v. Hughes (1911) 249 Ill. 317, 94 N. E. 546, it was held that the approval of the account of an administrator did not alone work his discharge as administrator or settle the estate. If thereafter any property came into his hands and there were debts of the estate, it would become his duty to sell the property to satisfy the debts.

In Root v. Beymer (1906) 146 Mich. 692, 110 N. W. 57, it was held that the final settlement and approval of the account of an executrix did not necessarily put an end to the functions of the executrix, but, if the occasion should arise, she could further pursue her duties for the benefit of the estate unless there had been a formal discharge entered on the records.

In San Francisco v. Wingfield (1901) 161 Mo. 542, 61 S. W. 842, it was held that an executrix continued in office and remained clothed with the duties of the office and subject to the control of the probate court until a decree was entered discharging her, as it appeared that when the probate court approved her final settlement, the decree expressly provided that the estate should remain open, for the purpose of selling the real estate in accordance with the terms of the will.

In Ewing v. Parish (1910) 148 Mo. App. 492, 128 S. W. 538, it was held that an administrator who had submitted a final account which had been approved, the judgment of the probate court containing no full order of discharge, but merely declaring that the filing of the receipts from the distributees should be in full discharge of all funds in the administrator's hands, which receipts were not shown ever to have been filed so as to work a discharge even to that extent,—had not ceased to be administrator, and might therefore recover assets not included in his previous settlement and of the existence of which he was then unaware.

In Hazlett v. Blakely (1903) 70 Neb. 613, 97 N. W. 808, it was held that the final settlement of the accounts of an administratrix and her discharge thereon entered did not prevent an action being brought for a claim against the estate. The administratrix, it was held, was discharged only as to matters contained in the ac-

In Re Williams (1917) 165 N. Y. Supp. 716, it was held that a decree settling the accounts of an administrator did not revoke his letters or vacate his office. Other assets might be realized and new liabilities incurred, and as to these the representative's duty continued. It was therefore held that the administrator had power to sell real property of the decedent to pay for a headstone which had been placed at the grave, and had not been paid for, as a suitable headstone was a part of the funeral expenses, to pay for which real property might be ordered sold.

In Willeys v. Haines (1904) 96 App. Div. 5, 88 N. Y. Supp. 1018, affirmed without opinion in (1905) 182 N. Y. 543, 75 N. E. 1135, it was held that an order directing executors, in settling their final account, to turn over property in their hands to themselves as trustees, did not terminate their authority as executors where the order did not expressly decree their discharge. They still had power to administer any other assets that might then be in, or should thereafter come into, their hands, and as to these the executorial duty continued.

In Best v. Best (1913) 161 N. C. 513, 77 S. E. 762, it was held that neither the powers nor the duties of an administrator necessarily ceased because a final settlement had been formally made. Unless in terms discharged from further execution of his trust, he still had power and might have been under obligation to go on and collect assets when opportunity was further presented.

In Denny v. Sayward (1894) 10 Wash. 422, 39 Pac. 119, it appeared that the executors of an estate had brought suit in behalf of the estate to recover money paid by them on account of a judgment rendered against the decedent as surety. The defendant set up as one of his defenses to the action, that the plaintiffs did not have capacity to sue, as they had ceased to be executors when they rendered a final account. It was held that the executors still had capacity to sue, although the fact that a final account had been rendered and an order of distribution made and carried into effect would warrant the presumption that administration of the estate had been closed, but when the interests of the estate required the exercise of authority by an executor, his right to act should be upheld if he had not received his final discharge, unless his bondsmen had been released. ## ENGELS COPPER MINING COMPANY, Plff. in Certiorari, v.

INDUSTRIAL ACCIDENT COMMISSION et al.

Workmen's compensation — injury to deputy sheriff — right to compensation.

A deputy sheriff employed by the operator of a mine to preserve order on its premises is acting in the course of his employment within the meaning of the Workmen's Compensation Act when quelling a riot in a shack owned by the operator, and situated adjacent to its property, so as to be entitled to compensation, although the statute excludes from definition of employee any person holding an appointment as deputy sheriff appointed for the convenience of the appointee, but receiving no compensation from the public for service, and providing that such last exclusion shall not prevent any person so deputized from recovering against a private person employing him, for injury occurring in the course of and arising out of such employment.

CERTIORARI to the Industrial Accident Commission to review its action in awarding death benefits to claimant in a proceeding under the Workmen's Compensation Act to recover compensation for the death of her husband while in the employ of petitioner. Award affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. R. P. Wisecarver and Redman & Alexander for plaintiff in certiorari.

Mr. A. E. Graupner, for defendants in certiorari:

Under § 8(a) of the Workmen's Compensation, Insurance, and Safety Laws, Smith was an employee and his widow is entitled to compensation.

The fatal injury was received in the course of the employment and arose out of the employment.

Lennon, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Certiorari to review the action of the Industrial Accident Commission in awarding death benefits to Eva A. Smith, widow of Franklin H. Smith, deceased. Smith was an employee in the service of petitioner and was also a deputy sheriff. He was killed on the evening of August 4, 1918, while attempting to quell a drunken disturbance in a shack owned by petitioner, and situated adjacent to its premises. The single question presented is whether or not Smith was killed while "performing service growing out of and incidental to" his employment. The return to the writ discloses the following facts:

At the time of Smith's death, petitioner was operating a mine in Plumas county. Upon its land were situated the various shops, machines, and buildings appropriate to such an operation, together with bunkhouses for the use of such of the men as did not choose to rent private houses, which were also situated on the premises. The shack where the disturbance occurred was located just below the petitioner's machine shop. It was a frame and canvas structure, and, while it does not appear who owned the land upon which it stood, it appears that the petitioner owned the frame and that the occupants were under its control; one of them, an Indian named John Smith, being in its employ.

At the time of his death, the deceased, Franklin H. Smith, was employed by petitioner as a general utility man, to look out for its interests on and off the company's property. He acted as fire warden, but his duties in this connection consumed on the average of less than an hour a day. He was required to meet trains and look after arriving employees, to remove women of questionable character from the premises, to watch prostitutes who established camps outside the company's property, and where they were making trouble, or were supposed to be selling liquor, to have them move on. He was, moreover, required to keep down disorder from drunkenness, to settle disturbances among the men, and to do the work of a regular police officer in keeping order. Smith was also a deputy sheriff. During the period of his employment by petitioner as watchman or special officer, he had been called upon several times by the sheriff to act in civil matters, but he had rendered no service as deputy sheriff in criminal matters under the sheriff's orders. His activities were confined to matters going on around the mine, and concerning these matters it was his duty to report to the superintendent of the mine, rather than to the sheriff.

On the evening in question, a Mexican had brought some whisky to John Smith's shack and a drunken orgy ensued, in the course of which one of the occupants of the shack threatened gun play. One of the other occupants of the shack sent for the deceased. It does not appear exactly what information the deceased received, but one Greaves testified at the coroner's inquest that he saw the deceased, who said: "I have got to go down and see about a drunken Indian or buck." He then went down to the shack and was shot and killed.

These facts warrant a finding that in going to the shack to quell the disturbance the deceased was doing exactly what he was hired by petitioner to do. This conclusion is further fortified by the fact that the deceased had been expressly required to quell or prevent disturbances adjacent to the company's premises. The reason for these directions was explained by the company's superintendent as follows: "If a man got killed, and there was a big row, and it was an employee of the copper company, there would be a loss to us, if a court trial came up."

Petitioner does not deny that the deceased had acted to quell or prevent disturbances before, under the direction of the superintendent of the company. It is insisted, however, that in so doing he was, "of course," acting in an official capacity as deputy sheriff. This raises the only serious question presented by the petition. Where a private company or individual employs a watchman or special officer, and in making its selection deliberately chooses an officer of the law, in order to take advantage of his authority, as did petitioner in the instant case, and where such officer performs acts advantageous to and expressly or impliedly directed by the employer, which happen at the same time to be acts which it would be his official duty to perform, is such an employee acting in the course of employment within the meaning of the Workmen's Compensation Act? Respondent relies upon § 8(a) of the statute (Stat. 1917, p. 835), which defines the term "employee" and includes "all elected and appointed paid public officers," but excludes "any person holding an appointment as deputy clerk, deputy sheriff, or deputy constable appointed for the convenience of such appointee, who receives no compensation from the county or municipal corporation, or from the citizens thereof for services as such deputy." The section, however, provides "that such last exclusion shall not deprive any person so deputized from recourse against any private person employing him for injury occurring in the course of and arising out of such employment."

The question presented in the instant case involves the construction to be placed upon the words of the proviso above quoted. Petitioner contends that the "employment" referred to in the proviso has no relation to the performance of official acts, and that a deputized person can be an employee only when performing some act in no wise connected with his official duties. With this construction we cannot agree. It would not, we think, require an express statutory reservation to assure to a deputy sheriff the right to compensation for an injury received in the course of working at a mechanical art or trade. The clause in question should not be regarded as intended to effect this purpose, and thereby be interpreted as a purely supererogatory enactment, if it may fairly be construed in such a manner as to give it a rational purpose. In our opinion the statute is to be construed in the light of the common practice of property owners to choose as watchmen or special officers men who are deputized officers of the law, and to secure the deputization of such watchmen or special officers engaged by them as are not already deputies. It is obviously to this class of deputies that the excluding clause of the statute refers, in sharp contrast to the provisions of the including clause. It is in the light of the meaning of the excluding clause that the proviso in question must be read. So read, its clear effect is to provide that, where a deputy performs acts which, while official in their nature, are advantageous to the employer and directed by him, not incidentally merely, but as part of the duties

prescribed and contemplated in the contract of employment, then such deputy is acting in the course of his private employment within the meaning of the provisions of the Workmen's Compensation Act.

Upon this view of the statute, petitioner cannot escape liability to compensate the widow for the death of Franklin H. Smith, on the plea that in performing the duties incident to his employment he was also fulfilling a duty to the county.

The award is affirmed.

ANNOTATION.

Workmen's compensation: compensation for death of or injury to peace officer employed in private plant.

As to applicability of compensation acts to watchman, see annotation to Gifford v. Patterson, 6 A.L.R. 578.

It will be observed that in the reported case (ENGELS COPPER MIN. CO. v. INDUSTRIAL ACCL. COMMISSION, ante, 187) a deputy sheriff, employed in a mine as general utility man to maintain order, who was shot while attempting to quell a drunken disturbance on premises owned by the employer, was held to have been killed while performing service growing out of and incidental to his employment within the California Workmen's Compensation Act, which defines the term "employee," and includes "all elected and appointed paid officers," but excludes "any person holding an appointment as deputy clerk, deputy sheriff, or deputy constable appointed for the convenience of such appointee, who receives no compensation from the county or municipal corporation, or from the citizens thereof for the services as such deputy, there being further a proviso "that such last exclusion shall not deprive any person so deputized from recourse against any private person employing him for injury occurring in the course of and arising out of such employment," the court, with respect to this provision, taking the view that its effect was that where a deputy performed acts which, although official in their nature, were advantageous to the employer and were directed by him not incidentally merely, but as a part of the duties prescribed and contemplated by the contract of employment, the deputy was acting in the course of his private employment within the meaning of the Compensation Act.

But one other case involving the question under consideration has been disclosed, and that is a decision of the New York Industrial Commission (James v. Witherbee-Sherman & Co. (1915) 2 N. Y. Off. Dept. R. 483), wherein it was held that one employed as a policeman at a monthly wage by a mining company, to protect its property and employees, who was shot while protecting an employee, was employed in a hazardous occupation within the New York Compensation Act; that his death was due to an accident arising out of and in the course of his employment, and that he was not acting in the capacity of deputy sheriff, although subsequently to his employment by the mining company, and at its request, he was appointed a deputy sheriff and received fees from the town or county. In the opinion by the Commission it was said: "The principal objection made to the award is based upon the fact that James was acting in the capacity of a public officer, and that the injuries which caused his death did not arise out of or in the course of his employment by the insured. Cases in which policemen and deputy sheriffs were in the employ of corporations have been frequently passed upon by the courts. It is only necessary to call attention to the case of Sharp v. Eric R. Co. (1906) 184 N. Y. 100, 76 N. E. 923, 6 Ann. Cas. 250, 19 Am. Neg. Rep. 448. In that case, an action was commenced against the railroad company to recover damages for the death of a boy who was shot and killed by one Wheeler, a special officer in the employ of the railroad company, who was also a deputy sheriff. The boy had been stealing a ride and had jumped from the train and run to adjacent land. He was pursued by Wheeler, and while both were upon the adjoining premises, Wheeler shot the boy, the ball entering the back of his head, producing death. The question at issue was stated by Judge O'Brien, as follows: 'The question in this case is whether the defendant can be held responsible for the act of Wheeler in killing the boy. It is claimed that Wheeler acted in a dual capacity; that while he was the servant of the defendant for certain purposes he was also a public officer, and that he killed the boy while acting in the capacity of such officer, and not as the servant of the defendant.'

After reviewing the facts, the court stated the law as follows: 'A railroad company employing a servant who happens to be a public officer acquires no immunity from such employment. Constables and policemen are often employed by corporations in the same capacity as Wheeler was. It is not beyond the province of a jury in such a case to find that the official acts of the employee are to be used for the benefit of the defendant, and in protection of its interests and property. And hence, in such a case, the character of the servant's act is to be determined in the same way and upon the same principles as if he was not a public officer at all. If he acts maliciously or in pursuit of some purpose of his own, the defendant is not bound by his conduct, but if, while acting within the general scope of his employment, he simply disregards his master's orders or exceeds his powers, the master will be responsible for his conduct.' It is apparent from the foregoing that the relationship of master and servant which existed between James and his employers was not altered by reason of the fact that James was also a deputy sheriff. The real point at issue in the case is whether or not James was acting within the scope of his employment. We think it apparent that his official acts were to be used for the benefit of the employers, and for the protection of their interests and property. This being so, the fact that he might have received a fee from the town or county for making the arrest in question is not material. Had he not been in their employ he would probably never have been appointed as a deputy sheriff. From the report of the accident filed by Witherbee-Sherman & Company, Inc., with the Commission on October 6, 1914, it would appear that James was actually stabbed on the premises of the company. He had no regular hours of employment and it was largely within his own discretion as to what acts he would perform in the discharge of his duties to his employers. Under these conditions, and in view of all the facts, we hold that he was acting within the general scope of his employment. The further objection is made that James in making the arrest exceeded his authority even as a public officer. In this respect it is claimed that Hydric was arrested for a misdemeanor, and that the arrest, being made at night and without a warrant, was illegal. Conceding that the arrest was for a misdemeanor (which was not established by any evidence in the case), the objection is not material, as appears from the decision of the court of appeals in the Sharpe Case, above quoted. The fact that James exceeded his powers did not change the relationship of master and servant which existed between himself and his employers. The injury in question was received while James was doing the duty which he was employed to perform. Without further discussion it is sufficient to say that under such circumstances the injury arose in the course of his employment. The injury was a natural incident to the work which he was required to do for his employers, and therefore arose out of the employment."

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the District Court for Black Hawk County (Boies, J.) in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover the amount alleged to be due on a shipment of oil. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. W. T. Frame and Edwards, Longley, Ransier, & Smith for appellant.

Messrs. Mears & Lovejoy for appellee.

Gaynor, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff, Lawrence Gas Company, is an Illinois corporation, with its principal place of business at Indianapolis, Indiana. The defendant, Hawkeye Oil Company, is also a corporation, and its principal place of business is at Waterloo, Iowa. A. T. Stewart Company is a brokerage firm, and its principal place of business is at Chicago, Illinois.

On January 6, 1914, the defendant, Hawkeye Oil Company, sent the following order to the brokerage firm of A. T. Stewart Company:

To A. T. Stewart Co.

512 Postal Tel. Bldg., Chicago, Ill.
Ship at once to the Hawkeye Oil Company, Waterloo, Iowa, 2 cars 72° gasolene at 13.65c f.o.b. Waterloo, Iowa.
Waterloo, Iowa, 11-24-13.

This order was received at the A. T. Stewart Company in due course of mail. A. T. Stewart Company were merchant oil brokers, and, soon after the receipt of this order, placed the same with the plaintiff, the Lawrence Gas Company, and the Lawrence Gas Company shipped the gasolene therein ordered to the Hawkeye Oil Company, and it was received by it at its home place.

It appears that there had been some prior arrangements between the A. T. Stewart Company and the plaintiff, Lawrence Gas Company, for the handling of the output of the plaintiff company by the A. T. Stewart Company, on a basis of  $\frac{1}{4}$  cent per gallon commission, A. T. Stewart Company to act as brokers in all transactions, with power to procure orders for plaintiff's product, send the orders to the plaintiff company, and, upon receipt of such orders, the goods to be billed directly to the purchaser. The A. T. Stewart Company never had possession of, or control of, any of the products of the plaintiff company.

The president of the Hawkeye Oil Company testified: "I knew from whom this carload of oil had been shipped. We had a bill of lading and an invoice to show that it had been shipped by the Lawrence Gas Company."

The original invoice received is in the following words and figures:

He further testified: "I knew that the A. T. Stewart Company had been doing business with a great many different companies, and that they act as brokers for a large number of refiners. I had reason to think that they were acting for the Lawrence Gas Company as brokers. This was before we purchased this gasolene."

The president of the plaintiff, Lawrence Gas Company, testified that when he made his arrangements with the Stewart Company to handle the product of the plaintiff, he told Mr. Stewart that the company was simply to sell the goods as a broker; that it, the plaintiff, would make its own collections.

This action is brought by the Lawrence Gas Company against the Hawkeye Oil Company, to recover the amount of the shipment. The defense plea is payment. The plea of payment relied on has its support in the fact only that, on the 6th day of January, 1914, the defendant, Hawkeye Oil Company, sent to the A. T. Stewart Company a check in the following form, which was received by the A. T. Stewart Company, cashed by it, and the proceeds retained:

The Hawkeye Oil Company, No. 15,251.

Waterloo, Iowa, Jan. 6, 1914.

Pay to the order of Lawrence Gas Co. $859.79; eight hundred fifty-nine and 79/100 dollars.

Not over nine hundred $900.

To Leavitt & Johnson National Bank,

Waterloo, Iowa.

The Hawkeye Oil Co.,
By H. S. Caward, Treas.

The question here presented is whether or not this is a payment to the plaintiff company that binds the plaintiff company and makes a good defense to the plaintiff company's claim to recover from the defendant company the amount due for said oil.

We think it must be conceded from this record that A. T. Stewart & Company were simply merchant brokers. The business of a broker is to serve as a connecting link between the parties to the real transaction. Every person whose business it is to negotiate purchases and sales of property, with the custody of which he has no concern, neither with the original possession nor the delivery, is a broker. He is strictly a middleman, or an intermediate negotiator between the parties. He is distinguished from a commission merchant or a factor in that he has no possession of the property affected by the negotiation. He has neither the possession, management, nor control of the property to be sold or bought. The general holding is that a broker is one who is not entitled to the possession of the property which is the subject of the sale or purchase, and, unless specially

ity to receive payment.

authorized to do so, has no right, as broker, to receive payment for the property sold. The distinguishing feature which differentiates a broker from a factor or commission merchant is that he is not intrusted with the custody or possession of the property, and is not authorized to buy —distinguished

or sell it in his own name. See Morgan v. Jaudon, 40 How. Pr. 366, 378; Little Rock v. Barton, 33 Ark. 436, 437, 444; Gust v. Buckley, 23 Ky. L. Rep. 992, 64 S. W. 632; Braun v. Chicago, 110 Ill. 186, 194.

It is apparent from this record that, when the defendant Hawkeye Oil Company mailed to the A. T. Stewart Company the order hereinbefore set out, it knew that the A. T. Stewart Company was a broker only; that it did not have the commodity ordered for delivery; that, to fill the order, it would be required to place it with some company that could fill it and ship according to the order. When the defendant, Hawkeye Oil Company, received the oil, they knew that A. T. Stewart Company had placed their order with the Lawrence Gas Company; that the Lawrence Gas Company had filled and shipped the oil in pursuance of the order. The original invoice received by the defendant, Hawkeye Oil Company, told them that the Lawrence Gas Company had shipped the oil on terms "30 days net, 1 per cent ten days, f.o.b. Waterloo." They knew that the A. T. Stewart Company did not own the oil they had received, and had no right to receive payment for the same unless authorized by the Lawrence Gas Company to receive payment. They were charged with knowledge that the A. T. Stewart Company, as brokers, had no interest in the property received, and were only interested in so far as receiving a commission for bringing about and effectuating the sale was concerned. Therefore, there is no presumption that the A. T. Stewart Company had a right to receive payment for the oil so received by the defendant. There is no plea of estoppel, and no plea of ratification in this case. Defendant, in its answer, places itself squarely upon the proposition that the A. T. Stewart Company was the agent of the plaintiff, and was authorized to collect and receive the money on behalf of the plaintiff, and that a payment to the A. T. Stewart Company discharged its obligation to the plaintiff for the oil received.

Agency is a broader term than broker,—more comprehensive in its legal scope. A broker is an agent, but with limited authority. Ordinarily, they are not in any way connected with either the buyer or the seller of the property involved in any transaction. They are agents, it is true; but their powers are limited, and, when they have no charge or control over the property, but act only as go-betweens in effectuating a sale, they cannot be said to be agents, in the larger sense, in effectuating the sale. They place the order with one who may or may not fill the order,—is not bound to fill the order. If the order is filled by the one with whom it is placed, a commission is paid to the broker for the order. If it is not filled, the broker gets no commission. Ordinarily, the broker's relationship to the transaction ceases when he places the order with his principal.

In no sense does he sell the goods of his principal. He accepts orders and submits them to his principal, who accepts or rejects. Ordinarily, he has many principals, and he may place the order with any of them, and they approve or reject as their judgment suggests. If they reject, the matter is at an end. He may then place it with others of his principals, or with anyone having goods of the character ordered, with which to supply the demand. He earns his commission only in the event that the order is accepted and the shipment made. He enters into no contract with either the buyer or the seller for the sale or delivery of the property ordered. He is not entitled to receive payment for the goods delivered, unless especially authorized by the owner of the goods to receive payment. Therefore, it follows that one who pays to one of these brokers assumes the burden of establishing by a preponderance of the evidence that the broker was authorized by his principal to receive payment for the particular goods shipped. The general rule is that an agent who sells goods on sample, a traveling salesman who sells his principal's goods for future delivery, is not, by virtue of his employment alone, entitled to collect for the goods sold. There are some cases apparently holding to a different doctrine. These cases are all distinguishable because of the peculiar features involved in the particular case. We think the general rule is practically without exception. In Simon v. Johnson, 101 Ala. 368, 13 So. 491, that court said: "The decided weight of authority,—indeed, well-nigh all the adjudged cases,—supports the proposition that a traveling salesman of merchandise, making sales by sample on a credit or for cash, to be paid on receipt of the goods or the invoice of them, has no implied authority to collect the money agreed to be paid from the purchaser" (citing many authorities).

Therein it distinguishes the Maine and Vermont cases relied upon by appellant in this case. See also Lyles-Black Co. v. Aldredge, 10 Ala. App. 682, 65 So. 696. The same doctrine is recognized in Minnesota. Brown v. Lally, 79 Minn. 88, 81 N. W. 538.

In Bailey v. Pardridge, 134 Ill. 188, 27 N. E. 89, the court, while holding that the agent who sold the goods had a right to collect, and payment to him bound his principal, made the distinction as follows: "Had the agent Holmes sold the defendants a bill of goods, and taken an order from them for a shipment of the goods from the house in Philadelphia, it is clear a payment to the agent for goods thus bought would not have been binding on the plaintiffs. Clark v. Smith, 88 Ill. 298.

burden of proof —authority of broker.

But this is a different case. Here, Holmes was not only clothed with the power of sale, but he had the possession of the goods, and was able to pass them over to the possession of the purchaser upon making sale and receiving payment."

The distinction seems to be that, where the power to sell and deliver is invested in the same agent, upon delivery he may receive payment and bind his principal.

In Law v. Stokes, 32 N. J. L. 249, 90 Am. Dec. 655, it appears that plaintiff brought an action to recover the amount of a bill of goods sold by him to the defendant. The sale and delivery were admitted. The only question for determination was whether the defendant had paid for them. Plaintiff was an importer, and the defendant a keeper of a hotel. The defendant purchased at the store of the plaintiff, from one J. B. Sheridan, a bill of goods. Sheridan was employed by the plaintiff to sell the goods, receiving a commission on each sale therefor. The goods were sold on credit to be paid for in the future. The goods were shipped to the defendant, and a letter sent by the plaintiff, in which he said: "Remit direct to me." Inclosed in the letter was a bill of the goods, billed in the name of the plaintiff, which said that all remittances must be made directly to the principal, saying: "The salesman not authorized to collect." Thereafter, the defendant paid the bill to Sheridan, and took his receipt. Sheridan absconded. Plaintiff sued to recover. Held, Sheridan was a mere salesman for commission. As such, he had authority to sell goods on credit, but not to discharge purchasers from debts incurred by them in purchasing goods through him from the plaintiff, the court saying: "An agent employed to make sales, and selling on credit, is not authorized subsequently to collect the price in the name of the principal, and payment to him will not discharge the purchaser, unless he can show some authority in the agent other than that necessarily implied in a mere power to make sales. . . . Such authority may be shown by proof, either that the agent was expressly authorized to receive and discharge debts, or that he was held out by his principal to the public, or to the defendant, as having such authority."

See also Kane v. Barstow, 42 Kan. 465, 16 Am. St. Rep. 490, 22 Pac. 588. In this case, the rule is laid down that "authority to an agent to sell goods does not include authority to collect pay for goods thus sold." Why multiply authority? This doctrine was recognized by this court in Draper v. Rice, 56 Iowa, 114, 41 Am. Rep. 88, 7 N. W. 524, 8 N. W. 797; Englert v. White, 92 Iowa, 97, 60 N. W. 224; and Sawin v. Union Bldg. & Sav. Asso. 95 Iowa, 477, 64 N. W. 401, 3d paragraph. The Sawin Case was one in which the agent of the defendant association was empowered to sell stock. He sold stock to Sawin, received payment for the stock, and absconded. The sale was made by procuring Sawin to sign an application for five shares of stock. Assuming that the agent had authority to sell stock for the company, he procured plaintiff to sign an application for so many shares of stock. He had power to sell the stock and to collect and receive for membership fees in the association. Sawin sought to recover the amount paid the agent. The defense was that the agent had no authority to collect the money. The court held otherwise, saying: "As such agent, he had the right to do whatever was usual and proper to effect sales, including the receiving of money paid on account of them. 'A general agent is an agent who is empowered to transact all of the business of his principal of a particular kind in a particular place.'"

Recovery was allowed on the theory that the seller of this stock was the general agent of the company, with power not only to sell, but to receive payment; and, for the purposes of the case, placed the agent in the same situation as a seller of goods would be in, who had possession of the goods and a right to deliver them. The court assumed that the agent had power to sell and pass title upon the sale. The sale was completed by the agent.

There is no evidence that any power or authority had been given the A. T. Stewart Company by appellant to make collections. It is not claimed by appellant that there was any direct authority to so do. The burden is on the defendant to show such authority, if they would bind the plaintiff company by payments made to the A. T. Stewart Company. There is no claim, and no testimony to support the claim if such were made, that the defendant was misled by the conduct of the plaintiff into believing that the A. T. Stewart Company had authority to collect for the plaintiff company; and there is no plea and no evidence of estoppel; and there is no plea and no evidence that the plaintiff company ever ratified the payment in question. The defendant must stand or fall upon the proposition that the A. T. Stewart Company was authorized to receive this payment for the plaintiff. If they fail in this, they fail in their defense. Recognizing this fact, the defendant placed A. T. Stewart on the stand, and sought to show by him that the A. T. Stewart Company had collected for the plaintiff company on shipments such as are involved in this suit.

A. T. Stewart testified, on direct examination:

Q. During the time that you sold goods for the Lawrence Gas Company, did you make collections for them?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Did you at any time indorse checks that were made payable to them?

A. The company did.

Q. Now, at any time before the transaction involved in this suit, did the Lawrence Gas Company make any objections to your making collections for them upon the goods that you had sold for them?

A. No sir.

He was asked this question:

Do you have personal knowledge of the fact,—that is, of somebody representing the A. T. Stewart Company indorsing checks at other times before that for the Lawrence Gas Company?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Do you have personal knowledge of the fact that the Lawrence Gas Company asked you or your company to make collections for it on goods that you had sold for it?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. And were these collections made?

A. Yes, sir.

On cross-examination, he was asked to state to whom the sales were made on account of which the A. T. Stewart Company had made collections. He named three companies, and in each of these cases it would seem that the Stewart Company did not rely upon general authority to collect, but procured special authority in the particular case to make collection, or made the collection without authority, and their action was repudiated by the Lawrence Gas Company. In some instances, drafts from purchasers passed through the hands of the A. T. Stewart Company to the Lawrence Gas Company. We find no evidence of express authority, and no conduct from which implied authority to collect can be found. In the absence of proof of express authority, or facts and circumstances from which authority to collect can be implied, the proof does not satisfactorily meet the issue tendered by the defendant.

Every man is presumed to know the law, and the law is: "A broker has, ordinarily, no authority to receive payment for property sold by him for his principal, and the purchaser who pays a broker does so at his own risk. Such payment does not discharge him from liability to the principal, unless the authority of the broker to receive payment be express, or may reasonably be implied from the circumstances." J. M. Robinson, N. & Co. v. Corsicana Cotton Factory, 124 Ky. 435, 8 L.R.A. (N.S.) 474, 99 S. W. 305, 14 Ann. Cas. 802.

On the whole record, we find that the court was wrong in sustaining defendant's plea of payment, and the cause is therefore reversed.

NOTE.

The authority of an agent to receive payment for commodities which he is authorized to sell, or for which he is to find a market, is the subject of the annotation following PETERSEN v. PACIFIC AMERICAN FISHERIES, post, 203. Cases which, like the reported case (LAWRENCE GAS CO. v. HAWKEYE OIL CO. ante, 192), deal specifically with brokers, are treated in subdivision II. b, 2, of that note.

v.
PACIFIC AMERICAN FISHERIES, Respt.

Principal and agent — payment to agent — effect.

1. When a principal has clothed his agent with indicia of authority to receive payment for goods sold, as by intrusting him with possession of the goods, the purchaser is warranted in paying the price to the agent at time of sale.

Payment — to agent — effect.

2. Payment to an authorized agent will discharge the indebtedness, although the agent misappropriates the payment.

Principal and agent — acts of agent — effect on principal.

3. A principal is bound by his agent's acts within the apparent authority which the principal himself knowingly permits the agent to assume, or which he holds the agent out to the public as possessing.

— lessee of mill — power to market stock.

4. A lessee of a mill who undertakes immediately to market stock on hand when it is finished has authority to make sales, and the purchaser is warranted in making payment to him, and such payment will be binding upon the principal.

— assisting in sale — effect.

5. That the owner assists the agent in making a sale does not, where the purchaser has reason to suppose that the owner is acting merely as agent, destroy the authority otherwise possessed by the agent to collect the purchase money.

Equity — innocent person — burden of loss.

6. As between two innocent persons one of whom must suffer, the loss should fall upon a principal who has clothed his agent with apparent authority and thus enabled him to obtain the advantage of the person with whom he deals, rather than upon the person so dealing with the agent.

Appeal — failure to allow interest — reversal.

7. Failure to allow interest is not ground for reversal, if the attention of the trial court was not called to the omission.

APPEAL by plaintiffs from a judgment of the Superior Court for Whatcom County (Hardin, J.) in their favor in part only, in an action brought to recover the purchase price of certain goods. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Bixby & Nightingale, for appellants:

The court will not disturb findings of fact made by the lower court when those findings are based upon the credibility of witnesses who have testified orally in the presence of the court.

Anthes v. Erickson, 43 Wash. 491, 86 Pac. 668; King County v. Whittlesey, 52 Wash. 206, 100 Pac. 321.

The findings of the trial court will not be disturbed on a trial de novo unless the evidence preponderates against such findings.

The implied power to collect the purchase price is always dependent upon the exercise by the agent of the power to sell and deliver the goods.

The title and possession of the shooks having passed to the respondent by the act of the principal, there was no subject-matter upon which the agency could operate.

Messrs. Kerr & McCord for respondent.

Bridges, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellants sued to recover $1,065 as the purchase price of certain box shooks and $75 as the purchase price of a certain shingle machine. The case was tried by the court without a jury. It gave judgment to the plaintiffs for $75, being the sale price of the machine, but refused judgment on account of the box shooks.

The facts are substantially as follows:

Each of the parties hereto was the owner of a manufacturing plant at Bellingham. In May, 1916, the appellants and one Wood entered into a lease contract, whereby the appellants leased their factory to Wood. This lease, among other things, contained the following clauses: "Understood that one of the conditions for the execution of this lease is that the lessees, immediately upon taking possession of the aforesaid plant, advise with lessor as to how the said stock and material on hand should be completed and finished to the best advantage, in order to obtain available markets therefor, and that lessees will finish and complete within a reasonable time whatever work and material may be necessary in order to complete the aforesaid delivery of stock on hand, so that the same can be marketed to the best advantage, and the lessees will be paid therefor the actual cost of finishing the said material and labor, plus 10 per cent on the same. Lessees further agree to immediately market said stock upon its being finished and completed, to the best advantage, and charge therefor a reasonable commission; and it is understood that said stock and material remain in the warehouse of said plant, where the same is now situate, until lessor determines to sell the same, without the paying of any rental or compensation for the use of said warehouse during said time."

Wood thereafter transacted business under the name of W. W. Wood Manufacturing Company. He at once entered into possession of the leased property, including all box shooks, lumber, etc., on the premises, and he remained in possession throughout the period of this controversy. Shortly prior to August, 1916, F. O. Biery, one of respondent's foremen, visited the Wood plant with the view of purchasing its hand shingle machine. While on the premises he saw a miscellaneous lot of box shooks, which he thought his employer might want to purchase. He entered into negotiations with Wood concerning the purchase of the machine and such of the box shooks as would suit the purposes of respondent. Wood, however, did not have any inventory of the box shooks, and referred Biery to Thomas R. Waters for this information. Mr. Waters was an attorney at law at Bellingham and part owner of the leased property. Biery had several conferences with Waters looking towards the purchase of certain of the box shooks; they did not, however, at that time, agree upon a sale. Later Wood again took up the question of the sale with Biery and terms were substantially agreed upon. Biery, however, did not have any authority to consummate the sale, and requested Waters to meet H. B. Drisko, respondent's assistant manager, at the office of respondent, for the purpose of closing the deal. Upon this request Mr. Waters met Mr. Drisko at respondent's office, where the deal was closed. The shingle machine was sold for $75, and such of the box shooks as the respondent might select out of a miscellaneous lot were sold for $3 per thousand sets.

Waters testified that at this conference he requested the respondent to send to him or to one James McDonald the check for the purchase price. Drisko and Biery, who were both present at this conference, denied that anything was said about the check or to whom payment should be made. The following day Waters went East, and did not return to Bellingham until about the 1st of November, 1916. Wood took charge of the sorting and tallying and delivering of the shooks to respondent, Biery assisting in keeping the tally. From the time of the sale on till early in November, neither Wood nor any of the appellants had anything to do with the shooks. They had no further conferences with respondent and did not send respondent any statement of the shooks sold or make any demand for payment. Some time in October, and before Waters returned from the East, the Wood Manufacturing Company sent to the respondent a bill for the purchase price of the machine and the box shooks. This bill ran against respondent and in favor of the Wood Company. It was on the billhead of the Wood Manufacturing Company. A few days after receiving the statement the respondent made its check for the amount of the bill to the Wood Manufacturing Company, and the latter, after having received the check, cashed it, and has never paid the appellant any of the proceeds thereof. Upon Waters's return from the East he learned that his company had not received its pay, and made inquiry of the respondent, and was told that payment had been made to the Wood Manufacturing Company. One O. W. Crandall, who was in the employ of the Wood Manufacturing Company and acted in the capacity of bookkeeper and manager, testified that Waters told him to send a bill to respondent and collect the money. Waters denied this.

The court's findings give the facts substantially as above, but, in addition, find that by the terms of the lease contract Wood was authorized and empowered to sell the box shooks and to collect the purchase price thereof, but that he did not have any authority to sell the machine or to collect therefor; that when the deal was closed at the office of the respondent Waters requested the respondent to send a check in payment either to him or McDonald, but nothing was said as to whom the check should be drawn; that Biery, who represented the respondent, did not know that Waters had or claimed to have any ownership in the box shooks, but thought he was representing the owner of the shooks or the Wood Manufacturing Company, as agent or attorney. The court further found that the power given by the lease to Wood to sell the box shooks had never been revoked.

The trial court based its conclusions and judgment almost entirely on the lease contract. The appellant urges a new trial, chiefly on two grounds: First, that the lease contract does not authorize Wood to sell the box shooks or to collect the price thereof, and, second, that if the lease does authorize Wood to sell the shoocks and collect therefor, that power was revoked before the consummation of the sale in controversy here. The statement of a few fundamental principles will assist in arriving at a correct decision.

Where the principal has clothed the agent with the indicia of authority to receive payment, as by intrusting him with the possession of the goods to be sold, the purchaser is warranted in paying the price to the agent at the time of sale. But when the agent has not the possession of the goods and no other indicia of authority, and has only authority to sell, the purchaser pays the agent at his peril, and it devolves upon him to show that the agent was authorized to receive the payment. 1 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 1014.

Payment to an authorized agent will operate as a discharge of the indebtedness, though the agent misappropriate the payment. 22 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 518.

A principal is not only bound by the acts of his agent, general or special, within the authority which he has given him, but he is also bound by his agent's acts within the apparent authority which the principal himself knowingly permits his agent to assume, or which he holds the agent out to the public as possessing. Galbraith v. Weber, 58 Wash. 132, 28 L.R.A. (N.S.) 341, 107 Pac. 1050.

The apparent authority, so far as third persons are concerned, is the real authority, and when a third person has ascertained the apparent authority with which the principal has clothed the agent, he is under no further obligation to inquire into the agent's actual authority. 31 Cyc. 1333.

One clause of the lease contract provided that Wood should advise with the appellants as to how to obtain available markets for the box shoocks, and that "lessees will finish and complete within a reasonable time whatever work and material may be necessary in order to complete the aforesaid delivery of stock on hand so that the same can be marketed to the best advantage.

... Lessees further agree to immediately market said stock upon its being finished and completed to the best advantage, and charge therefor a reasonable commission, and it is understood that said stock and material shall remain in the warehouse of said plant, where the same is now situated, until the lessor determines to sell the same, without the payment of any rental or compensation for the use of the warehouse during said time."

The appellants contend that this provision of the lease only authorized Wood to find a market, and did not authorize him to sell the shoocks. We cannot so hold.

—lessees of mill—power to market stock.

The contract shows clearly that the intention was that Wood should not only have the authority, but it would be his duty actually to sell these box shoocks. The instrument even goes so far as to provide that the lessees shall be entitled to a reasonable commission for this service. It is true that the last clause above quoted provides that the box shoocks shall be permitted to remain in the warehouse "until the lessor determines to sell the same," but this was not intended to reserve the right of sale exclusively in the appellants, but was put in the contract merely to guard against any charge which the lessees might make the appellants for warehouse rent.

The appellants further contend, however, that the implied power to collect the purchase price is always dependent upon the exercise by the agent of his power to sell, and that, where the principal makes the sale, the presumption of law is that he alone had authority to make the collection, and that since Waters actually made the sale the agent had no authority to make the collection.

As principles of law these contentions may be accepted as correct, but they are inapplicable here, because the testimony does not show that Waters, as the owner of the property, made the sale. The most that he did was to assist in making the sale, and even in this the respondent supposed, and had reason to suppose, that Waters was acting

as the agent or attorney for the owner, and not as owner. The appellant contends that the trial court's finding was to the effect that Waters made the sale, but we do not so construe it. The finding was merely to the effect that Waters finally closed or confirmed the sale. We have very carefully read and considered the testimony, and it is perfectly plain to us that the terms of the sale were made between Wood and Biery, the foreman of the respondent, and that Waters did nothing more than to assist in the making of the sale. It cannot be said that what Waters did had the effect of revoking the powers given in the lease to Wood.

As between two innocent persons, one of whom must suffer, the loss should always fall on the principal who has clothed the agent with apparent authority, and thus enabled him to obtain the advantage of the person with whom he deals, rather than on the purchaser. Galbraith v. Weber, supra. Considering all the testimony, we cannot avoid the conclusion that not only did the lease itself give Wood the power to sell and collect, but that the conduct and acts of the appellant, through Waters, was such as to hold out to the respondent that Wood was authorized to sell as well as to collect. Under all the circumstances as shown by the record, it seems to us that any person placed in the position of the respondent, and having the information which it had, would, without hesitancy and with perfect justification, have made the payment to Wood as the respondent did in this case. It will not serve any good purpose for us to particularly refer to the testimony upon which our conclusion is based.

The appellant contends that the judgment of the trial court for $75 should have carried interest from the date it should have been paid to the date of judgment. If it should be conceded that the court would have had authority to have given interest, yet we find that the appellant is in no position now to raise that question. The court's conclusion of law No. 1 was to the effect that the appellant was entitled to judgment for $75 and for its costs and disbursements. The conclusion did not provide for any interest. The appellant did not take any exception to the conclusion, nor do we find anything in the record which would tend to indicate that the appellant at any time called the court's attention to this question of interest. Appellant seems to have raised the question for the first time in this court.

I. Introductory.

The scope of this note is confined to the consideration of cases involving the sale of commodities by agents, and excludes the sale of real property or chattels other than articles of trade. Nor has the writer considered the authority of an agent to receive payment in forms or modes other than cash, or the authority to make collection on securities, except as these matters may have been involved collaterally in deciding an agent's authority to receive payment, as implied from his authority to sell.

While the authority of factors or auctioneers to receive payment does not differ materially from that of sales agents or brokers, nevertheless the peculiar form and nature of their employment necessitate the consideration of their authority apart from that of other agents, and accordingly the rule relative to factors and auctioneers has been treated under a separate subdivision (see infra, V.).

II. Majority rule.

It is well established that an agent other than a factor or auctioneer (see infra, V.), authorized to sell or find a market for commodities, has no implied authority to receive or collect payment therefor. But this rule has certain well-recognized limitations which are discussed infra.

b. Application of rule.

1. In general.

In Dreyfus v. Goss (1903) 67 Kan. 57, 72 Pac. 537, it appeared that the defendants bought of the plaintiff's sales agent a quantity of whisky, which was shipped directly from the plaintiff's place of business, and the purchase price was paid to the salesman, who failed to account for the same to his principal. The court held, in an action to recover the price of the shipment from the defendants, that the agent had no implied authority to receive the payment for the goods sold, as it was well settled that an agent possessing authority to sell goods was not thereby invested with authority to collect the price thereof.

In Kane v. Barstow (1889) 42 Kan. 464, 16 Am. St. Rep. 490, 22 Pac. 588, an action to recover the price of a shipment of blackboards sold to the defendant by the plaintiff through its agent, the defendant pleaded a payment made to the agent as a defense. It appeared that the salesman had no express authority to receive any payments, and did not have possession of the article sold. The court approved a charge, requested by the plaintiff in the court below, in the following form: "Since the principal is bound only by such acts of his agent as have been authorized or allowed, proof that an agent has authority to make a sale of goods or to take orders for them to be filled by the principal, is not sufficient to prove that the agent has the authority to collect the pay for the goods afterward. The defendants must prove that . . . [the agent] was authorized to receive the money, or else fail in their defense."

In Kornemann v. Monaghan (1871) 24 Mich. 36, wherein it appeared that the plaintiffs shipped a quantity of goods to the defendant on an order secured by their agent, and the defendant made payment to the agent, who absconded without accounting for the money to his principals, the court held, in an action to recover the value of the goods sold, that the payment to the agent did not constitute a defense, in the absence of proof of actual authority on the part of the agent to accept the same, for the agent was not intrusted with the possession of the goods sold, and therefore had no implied authority to collect payment.

Where it appeared that the plaintiff's agent was authorized to sell personal property, but did not have possession of the property to be sold, and after effecting a sale with the defendant he collected the purchase price, the court held, in an action by the principal to recover the amount of the sale, that a sales agent, not having possession of the thing to be sold, had no authority to accept or collect the purchase price, and that § 2325 of the Civil Code only provided that "a general agent to sell, who is intrusted by the principal with the possession of the thing sold, has authority to receive the price." Fred Medart Mfg. Co. v. Weary & A. Co. (1917) 83 Cal. App. 347, 165 Pac. 85. The case, however, turned on the question of the estoppel of the principal to deny the authority of the agent by reason of its failure to notify the defendant of the lack of the agent's authority so to collect, after receiving knowledge that the salesman had received a part of the purchase money.

In Keown v. Vogel (1887) 25 Mo. App. 35, it appeared that the defendants bought of the plaintiff, through his agent, a mowing machine, which was delivered by the plaintiff himself. The defendant made payment of the purchase price to the agent, although it appeared that the latter had no express authority to receive the same. The court held that the payment to the agent constituted no defense to the plaintiff's action for the purchase price, since the agent was only authorized to obtain orders for the sale of the plaintiff's property, and was not intrusted with the possession of the same so as to clothe him with authority to collect the purchase price. The court said: "Where the principal has clothed the agent with the indicia of authority to receive payment, as by intrusting to him the possession of the goods to be sold, the purchaser is warranted in paying the price to the agent, but when the agent has not the possession of the goods, indicia of authority, and is only authorized to sell, if the purchaser pays the price to the agent he does so at his own peril, and it devolves upon him, in a suit for the purchase money by the principal, to prove that the agent was also authorized to receive payment." The court distinguished Rice v. Groffmann (1874) 56 Mo. 434, infra.

And in Butler v. Dorman (1878) 68 Mo. 298, 30 Am. Rep. 795, wherein it appeared that the plaintiffs' traveling salesman, who was authorized to sell goods for them by sample, sold to the defendant two bills of goods, which were shipped direct to the defendant from the plaintiffs, the court held that a payment to the agent did not preclude a recovery on the part of the plaintiffs for the purchase price, as an agent employed only to sell goods on sample, who did not have possession of the property sold, had no implied authority to receive the purchase price. Distinguishing Rice v. Groffmann (Mo.) infra, II. c. 1, the court said: "Rice v. Groffmann is no authority for the doctrine . . . of the instruction in question. It is true it is there stated in general terms that 'a power to sell goods includes a power to receive payment,' but the ground upon which the decision was based appears in that paragraph of the opinion in which Judge Napton said: "Whatever the plaintiffs may say as to the agency of Berlzheimer, it is clear that he negotiated and effected the sale to defendant, that he had the cigars and delivered them, and there was nothing to show that he was not the owner except the bill; and conceding he was not, the presumption was that as he had authority to sell, he had authority to receive payment."

So, in Chambers v. Short (1883) 79 Mo. 204, wherein it appeared that the plaintiff's book agent sold by subscription to the defendant a set of books, which was delivered by the plaintiff and was never in the possession of the agent, the defendant, in an action to recover the purchase price, pleaded payment to the canvasser. The court held that the plea of payment to the agent could not defeat the plaintiff's right to recover, for the agent was only authorized to canvass and solicit subscriptions for the sale of books, and had no authority to receive payment, and, not having been intrusted with the possession of the goods sold, authority to collect the purchase price could not be implied,—following Butler v. Dorman (Mo.) supra.

In Law v. Stokes (1867) 32 N. J. L. 249, 90 Am. Dec. 655, an action to recover the amount of a bill of goods sold by the plaintiff to the defendant, it appeared that the latter purchased the commodities through the medium of an agent employed by the plaintiff to sell goods on commission, and that the goods were shipped direct by the plaintiff to the defendant, accompanied with a letter stating, among other things: "Please remit amount direct to me [plaintiff]," and a bill of the goods, on which was printed in red letters, "Salesmen not authorized to collect." The defendant pleaded a payment made to the agent. The court said: "An agent employed to make sales, and selling on credit, is not authorized subsequently to collect the price in the name of the principal, and payment to him will not discharge the purchaser, unless he can show some authority in the agent other than that necessarily implied in a mere power to make sales. . . . Such authority may be shown by proof, either that the agent was expressly authorized to receive and discharge debts, or that he was held out by his principal to the public, or to the defendant, as having such authority. . . . Where an agent is intrusted with the possession of goods, with an unrestricted power to sell, . . . or payments are made over the counter of the principal's store to a shopman accustomed to receive money there for his employer, . . . the authority to receive payment will be implied in favor of innocent persons, because the principal, by his own act, gives to the agent an apparent authority to receive such payment. But if the principal forbids such payments, and requires all payments to be made to himself personally, or to a cashier, and gives a customer notice thereof, the customer would have no right to insist upon the apparent rather than the real authority of the agent."

In Zilberman v. Friedman (1907) 54 Misc. 256, 104 N. Y. Supp. 363, it appeared that the plaintiff, a wholesale dealer in beds, sold and delivered goods to the defendant. The defendant ordered the goods from a salesman authorized by the plaintiff to solicit orders, but not to collect payments. It appeared further that the goods were never in the possession of the agent, but were shipped direct to the purchaser with an accompanying statement of account, on which was printed the notice, "Pay none but authorized collectors." Subsequently, and after receiving the shipment, the defendant paid the purchase price to the salesman, and in this action to recover the value of the goods pleaded the same as a defense. The court held that the agent had no real or apparent authority to collect the purchase price of the goods from the defendant, and payment to him did not bind the principal or discharge the purchaser, for an agent employed to make sales, and selling on credit, was not authorized to collect the price in the name of the principal.

In Lamb v. Hirschberg (1896) 1 App. Div. 519, 37 N. Y. Supp. 283, it appeared that a cloth manufacturer in England, who was the assignor of the plaintiff, employed an agent for the purpose of soliciting orders for the sale of cloth in the United States and Canada, but without authority to collect moneys. It appeared further that the agent called on the defendants, and obtained an order from them for the sale of a quantity of cloth which, on receipt of the order by the manufacturer, was delivered directly by him to the defendants. Later, and after the goods had been received by the defendants, the agent called on them and collected a part of the purchase price, which he failed to account for to his principal. In an action to recover the amount of the purchase price paid to the agent, the court held that the payment to the agent did not bind the principal, for the former had no express authority to receive the same, nor could authority be implied, as the agent was not intrusted with the possession of the articles sold.

But compare Scott v. Hopkins (1886) 2 N. Y. S. R. 324, which was limited and confined by the court in Lamb v. Hirschberg (N. Y.) supra, wherein it appeared that a traveling salesman, employed by the plaintiff to solicit orders for the sale of coffee, contracted with the defendant for the sale of the goods in question, which were shipped direct to the defendant by the plaintiff. Subsequently, and after the goods had been received, the agent called again upon the defendant and, without express authority so to do, collected the purchase price. The court held that under the facts it could well be said that the salesman had apparent authority to receive payment for his principal. But in Lamb v. Hirschberg (N. Y.) supra, attention was called to the fact that the court, in the instant case, cited no authorities in support of its holding, nor could it be deemed as laying down a general rule of law, and it was contrary to the weight of authority in New York.

In Hahnenfeld v. Wolff (1895) 15 Misc. 133, 36 N. Y. Supp. 473, the court held that payment by the defendant to an agent, who was authorized only to solicit orders for goods, and who did not have possession of the same, was no defense to an action brought by the principal to recover the purchase price of goods sold, as there was no implied authority in the agent to receive the payment.

So, in Giltman v. Bergey (1894) 11 Montg. Co. L. Rep. (Pa.) 162, an action to recover the value of goods sold by the plaintiff, the defendant claimed that he had paid part of the claim in dispute to the plaintiff's agent. It appeared that the agent took the order for the goods, but did not have possession of the same, and they were delivered directly by the vendor to the vendee. The court held that the agent was not impliedly authorized to receive payment for the property sold, for the mere fact that he was authorized to sell did not imply authority to receive payment therefor, where it appeared he was not intrusted with the possession of the property sold.

And in Seiple v. Irwin (1858) 30 Pa. 518, affirming 2 Phila. (Pa.) 208, it appeared that a salesman, employed in the plaintiff's store for the purpose of selling goods, effected a sale to the defendants, but the goods were delivered by his principals direct to the purchasers. The court held that a payment made to the agent subsequent to the delivery of the goods, and which the salesman did not account for to his employers, was no defense to this action to recover the purchase price, in the absence of proof of authority from the plaintiffs to the agent other than that implied from the authority to make sales as a salesman, saying: "It is undeniable that an agent to whom merchandise has been intrusted, with authority to sell and deliver it, is authorized to receive the price; otherwise the fraud on the purchaser would run into cruelty. This agent's powers were not embraced in that description. He was employed only to make sales. As a check, his employers seem to have retained in their own hands the delivery of the goods and the appointment of the terms of sale. The goods in question were so delivered as to inform the defendants sufficiently of the character of the agency. When the agreement had been made for payment in six months, the contract was complete. The subsequent acceptance of cash, with a deduction of 5 per centum from the bill, was a new and totally unauthorized arrangement on the agent's part. In making payment, the defendants took the risk of his integrity, and they must bear the loss which his unfaithfulness imposed." A charge to the jury by the court below was upheld, in which it was said: "Where a person is employed to sell goods, and is intrusted with the possession and disposal of them by the owners, and sells for cash, payment to him by the purchaser will be good; and it may well be so, when he sells on credit; but on the other hand, when the person is merely employed to sell goods, and sells on a credit, without having the possession or disposal of them, a payment to him will not be good without some other evidence of authority. Take, for instance, a sale of goods across a counter—there the person selling the goods has the actual possession and disposal of them, and a payment to him at the time will be good. It does not follow that he can collect the money afterwards. And I do not conceive that a clerk's having the authority to sell goods for his employers for credit carries with it an authority to collect the money for the goods. It is for the purchaser to see to whom he pays his money, and if he pays the clerk or salesman who effects the sale, without sufficient proof of his authority, it is at his risk."

In Hegedorn Bros. v. O'Rourke (1912) 134 N. Y. Supp. 528, wherein the plaintiff showed that it delivered a quantity of coal to the defendant, pursuant to an order for the same secured by its agent, who was authorized to solicit orders but not to receive payment, and where it further appeared that the defendant paid the purchase price to the agent, the court held that the action of the court below in dismissing the complaint was erroneous, as the plaintiff had made out a prima facie case, no implied authority being shown to warrant the payment of the purchase price to the agent so as to bind his principal.

In Clark v. Smith (1878) 88 Ill. 298, an action to recover the price for a bill of goods sold by the plaintiff to the defendant, it appeared that the sale was consummated by the plaintiff's agent, who was employed and authorized to travel and solicit orders for whisky, which were filled by the principal. The defendant pleaded a payment of the amount claimed as the purchase price of the sale to the agent. The court held that the agent had no authority to receive payment for sales made by him, holding that mere authority in an agent to sell goods on credit did not show an authority in him to receive money in payment, so as to bind his principal.

So, in McKindly v. Dunham (1882) 55 Wis. 515, 42 Am. Rep. 740, 18 N. W. 485, wherein it appeared that an agent, employed by the plaintiffs to solicit orders, obtained an order from the defendant for a quantity of cigars which were shipped direct to the purchaser, who made payment of the contract price to the agent, the court held that the payment made to the agent was no defense to this action by the vendor to recover the purchase price, the agent having failed to account for the sum paid to him, for the agent, being authorized only to solicit orders for goods, which were transmitted to, and filled by, his principal, had no implied authority to collect or receive payments for the goods sold.

In Sumrall v. Kitselman Bros. (1911) 101 Miss. 783, 50 So. 594, wherein it appeared that the defendants bought certain goods from the plaintiffs through the latter's agent, who was authorized only to solicit orders, and the defendants made payment of the purchase price to this agent, the court held, in an action to recover the price of the articles sold, for which the agent did not account to his principals, that the agent had no authority to collect the money so as to bind the plaintiffs, for it appeared that he was not intrusted with the possession of the articles sold, so as to constitute implied authority to receive the payment therefor.

In Ketelman v. Chicago Brush Co. (1902) 65 Neb. 429, 91 N. W. 282, an action to recover for goods sold and delivered, the defendant pleaded payment to the plaintiff's agent, but did not prove authority in the latter, either express or implied, to receive the payment. The court held that, since it appeared that the agent did not have possession of the goods sold, and delivery was made by the plaintiff direct to the defendant, no authority to receive the purchase price of the property sold could be implied.

In Brown v. Lally (1900) 79 Minn. 38, 81 N. W. 538, an action to recover for goods sold and delivered, it appeared that the defendant paid a sum of money on account to the plaintiff's traveling salesman who sold him the goods, and took a receipt signed by the agent. The question was whether the sum so paid should be applied to the debt of the purchaser. The court held that the payment could not be so applied, for, independent of controlling usage to the contrary, the sale of goods by an agent did not of itself authorize him to receive payment therefor.

In Murphy v. Canning (1905) 2 West. L. R. (Can.) 103, it was held that agents who were authorized only to sell pianos and organs, which were shipped direct from the vendors to the vendee, had no implied authority to receive payment for the goods sold.

And in Puttock v. Warr (1858) 2 Hurlst. & N. (Eng.) 979, an action to recover the value of certain commodities sold to the defendant, it appeared that a clerk, employed by the plaintiff to solicit orders, called on the defendant and effected a contract for the sale of a quantity of timber, which was delivered several days later by the plaintiff. Subsequently the vendee paid the agent the price of the goods sold, which the latter wrongfully appropriated to his own use. The court held that the clerk, whose authority only extended to the solicitation of orders for the sale of goods not in his possession, had no implied authority to receive the purchase price so as to bind his principal.

(1828) 2 Car. & P. (Eng.) 352, wherein the court held that, in the absence of notice to the contrary, an agent authorized to sell goods had an implied authority to receive the proceeds of the sale. But it will be noted that in this case the facts showed that the buyer dealt with the agent in the belief that he was the owner of the goods, and without knowledge of the agency.

In Howard v. Chapman (1831) 4 Car. & P. (Eng.) 508, there is a dictum to the effect that a traveler authorized to solicit and take orders for the sale of his principal's goods had authority to receive payment in money. This case, however, involved the question of an agent's authority to receive payment in goods of the buyer.

See also Hadley Mill. Co. v. Kelley (1915) 117 Ark. 173, 174 S. W. 227, wherein it appeared that the plaintiff sold, through its agent, a carload of flour to the defendant, who gave his time check to the salesman in payment therefor, the court, among other things, said: "Authority to sell did not necessarily imply the authority to collect the proceeds." But in that case it appeared that the agent had express authority to receive payment for sales made by him, and the real question presented was whether or not he had authority to accept payment in any medium other than money.

See also Shull v. New Birdsall Co. (1901) 15 S. D. 8, 86 N. W. 654, wherein it was said that the statutes of the state of North Dakota (Comp. Laws, §§ 3987, 3988) provided as follows: "A general agent to sell, who is intrusted by the principal with the possession of the thing sold, has authority to receive the price. . . . A special agent to sell has authority to receive the price on delivery of the thing sold, but not afterwards." In that case it was held that an agent authorized to solicit orders for the sale of farm machinery had no authority to receive an old machine in part payment of the purchase price for the new machine ordered.

affirming (1911) 73 Misc. 300, 182 N. Y. Supp. 466, wherein the court recognized the general rule that a selling agent, selling an article not in his possession, was not authorized to receive payment for such article. However, the present case turned on the ratification of the agent's act, and not on the question of his implied authority.

And see Janney v. Boyd (1883) 30 Minn. 319, 15 N. W. 308, wherein there is dictum as follows: "Independent of controlling usage to the contrary, the sale of goods by an agent, or the fact that he is or acts as agent to take orders for goods, does not of itself authorize him to receive payment therefor." In the present case, however, it did not appear that the person to whom a payment was made was the agent of the vendor of goods sold.

In Walton Guano Co. v. McCall (1900) 111 Ga. 114, 36 S. E. 469, it was said that an agency to sell did not necessarily carry with it authority to collect. The determining factor in that case, however, appears to have been the lack of authority of the plaintiff's agent to receive in payment of a certain promissory note, given as security for the purchase price of the material sold by him, property of the defendant.

See also Charles H. Brown Paint Co. v. C. A. Erickson & Bros. (1915) 190 Ill. App. 186, where, in an abstract of the opinion of the court, it was stated that "evidence of payments to an agent is inadmissible where the agent's authority to receive payments is not shown."

See also Keystone Lubricating Co. v. Farmers Oil & Fertilizer Co. (1914) 15 Ga. App. 107, 82 S. E. 665, wherein it was said, in a syllabus by the court, that a mere agency to sell commodities did not necessarily include the power to collect the purchase price of the articles sold.

2. Broker.

In Bassett v. Lederer (1874) 1 Hun (N. Y.) 274, 3 Thomp. & C. 671, it appeared that plaintiff agreed with a broker to sell to defendant a quantity of muslin, and accordingly shipped the goods direct to the purchaser, the articles being at no time in the possession of the broker. The defendant, it further appeared, received the shipment and paid the price thereof to the broker, believing him to be the actual owner of the goods, although an invoice accompanied the shipment, showing the plaintiff to be the actual vendor. In an action to recover the purchase price, which the broker failed to account for to his principal, the court held, first, that the invoice which accompanied the goods put the defendant on notice that the broker was in fact merely a selling agent, and not the owner of the goods; and, second, that the payment to the agent was not a payment to the principal so as to preclude a recovery, saying: "The only authority which the plaintiff gave to the broker over the goods was the right to sell them as a broker. And it appears from the defendant's own statement as a witness that he knew Westbrook as a broker and merchant generally. He should have inferred, from the circumstance that he came to make the sale without having possession of the property he proposed to sell, that he was then acting as a broker and not as a merchant. That was the mode in which brokers ordinarily made sales, and it was sufficient to charge the defendant with knowledge that he was then apparently proposing a sale in that capacity. The fact that he represented himself to be the actual owner cannot protect the defendant, as long as the plaintiff had conferred upon him no colorable authority to make such a representation. And the case in favor of the plaintiff can be in no way changed by the circumstance that the broker artfully contrived to be present when the cartman unloaded the goods, and then professed to have made the delivery of them himself. As long as the plaintiff did not empower him to deceive the defendant by his professions and artifices, he cannot be rendered responsible for their consequences. He simply authorized the broker to sell in that capacity, and as he was known to the defendant to be a broker, and had, in reality, no possession of the property he offered for sale, the purchase must be held to have been made in that and no other way."

In LAWRENCE GAS CO. v. HAWKEYE OIL CO. (reported herewith) ante, 192, an action to recover an amount due for a shipment of oil sold by the plaintiff to the defendant, the latter pleaded as a defense, payment of the amount due to a broker employed by the plaintiff for the purpose of effecting the sale. The court held that the broker, not having possession of the goods sold, had no implied authority to receive payment due under the sale, stating that the burden was on the defendant to show that the broker had a special authority to receive payment for the goods shipped. The court said: "The general rule is that an agent who sells goods on sample—a traveling salesman who sells his principal's goods for future delivery—is not, by virtue of his employment alone, entitled to collect for the goods sold. There are some cases apparently holding to a different doctrine. These cases are all distinguishable because of the peculiar features involved in the particular case. We think the general rule is practically without exception. . . . The distinction seems to be that where the power to sell and to deliver is invested in the same agent, upon delivery he may receive payment and bind his principal."

In J. M. Robinson, N. & Co. v. Corsicana Cotton Factory (1907) 124 Ky. 435, 8 L.R.A. (N.S.) 474, 99 S. W. 305, 14 Ann. Cas. 802, an action to obtain possession of a quantity of cotton cloth, it appeared that on the request of a broker to buy the cloth in question, the defendant company shipped the goods to him, but reserved the possession and title to the same by forwarding therewith a draft drawn upon the broker for the purchase price, thereby conditioning the passing of title and possession on the payment of the draft. The broker, representing that he had a quantity of cotton cloth to sell for a mill, sold it to the plaintiff company, which paid him the purchase price but never received the goods, the draft drawn by the defendant upon the broker not having been paid by reason of his subsequent insolvency, and the defendant, therefore, refusing to deliver the bills of lading. The court held that, since the draft had not been paid, possession and title never passed to the broker, and that he was merely a merchandise broker, not a factor, hence he had no implied authority to receive the purchase price so as to bind his principal, and the plaintiff could not recover without making a payment to the defendant owner of the goods, saying: "'A broker has, ordinarily, no authority to receive payment for property sold by him for his principal, and a purchaser who pays the broker does so at his own risk. Such payment does not discharge him from liability to the principal, unless the authority of the broker to receive payment be express, or may reasonably be implied from the circumstances.' . . . A broker differs from a factor in that he has not possession of the goods to be bought or sold for his principal. . . . Whether the selling agent has possession of the wares determines the character of his agency. That is the test, and the law defining their respective duties and powers is as old as the law of commerce."

Where it appeared that the plaintiff sold, through the medium of a broker, a quantity of cotton to the defendant, and, although the goods were shipped direct from the vendor to the vendee, the broker never having them in his possession, the defendant made payment of the purchase price to the broker, the court held that the payment did not bind the plaintiff, and the latter could recover the value of the property sold, stating that "in the absence of proof of any authority in the broker to receive payment, or of any act from which such authority might be presumed, we are of opinion that the defendant acted without due caution, and equity requires that he should sustain the loss." Toledano v. Klingender (1834) 6 La. 691.

In Graham v. Duckwall (1871) 8 Bush. (Ky.) 12, an action to recover the price of groceries delivered by the plaintiff to the defendant, it appeared that the sale was effected by a broker, to whom the defendant claimed it made payment for the goods sold. The court held that the broker had no authority to receive the purchase price of the commodities sold, and the defendant paid him at its risk, stating the rule as follows: "So he cannot buy or sell on credit except in cases justified by the usages of trade. So a broker has ordinarily no authority virtute officii to receive payment for property sold by him; and if payment is made to him by the purchaser it is at his own risk unless from other circumstances the authority can be inferred."

And in Harrison v. Ross (1870) 12 Jones & S. (N. Y.) 230, an action to recover the purchase price of a quantity of sugar, it appeared that the defendants bought the same through a broker who acted for both the buyer and seller, and that the articles were shipped direct by the plaintiff to the defendant, at no time being in the possession of the broker. The defendant pleaded payment made to the agent. The court held that the broker had no implied authority to receive the payment, for, under the general rule, a broker employed to sell goods had no authority to receive payment, except where he was clothed with the indicia of authority to receive the purchase price by being intrusted with the possession of the goods, or where he acted for an undisclosed principal.

So, in Dean v. International Tile Co. (1888) 47 Hun (N. Y.) 319, wherein it appeared that the defendant contracted to buy a quantity of cement through a broker employed by the plaintiffs, and it further appeared that the cement was never in the possession of the agent, but was shipped directly from the plaintiffs to the defendant, the court held that a payment of the price of the goods sold to the broker, which the latter failed to turn over to his employers, was no defense to this action by the vendors to recover the value of the articles sold, for the broker, as he was at no time intrusted with the possession of the cement, nor had any other evidence of ownership, had in fact no authority, either actual or implied, to receive the payment.

In Crosby v. Hill (1883) 39 Ohio St. 100, it appeared that a broker, employed by the plaintiffs to sell a quantity of shingles, contracted in his own name to sell the same to the defendant, who had no knowledge that the broker was not the real owner of the property. And it appeared further that the broker was not intrusted with the possession of the property sold, nor did his principals, by any conduct on their part, clothe him with authority to receive payment for them, but made shipment of the goods direct to the purchaser. The court held that a payment made by the defendant to the agent, which the latter failed to turn over to his principals, was no bar to the right of the plaintiffs to recover the purchase price, saying: "The broker has not the possession of the goods, and so the vendee cannot be deceived by that circumstance; and, besides, the employing of a person to sell goods as a broker does not authorize him to sell in his own name. If, therefore, he sells in his own name he acts beyond the scope of his authority, and his principal is not bound. But it is said that by these means the broker would be enabled by his principal to deceive innocent persons. The answer, however, is obvious that he cannot do so unless the principal delivers over to him the possession and indicia of property."

Where it appeared that a broker, employed by the plaintiffs to sell a quantity of rye, sold the goods to the defendant, and it appeared further that the agent did not have possession of the property sold, but the same was delivered by the principals direct to the purchaser, the court held that a payment of the purchase price to the broker did not bind his employers, for an agent empowered to sell, who did not have possession of the articles to be sold, was not impliedly authorized to receive the payment therefor, especially where it appeared that the principals were known. The court said: "Where the person contracting for the sale has the property in his possession and delivers it, he is clothed with the indicia of authority to receive payment, especially, when the owner is not known. . . . He is then clothed with apparent authority, and that, as to third persons, is the real authority." Higgins v. Moore (1866) 34 N. Y. 417, reversing (1860) 6 Bosw. 344.

In Dunn v. Wright (1868) 51 Barb. (N. Y.) 244, it was held that the purchaser of goods, bought through an agent employed by the vendor to sell on commission as a broker, could not successfully set off a debt due him from the broker, where it appeared that the agent did not have possession of the goods sold, but the same were shipped by the vendor direct to the vendee, and therefore he had no implied authority to receive payment for the articles sold. The court said: "The goods were received by the defendant at Canandaigua, to which place they were sent by the plaintiff by express, accompanied by a bill or invoice of the bags, sent to the same address by mail. When the defendant received the goods he knew that they came from the plaintiff, as they were marked with his name. He had not then paid for the goods, nor did he afterwards ever pay for them, in fact. He simply credited the amount of the cost of the bags in his books, to Stannard [the agent]. When he thus received the goods he had notice that Stannard [the agent] did not own them, and had no right to receive payment for them. The plaintiff did nothing to mislead him. He had not trusted Stannard [the broker] with the possession of the property, or with any evidences of title thereto."

And in John Hurd Co. v. Consolidated Steel & Wire Co. (1900) 47 App. Div. 467, 62 N. Y. Supp. 489, wherein it appeared that a broker employed by the plaintiff company effected a contract of sale for certain articles with the defendant, and the latter made payment of the purchase price to him, which the broker failed to account for to his employer, the court held, in an action to recover the value of the goods sold, that the plea of payment to the broker could not operate to defeat the plaintiff's right to recover, for the general rule was that a broker to sell had no authority as such to receive payment, and this rule was departed from only when the person contracting for the sale had the property in his possession and delivered it, which did not so appear in the instant case.

So, in Western R. Co. v. Roberts (1860) 4 Phila. (Pa.) 110, the court held that a broker authorized merely to sell a quantity of iron rails, and not intrusted with the possession of the same, had no implied authority to receive payment for the goods sold, and a payment to him by the purchaser did not preclude a recovery by the vendor, where it appeared that the agent failed to account to his principal for the sum collected, but appropriated the same to his own use. Among other things, it was said: "All the authorities on the subject concur that while a factor, or other agent armed with an authority to sell and intrusted with the possession of and right to deliver the thing sold, will be presumed, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, to be also authorized to receive the price; for the protection of the principal, who would otherwise have no means of enforcing his lien for the purchase money, a mere authority to sell, without authority to deliver, will not extend to the receipt of the purchase money, and will cease to exist with the negotiation and completion of the contract of sale."

See also Saladin v. Mitchell (1867) 45 Ill. 80, wherein there is dictum to the effect that a broker had no power, unless specially authorized, to receive payment for a commodity for which he was to find a buyer. In that case, however, there appeared to be no evidence of payment to the broker.

In Latham v. Field (1912) 160 N. C. 235, 76 S. E. 251, wherein there is dictum to the effect that, in the absence of custom or usage, payment to a broker who did not have the possession of articles sold by him was not payment to the principal, as there was no implied authority on the part of the broker to receive payment. This case, however, did not involve the unauthorized receipt by a broker of payment made by a purchase of goods.

3. Traveling salesman or drummer.

In Greenhood v. Keator (1881) 9 Ill. App. 183, it appeared that the plaintiff sold to the defendant a safe pursuant to an order obtained by his traveling salesman, who was authorized only to solicit orders for safes, such orders being subject to the approval of the principal. The court held, in an action to recover the purchase price of the commodity sold, that the defendant's plea of payment made to the agent was of no avail, as the salesman had no power to collect the money for the sale, holding that the power to solicit and take orders did not carry with it authority to receive payments.

And in Williams v. Anderson (1903) 107 Ill. App. 32, it appeared that the appellee company sold a quantity of meat to the appellant through a traveling salesman, and the commodity was shipped to the purchaser direct from the company. In an action to recover the purchase price of the goods, the vendee pleaded payment to the vendor's agent, who, it appeared, had never accounted therefor to his principal. The court held that the payment to the salesman did not bind his principal, for the power to sell did not necessarily imply the power to collect, the agent not being intrusted with the possession and delivery of the goods sold, and no circumstance appearing from which such power could be implied. It also appeared, in the instant case, that the vendee received a bill for the goods sold before payment was made to the agent, on which appeared in large characters the word "NOTICE," underneath which was stated, among other things, the following: "Not responsible for money paid to salesmen." Respecting this notice the court held that where a printed notice on a billhead gave notice that salesmen were not authorized to collect, a payment would not bind the principal.

In Lyles-Black Co. v. Alldredge (1914) 10 Ala. App. 632, 65 So. 696, the court held that it was well settled that a traveling salesman, authorized to make sales or take orders by sample for future delivery and payment, had no implied authority to collect from the vendee the purchase price agreed to be paid. In the present case a payment made by the defendant to the plaintiff's traveling salesman was held to be of no avail as a defense to an action brought to recover the amount of the debt owing to the plaintiff, and the plea of custom and usage so to pay a salesman could not justify the payment, in the absence of proof that the defendant knew of and acted on the custom.

So, in Simon v. Johnson (1893) 101 Ala. 368, 13 So. 491, (1894) 105 Ala. 344, 53 Am. St. Rep. 125, 16 So. 884, (1895) 108 Ala. 241, 19 So. 244, several appeals in an action to recover the amount of a bill of goods sold by the plaintiffs, through their agent, a traveling salesman, the defendant pleaded as defense a payment thereon to the salesman, the court held that the agent had no authority to bind his principal by receiving payment, stating that the decided weight of authority supports the proposition "that a traveling salesman of merchandise, making sales by sample on a credit, or for cash to be paid on receipt of the goods or the invoice of them, has no implied authority to collect the money agreed to be paid from the purchaser."

In Scarritt-Comstock Furniture Co. v. Hudspeth (1907) 19 Okla. 429, 91 Pac. 843, 14 Ann. Cas. 857, wherein it appeared that the plaintiff's traveling salesman sold a bill of goods to the defendant, and the goods were shipped direct from the plaintiff to the purchaser, the court held that there was no implied authority in the salesman to receive a part payment of the price, and that, in the absence of proof of such authority, the vendor was not bound by a payment made to his agent, for a traveling salesman or agent merely to solicit orders for goods, and not intrusted with the possession of the same, had no implied authority to receive payment therefor.

that the plaintiff's traveling salesman sold to the defendant a quantity of goods which were not in his possession, and subsequently, and after the goods had been delivered by the plaintiff, the defendant paid the purchase price to the salesman, although he had had previous notice from the plaintiff not to pay any money to salesmen, justifying his act by the fraud of the agent, who falsely represented to the defendant that he was a member of the selling firm. The court held that the agent had no authority, either actual or implied, to receive the purchase price for the goods sold, as mere authority to sell, by one not having possession of the commodities to be sold, did not imply authority to receive payment or make collections.

In Clark v. Murphy (1895) 164 Mass. 490, 41 N. E. 674, an action to recover the price of goods sold and delivered under a contract of sale effected by the plaintiff with the defendant through a traveling salesman, who was authorized merely to solicit orders, the defendant pleaded payment made to the salesman. The court held that the plaintiff was entitled to recover, for an agent who merely solicited orders for goods, sending those orders to his principal to be filled, had no implied authority to receive payment for the goods sold, and the purchaser paid him at his risk.

In Lakeside Press & Photo-Engraving Co. v. Campbell (1897) 39 Fla. 523, 22 So. 878, wherein it appeared that a traveling salesman, employed by the plaintiff company to solicit orders for booklets and circulars to be printed and delivered by the company, obtained an order from the defendant for certain pamphlets and circulars, and subsequently accepted a payment from the defendant for the goods sold, although it did not appear that he had express authority to receive such payment, the court held that the agent, being a traveling salesman authorized only to solicit work and orders for his principal, not having possession of the goods sold, nor actual authority to receive payments for the sale of the same, had no implied authority to collect the amount due for the work and materials furnished so as to bind his principal, and that the defendant made payment to such an agent at his peril.

See also Dothan Grocery Co. v. White Bros. (1915) 14 Ala. App. 405, 69 So. 992, wherein the court said, although the authority of the plaintiff's traveling salesman to accept payment was not questioned, that the general rule is that traveling salesmen, not having possession of goods, but selling for future delivery, have no authority to receive payments binding on the principal.

See also Ohio Pottery & Glass Co. v. Talbert (1910) 87 S. C. 194, 69 S. E. 211, wherein it was said obiter: "There is much authority for the proposition that a drummer or traveling salesman, who solicits orders by sample and is not intrusted with the possession of the property offered for sale, had no implied authority to collect." In that case, however, the court held that the question of ratification of the agent's act was a question of fact, which should have been submitted to the jury.

1. Authority of agent implied from possession of goods.

Among the well-defined limitations of the general rule heretofore stated, it is established that an agent or broker, having possession of commodities which he is authorized to sell, has implied authority to receive or collect payment therefor.

See also the cases cited infra, V.

In Simmons Motor Co. v. Dudley (1915) 196 Ill. App. 329, wherein it appeared that the plaintiff's agent sold to the defendant an automobile which was in his possession for purposes of demonstration, and that the defendant paid to the agent the amount of the purchase price, the court held that, as the agent had possession of the article, he had an implied authority to receive payment therefor when sold by him.

And in Bailey v. Pardridge (1890) 134 Ill. 188, 27 N. E. 89, affirming (1889) 35 Ill. App. 121, an action to recover the purchase price of goods sold to the defendant, which the latter claimed he paid to the plaintiff's traveling salesman, it appeared that the agent sold certain articles which were in his possession as samples, and received therefor, from the defendant, the purchase price. The court held, the evidence having shown the authority of the salesman to sell the samples, that the payment to the agent bound the principal, for, although the rule is that an agent selling goods not in his possession has no implied authority to receive the purchase price, the rule is otherwise where it appeared that he had possession of the articles sold, for in such a case he was clothed with the indicia of authority to accept payment.

So, in Beckwith v. Reid (Ohio) supra, wherein it appeared that the plaintiff's agent, who was authorized to sell goods on sample, entered into a contract of sale with the defendant for property which he obtained from his principal for delivery, the court held that the principal was bound by payment made to, and received by, the agent, for, the goods having been placed in the possession of the agent, the latter was clothed with implied authority to collect the purchase price, and the defendant was justified in assuming that the agent had such authority.

In an early case (Pickering v. Busk (1812) 15 East, 38, 104 Eng. Reprint, 758, 13 Revised Rep. 364), wherein it appeared that payment was made to a broker who sold goods in his possession for the benefit of his principal, but, without disclosing him, the court held that the possession of the goods gave the broker implied authority to receive the purchase price, and a payment so made bound the principal, although the agent proved unfaithful and did not account therefor to his employer.

And so, in PETERSEN v. PACIFIC AMERICAN FISHERIES (reported herewith) ante, 198, it appeared that the defendant purchased certain commodities from the lessees of the plaintiffs, who, under the terms of their lease, were authorized to sell goods for the lessors, but had no actual authority to receive payment. It appearing that the purchaser made payment to the agents of the plaintiffs, the court holds that the latter were bound thereby, for, having clothed their agents with the indicia of authority to receive payment by intrusting them with the possession of the goods sold, they enabled the agents to obtain the advantage of the purchaser, who rightfully assumed their authority to collect the purchase money.

In Schleicher v. Armstrong (1895) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 32 S. W. 327, the court held that an agent, having possession of property which he was authorized to sell, gave good title to the purchaser although the agent violated his principal's instructions by receiving purchase-money notes.

And in Cross v. Haskins (1841) 13 Vt. 536, wherein it appeared that the plaintiff's agent was intrusted with the possession of certain commodities which he was authorized to sell, the court held that a payment made to him in good faith by the purchaser of the goods bound the principal, for the possession of the articles clothed the agent with implied authority to receive payment for the sale thereof.

So, in Woodworth v. School Dist. (1916) 92 Wash. 456, 159 Pac. 757, an action to recover the purchase price of certain school clocks sold by the plaintiff's assignor to the defendant, it appeared that the sale was made by a representative who was authorized to make sales, install the clocks, and hire labor for the purposes of installing and repairing the clocks. It further appeared that the agent installed the property and received from the defendant school warrants in payment therefor, which he cashed and appropriated to his own use. The court held that under the facts the plaintiff had clothed his agent with implied authority to receive payment for the goods sold by him, and was bound by the payment made by the defendant.

To the same effect in Galbraith v. Weber (1910) 58 Wash. 132, 28 L.R.A. (N.S.) 341, 107 Pac. 1050, an action to recover the possession of a horse, it appeared that an agent of the plaintiff, authorized so to do, sold the horse to the defendant. At the time of the sale the agent had the horse in his possession, and also several certificates of registration showing the animal's pedigree. The defendant paid the purchase price to the agent, which the latter failed to turn over to his principal, but appropriated to his own use. The court held that the plaintiff could not recover, for the agent had implied power to receive the payment, having exclusive possession of the property to be sold.

In Rice v. Groffmann (1874) 56 Mo. 434, distinguished in Keown v. Vogel

(1887) 25 Mo. App. 35, supra, II. b, 1, it appeared that defendant bought a quantity of cigars from the plaintiff's agent, and made a payment therefor to the agent, who failed to account for the money to his principal. In an action brought to recover from the defendant the value of the goods sold, the court held that the plaintiff could not recover, as an agent having power to sell goods had authority to receive the payment therefor.

And in Norrid v. Garner (1916) — Mo. App. —, 182 S. W. 1025, wherein it appeared that the plaintiff was the owner of a certain farm which he leased to a third party, whom he authorized to sell a crop of corn raised on the land and apply the proceeds thereof in payment of rents due, the court held that the agent was thereby authorized to receive payment for the corn upon a sale thereof to the defendant. And, further, that the power to sell the property included the right to receive payment, following Rice v. Groffmann (Mo.) supra. But it will be noted that this doctrine was limited by the court in Keown v. Vogel (Mo.) supra, II. b, 1, to those cases wherein it appeared that the agent had possession of the property sold.

In Downes v. Rogers (1918) 102 Kan. 797, 171 Pac. 1150, the court held that the plaintiffs' agent had authority to receive the purchase price of a farm tractor sold to the defendant, where it appeared that the agent had possession of the article sold, and that the plaintiffs held him out to the defendant and the general public as their agent for the purpose of selling farm tractors.

So, in Howe Mach. Co. v. Ballweg (1887) 89 Ill. 318, wherein it appeared that the agent of the plaintiff company, having in his possession an article of its manufacture, sold the same to the defendant and received from him part payments on the purchase price, the court held that under the circumstances the purchaser had a right to assume the authority of the salesman to accept the payments.

And in Jarvis v. Pague (1919) — Ark. —, 208 S. W. 601, wherein it appeared that plaintiff placed his agent in possession of a drove of horses, with instructions to find a buyer for the same, it was held that such express authority carried with it the implied power to collect the proceeds of any sales made, and hence a payment to the agent was a good defense to an action brought to recover the value of horses sold by the agent.

In Birch Tree State Bank v. Brown (1911) 152 Mo. App. 589, 133 S. W. 860, wherein it appeared that an agent with authority to sell certain shares of stock had the possession of the same at the time of sale, and delivered them to the purchaser, the court held that a payment to the agent of the purchase price bound the principal, for the latter, in intrusting the possession of the stock to the agent, clothed him with implied authority to receive the payment.

In Maxfield v. Carpenter (1895) 84 Hun, 450, 32 N. Y. Supp. 881, the court held that where a broker not only had authority to sell goods for the plaintiff, but actually had possession of the same and delivered them himself, the defendant was justified in making a payment of the purchase price to the agent, for the possession of the articles sold implied a power to collect for the same, and led the purchaser to believe that the broker was in fact the owner of the commodities.

In International-Sponge Importers v. Watt [1911] A. C. (Eng.) 279, 81 L. J. P. C. N. S. 12, 16 Com. Cas. 224, 55 Sol. Jo. 422, 27 Times L. R. 364, 48 Scot. L. R. 515, wherein it appeared that a traveling agent, employed by the plaintiffs to sell the products of their trade, was intrusted with the possession of the goods to be sold, the court held that a payment made to him by the defendants for the purchase of goods was valid as against the principals, for the agent, having the custody of the property sold, had implied authority to receive payments therefor. It was held further that a notice on statements of account to the effect that payments should only be made by crossed checks was not sufficient intimation to the customer that the agent did not have authority to receive payments in cash, or in a check in his favor.

And in John Hutchinson Mfg. Co. v. Henry (1891) 44 Mo. App. 263, the court held that, where it appeared that the agent of the owner of certain goods solicited an order for their sale and transmitted the order to his principal, who delivered the goods in question to the agent for delivery to the purchaser, the principal thereby clothed the agent with ostensible authority to receive payment for the goods.

See also Brown v. Aitken (1916) 90 Vt. 569, 99 Atl. 265, wherein there is dictum as follows: "If one intrusts another with the possession of personal property together with authority to sell and deliver the same, the authority to receive the pay therefor will be implied, since the principal, by his own act, clothes the agent with apparent authority so to do." This case, however, did not involve the sale of personalty, but a sale of certain real property.

2. Authority of agent implied from representations or acquiescence of principal.

Where a principal holds out his agent as having authority to receive payment for commodities which he is authorized to sell, or has acquiesced in the acceptance by the agent of payments in past transactions with the purchaser, the law implies authority in the agent to receive payment for goods sold by him.

Thus, in American Sales Book Co. v. Cowdrey (1911) 100 Ark. 325, 38 L.R.A.(N.S.) 700, 140 S. W. 134, wherein it appeared that a traveling salesman, representing the plaintiff company, made a sale to the defendant, and it further appeared that the salesman was provided with blank contracts by which he was authorized to collect all or part of the purchase price at the time of the sale, the court held that a partial payment made at the time the sale was consummated, and the receipt of the balance by the agent on a subsequent trip, were within his authority and binding upon the principal, despite the fact that on a statement of account rendered to the defendant was printed, "Pay no money to agents," the court said: "Here an agent was not only employed to negotiate sales, but was given a blank form of contract by which he was authorized to collect all or a part of the purchase price at the time he made the sale. The agent promised at the time the order was given, to come back and show the defendant how to run the recapitulator. The blank form of contract furnished the agent by the plaintiff made it optional with the agent to collect all or a part of the purchase price at the time he took the order. Hence it may be said, under the facts and circumstances in this case, he had not only express authority to travel and solicit orders, but the implied authority to collect the purchase price for the principal. It cannot be said that the clause, 'Pay no money to agents,' printed on the statement of the account sent to defendant was notice or direction to him not to pay its agent. . . . The plaintiff was a corporation and, as such, could only transact its business through agents. Hence the words could mean no more than to pay no money to agents not authorized to receive it."

And in Harris v. Simmerman (1876) 81 Ill. 413, it appeared that the plaintiff's agents sold to the defendants a safe, and accepted in part payment an old safe which plaintiff received and retained, without giving notice to the defendant that the agent had transcended his authority. The court said: "Plaintiff should at once, upon the receipt of the old safe, which was express notice to him that his agent was exceeding what he says was the authority confided to him, have notified the defendants that the agreement was beyond his authority, and that he was not authorized to receive payment. By the acquiescing of the plaintiff in the arrangement the agent made, defendants were justified in assuming that the agent had the power to collect, as he represented he had, and not being otherwise informed until after they had made payment, the plaintiff should be bound by the payment."

In Packer v. Hinckley Locomotive Works (1877) 122 Mass. 484, wherein it appeared that the plaintiff company had, through a long course of dealing, sold quantities of coal through its agent, always sending to him bills of lading for the coal purchased, and bills for the purchase price, and it appeared further that payments were always made to the agent without complaint by the principal, the court held, in an action to recover for a quantity of coal, that defendant's plea of payment to the agent was a good defense, for by the course of dealing the defendant was warranted in assuming the authority of the agent to receive payment for goods sold by him.

In Warren v. Halley (1895) 107 Mich. 120, 64 N. W. 1058, an action in replevin to recover possession of a piano, sold by plaintiff's agent to defendant, and delivered directly from the plaintiff's place of business, it appeared that the wife of the defendant called on the plaintiff at his office, and stated that they would pay cash for the piano, whereupon the plaintiff told her that he would send her a duly authorized agent to collect the money. Subsequently, the defendant paid the agent the purchase price of the piano, which the latter failed to turn over to his principal. The court held that, while mere authority to take orders for pianos did not imply authority to collect therefor, nevertheless the evidence showed such a holding out of the agent by the principal as to justify belief in his authority to receive the purchase price of the article sold.

Where it appeared that the plaintiff's agent, apparently having charge of its New York branch, was held out as being something more than a mere agent authorized only to sell goods, the court held that a payment to him for goods sold bound his principal. Carter White Lead Co. v. Pounds (1901) 65 App. Div. 476, 72 N. Y. Supp. 876.

In Kaestner v. Hosie (1914) 7 Sask. L. R. 429, it was held that, while under the general rule an agent employed to sell had no authority to receive or collect the purchase price of the goods sold, nevertheless, where it appeared that the plaintiffs had authorized their agent to collect certain moneys from the defendant, which he had done, and the amounts so collected were credited to the buyer's account, the latter was justified in assuming that the agent was authorized to collect the balance of the account. The court said: "It seems to be settled law that an agent employed to sell has no authority as such to receive payment. . . . But it is equally well established that where a principal has so conducted himself as to lead a third person reasonably to believe that his agent is clothed with a certain authority, and that third person, in such belief, in good faith enters into transactions with the agent within the scope of his ostensible authority, the principal cannot be heard to deny the authority of the agent to the prejudice of the one so dealing with him."

624, 45 N. W. 415, wherein it appeared that the plaintiffs had, for a course of time, allowed their agent to collect moneys due on sales made by him, the court held that they could not deny his implied authority to receive payment from a purchaser where he absconded with the money paid, saying: "It was easy and competent for the plaintiffs to limit the power of their agent, and not allow him to make collections of money secured by chattel mortgages and other instruments, but they could not allow him to make them 'when he turned the money in,' and deny his authority to make them when he did not. There is no justice or reason in such a rule of law, and we do not think it exists; and as it appeared from the testimony offered on the part of the plaintiffs that Hills [the agent] sold organs on credit, and collected the money with their approval, and by their course of dealing they held him out to the community as having authority to receive payments, they are certainly bound by his acts in that regard."

And in Haughton v. Maurer (1884) 55 Mich. 323, 21 N. W. 426, wherein it appeared that the defendant bought a lot of cigars through the plaintiff's agent, who subsequently collected payment upon a promissory note given by the defendant to secure the purchase price, the court held, on the question of the agent's authority to collect the payment, that representations and statements made by a member of the plaintiff firm, recognizing the authority of the agent so to receive payments, were sufficient to warrant the action of the defendant in paying the purchase money to the agent.

In Diebold Safe & Lock Co. v. Dunnegan (1909) 135 Mo. App. 135, 115 S. W. 1051, wherein it appeared that an agent, by his contract, was made liable to his principal for the price of goods sold, the court held that he was thereby necessarily authorized to collect payment for the goods when delivered to the purchaser.

In Townsend v. Inglis (1816) Holt, N. P. (Eng.) 278, wherein it appeared that in previous dealings with a buyer of goods the sellers had permitted their broker to draw bills of exchange in his own name and receive payment thereon for goods sold for his principals, the court held that the vendors were bound by a payment made in like manner in the present case.

So, in Kingan & Co. v. Breen (1914) 190 Ill. App. 489, wherein it appeared that the defendant for a number of years had bought great quantities of commodities from the plaintiff, through its traveling salesman, and during that time payments were made to the salesman and accepted by the plaintiff without complaint, the court held, in an action to recover on an item of account which the defendant had paid to the plaintiff's agent, that the plaintiff, having recognized and ratified the acts of its salesman in receiving payments for so many years, was not in a position to deny his authority to receive the payment on the item in question.

And in Talmage v. Nevius (1869) 2 Sweeny (N. Y.) 88, wherein it appeared that a sales agent employed by the plaintiff had general charge of the latter's office, and, on a sale made by the agent to the defendant, had possession of the bill of lading for the shipment of the goods, and other evidences of authority, the court held that the facts constituted such a holding out of the agent by the principal as implied authority to receive payments for sales made by him.

Where it appeared that in a course of dealing between the plaintiff and the defendant, covering several seasons, payments were made to the plaintiff's broker, and that in the present transaction, involving a sale of commodities, the purchaser had stated its intention to pay the broker as in the past, the court held that the defendant was justified in assuming that the agent had authority to receive the purchase price for his principal. Grays Harbor Commercial Co. v. Taku Canning & Cold Storage Co. (1918) 102 Wash. 594, 173 Pac. 434.

In Luckie v. Johnston (1892) 89 Ga. 321, 15 S. E. 459, an action to recover the purchase price of two consignments of merchandise sold to the defendant, it appeared that one of the shipments was ordered through the plaintiff's traveling salesman, who was authorized to sell, but was especially instructed not to receive payments. It further appeared that the agent did not have possession of the goods sold, but that subsequently bills were mailed to him for presentment to the defendant. On these invoices was printed, "All bills must be paid at this office." The defendant contended that he did not see this notice, and offered evidence to show that the salesman, with the principal's knowledge, had collected payments from other customers, and that the plaintiff and the agent had settled their accounts, included among which was the price of the goods paid by the defendant to the agent. It was held that the refusal of the trial court to charge that there was evidence of implied authority on the part of the agent to collect the price of goods sold by him was erroneous; that under the circumstances the authority of the agent to receive the payments so as to bind his principal was a question of fact for the jury to determine.

In Superior Mfg. Co. v. Russell (1906) 127 Ga. 151, 56 S. E. 296, wherein it appeared that the plaintiff, after efforts to collect an amount due for goods sold by its traveling salesman to the defendant, wrote to the salesman inclosing a statement of account, and authorizing him to dispose of it for cash at a discount, the court held that this authority to sell the account and deduct therefrom his commissions as agent included the authority to receive the amount for which the account was sold, and that a payment of the account to him by the defendant had the same effect as a sale of the account to the debtor himself, and the payment bound the principal.

And in Kasson v. Noltner (1878) 43 Wis. 646, wherein it appeared that the plaintiff's agent had authority to receive payments in cash or on the instalment plan for property sold by him, the court held that the agent had implied authority to collect on a promissory note given by the defendant to secure the purchase price of a commodity bought by him from the plaintiff.

The law also implies authority in an agent to receive payments for commodities sold by him where it is shown that it was the custom or usage in the particular trade so to pay to agents and salesmen. But in order to avail a purchaser, it must be shown that at the time he made the payment he had knowledge of, and acted in accordance with, the custom or usage. Simon v. Johnson (1893) 101 Ala. 368, 13 So. 491; Lyles-Black Co. v. Alldredge (1914) 10 Ala. App. 632, 65 So. 696; Meyer v. Stone (1885) 46 Ark. 210, 55 Am. Rep. 577; Putnam v. French (1881) 53 Vt. 402, 38 Am. Rep. 682; Catterall v. Hindle (1867) L. R. (Eng.) 2 C. P. 368, reversing (1866) 1 Harr. & R. 267, 35 L. J. C. P. N. S. 161, 12 Jur. N. S. 488, 14 L. T. N. S. 102, 14 Week. Rep. 371. See also James v. Conklin (1910) 158 Ill. App. 640.

In Meyer v. Stone (1885) 46 Ark. 210, 55 Am. Rep. 577, it appeared that a traveling salesman, representing the plaintiff company, sold a bill of goods to the defendant and collected the purchase price, but failed to account therefor to his principal. The court held that evidence of a custom of the trade warranting payment to a traveling salesman was admissible, and sufficient to show an implied authority on his part to receive the same. Referring to the rules governing the authority of a salesman to accept payment for merchandise sold, it was said: "It seems clear, upon principle, that where goods are received by a purchaser from the vendors with a bill thereof payable to themselves, the bare fact that the order for the goods had been procured by an agent of the vendors, whose general duty it was to solicit such orders, would not raise the presumption that the agent was authorized to collect the purchase price. In such a case, payment to the agent is no defense to an action by the vendors for the purchase money. But full validity may be given to the act of the agent in receiving payment, if there be a known usage of trade or course of business to justify the purchaser in making it. . . . The most usual instance of the principal being bound . . . by the act of his agent, beyond the authority conferred, is where the agent contracting for the sale has possession of the property and delivers it to the purchaser, collecting the purchase money contrary to instructions. In that case, the possession and delivery of the property clothe the agent with the indicia of authority to receive the purchase price, and if the purchaser is not apprised of the limit placed upon the agent's authority, payment to the agent is payment to the principal. This incidental authority does not exist, however, if the agent is merely employed to negotiate a contract without possession of the property."

And in Putnam v. French (1881) 53 Vt. 402, 38 Am. Rep. 682, wherein there was evidence of a custom prevailing in the community whereby drummers authorized to sell goods were paid the purchase price therefor, the court held that a payment made in accordance with such a custom bound the principal, where the agent failed to account for the money paid to him. It was held, further, that a notice reading "Payable at office," printed on a bill sent to the purchaser, was not constructive notice to the vendee of the agent's want of authority, the court saying, in part, as follows: "In view of the obscure manner in which those words were written on the bill-head, and of the circumstances under which and the purposes for which, in other respects, that bill was sent, and of the terms of the contract as to whom and when and where payment was to be made, we do not think the defendants were guilty of such negligence in not seeing those words as to be chargeable with notice which they did not in fact have."

In Catterall v. Hindle (1867) L. R. 2 C. P. (Eng.) 368, reversing (1866) 1 Harr. & R. 267, 35 L. J. C. P. N. S. 161, 12 Jur. N. S. 488, 14 L. T. N. S. 102, 14 Week. Rep. 371, the court held that it was a question of fact for the jury to decide, depending on the local custom or usage, whether a payment made to a broker, employed to sell a quantity of yarn, was binding on his principal, and, it appearing that the question was not submitted to the jury below, a new trial was ordered.

In Simon v. Johnson (1893) 101 Ala. 368, 13 So. 491, the court held that knowledge must be shown on the part of a principal of custom or usage in a particular locality, whereby merchants paid for goods to traveling salesmen, making sales on sample for future delivery, in order to sustain the plea by defendant of a payment so made to the principal's traveling salesman.

And in Lyles-Black Co. v. Alldredge (1914) 10 Ala. App. 632, 65 So. 696, it was held that the plea of custom and usage could not justify a payment to a traveling salesman, selling by sample for future delivery, in the absence of proof that the purchaser had knowledge of, and acted on, such a custom.

See also James v. Conklin (1910) 158 Ill. App. 640, wherein the court said, by way of dictum: "Payments made to an agent are good and obligatory upon the principal, in all cases where the agent is authorized to receive payment, either by express authority, or by that resulting from the usage of trade, or from the particular dealings between the parties. . . . The principal is equally bound by the authority which he actually gives, and by that which by his own acts he appears to give. The principal is responsible for the appearance of authority." In the instant case, however, it does not appear that the agent received a payment for commodities which he was authorized to sell, or which he did sell.

4. Payment to agent of undisclosed principal.

It is generally held that payment by a bona fide purchaser of commodities to an agent who had the goods sold in his possession, and sold the same as the owner thereof, is binding on the undisclosed principal.

Canada.—Huard v. Banville (1907) Rap. Jud. Quebec 31 C. S. 27.

Thus, in Continental Tobacco Co. v. Campbell (1903) 25 Ky. L. Rep. 569, 76 S. W. 125, an action to recover the price of a crop of tobacco, it appeared that the defendant bought the property through an agent of the plaintiff, and paid him therefor in the belief that he was the owner of the property sold, and it appeared further that the plaintiff permitted her agent to take possession of the property and appear to be the owner of it. The court held that the payment to the agent bound the principal.

In DuBois v. Perkins (1891) 21 Or. 189, 27 Pac. 1044, an action to recover the purchase price of a lot of cigars alleged to have been sold by the plaintiff to the defendant, it appeared that an agent of the plaintiff negotiated the sale and delivered the goods in his own name to the purchaser, who claimed that he was without notice that they were owned by the plaintiff. The court held that under the circumstances the agent had implied authority to collect the purchase price.

And in Eclipse Wind Mill Co. v. Thorson (1877) 46 Iowa, 181, an action to recover the balance due on the sale of a windmill, it appeared that the defendant bought the property in question from an agent of the plaintiff, without knowledge of the agency, believing that the agent was the owner of the property, and accordingly made payment to him of the purchase price. The court held that the payment to the agent was a good defense.

So too, in Lough v. Thornton (1871) 17 Minn. 253, Gil. 230, it appeared that an agent of the plaintiff, who was intrusted with the possession of a quantity of boots and shoes for the purpose of effecting a sale, dealt as the owner of the goods with the defendant, who paid him therefor in the belief that he was the owner of the property, and with no knowledge of the agency. In an action, brought to recover the value of the goods, the court held that the plaintiff could only enforce his rights to the property subject to the equities of the defendant, for by intrusting the agent with the possession of the property he clothed him with the indicia of ownership, basing its finding on the ground that "of two innocent persons, he shall suffer who has put it in the power of another to do any injury." The court said further: "It is a well-settled rule of law that a payment to one who is in fact an agent, but is allowed to act in his own name, and it is not known that another is the principal, is valid."

Where it appeared that the defendant bought a quantity of boots and shoes from the plaintiff's agent, and paid him the purchase price under the belief that he was the owner of the goods sold, and it did not appear that the defendant had any cause or reason to know that the salesman was acting as the plaintiff's agent, the court held that the payment made bound the undisclosed principal, and that the latter could not question the agent's authority to receive the purchase price of the articles sold. Quoting from Eclipse Wind Mill Co. v. Thorson (Iowa) supra, the court said: "If the purchaser of property does not know that he is dealing with an agent of the owner, and has not good reason to know it, he is justified in treating the agent as the owner, and payment of the purchase price to him will be a defense to an action by the owner for the amount." Tripp & M. Boot & Shoe Co. v. Martin (1891) 45 Kan. 765, 26 Pac. 424.

In Lumley v. Corbett (1861) 18 Cal. 494, wherein it appeared that the defendant bought a certain quantity of ale from an agent of the plaintiff, authorized to sell, and it further appeared that the agent professed to act upon its own account, and not as representing the plaintiff, the court held that the payment of the purchase price to the agent bound the principal, for an agent of an undisclosed principal who was authorized to sell property had authority to receive payment for the same.

And in Huard v. Banville (1907) Rap. Jud. Quebec 31 C. S. 27, wherein it appeared that the plaintiff's agent effected the sale of certain merchandise, which was in his possession, to the defendant, and led the latter to believe he was the owner of the goods, the court held that a payment for the goods sold, made to the agent, bound his principal, for, having possession of the commodities to be sold, the agent was clothed with the indicia of ownership, enabling him to deceive innocent purchasers for value.

Where it appeared that goods were sold by a broker without disclosing his principal, the court held that the buyer was justified in assuming the agent to be the owner of the goods and in making payment of the purchase price to him. Blackburn v. Scholes (1810) 2 Campb. (Eng.) 341, 11 Revised Rep. 723.

And in White v. Kincaid (1919) — Cal. —, 179 Pac. 685, it appeared that the plaintiff corporation was formerly a copartnership which was indebted to the defendant company, and an agreement was made whereby the copartnership sold and delivered certain quantities of lumber to the defendant on the understanding that the purchase price thereof would be credited on its indebtedness. Subsequently, the partnership was dissolved and the corporation formed, but the former manager of the copartnership continued as manager for the corporation, and in that capacity delivered to the defendant the lumber herein sued upon. The defendant claimed that he was never notified of the dissolution of the partnership and the formation of the corporation, and continued to receive the lumber, believing that the same was delivered by the copartnership. The court held that, under the facts, the copartnership was the agent of an undisclosed principal, the corporation, and, having settled with the agent, the defendant was no longer liable to the principal.

In Coates v. Lewes (1808) 1 Campb. (Eng.) 444, an action to recover the price of a quantity of linseed oil sold by the plaintiffs, through a broker, to the defendant, it appeared that the broker had possession of the goods and represented himself to the defendant as a principal. The defendant pleaded payment to the broker in the belief that he was the owner of the goods. The court held that the plea was good.

So, in Campbell v. Hassell (1816) 1 Starkie (Eng.) 233, it was held that a payment made to a broker, selling goods for an undisclosed principal, was good as against the principal, but that the payment must be made in accordance with the terms of the contract of sale.

And in Gardiner v. Davis (1825) 2 Car. & P. (Eng.) 49, an action for goods sold and delivered, the court held that the plaintiff, who had carried on the business of cow keeper in his own name with the consent of the real owner, who had not asserted any claim to the money due on the transaction involved, was entitled to recover, saying: "If a person allow another to trade in his own name, and to hold himself out to the world as carrying on the business, a payment to that other would be a good bar to an action brought by the person for whom the trade was really carried on. And the person ostensibly carrying on the trade is by law entitled to recover for goods sold in the course of that trade, unless the person so suffering him to carry on the trade interfere, by asserting his or her right to the sum due."

III. Minority rule.

Two American states form a small minority, holding that an agent authorized to sell commodities has necessarily implied power to receive or collect payment therefor. Trainer v. Morison (1886) 78 Me. 160, 57 Am. 8 A.L.R.—15.

Rep. 790, 8 Atl. 185. See also Daylight Burner Co. v. Odlin (1871) 51 N. H. 56, 12 Am. Rep. 45.

Thus, in Trainer v. Morison (Me.) supra, an action to recover the price of merchandise sold, the defendant pleaded as a defense payment to the plaintiff's agent. It appeared that the agent, authorized to solicit orders, took an order from the defendant for the goods sold, which were shipped direct from the plaintiff's place of business to the defendant. Two weeks after the delivery, the agent returned and received payment for the goods, giving to the defendant a receipted bill which bore the notice: "All bills must be paid by check to our order, or in current funds at our office." The agent embezzled the collection. The court held that the plaintiff could not recover, for the agent had the authority to contract for the sale of the chattels, and therefore had the authority to collect pay for them, in the absence of any prohibition known to the purchaser. Relative to the notice printed on the billhead, the court said: "In this case, the agent assumed to complete a contract of sale, specific in its terms, stipulating that payment was to be made to himself. After the goods had been delivered, he presented for payment a bill, made upon a genuine 'billhead' of his principal. He assumed general authority, and no facts are proved that curtail or limit it. The plaintiff seeks to charge the defendants with knowledge that payment was required to be made, according to the terms of the notice in red letters upon the bill sent with the goods. The defendants did not see the notice, nor, taking into consideration the care ordinarily exercised by prudent men, are they at fault for not observing it."

And see Daylight Burner Co. v. Odlin (N. H.) supra, wherein the court held that a traveling merchant, authorized to sell the goods of his principal, had authority, as incident to his general powers, to receive payment of the purchase price, subject to be controlled, however, by proof of the mercantile usage in the trade or business, although it appeared that the agent did not have the possession of the goods sold, but that the same were shipped direct from the principal to the purchaser. The case, however, did not involve a payment made by the purchaser to the agent.

IV. Rule in Tennessee.

A conflict of opinion seems to exist in the state of Tennessee on the question of the authority of an agent to receive payment for commodities sold by him. In two early cases the courts unequivocally hold to the minority rule that an agent authorized to sell has implied authority to receive payment for the property sold, whereas, in a comparatively recent case, the court refused to extend this doctrine to the facts appearing therein, but applied the rule of the majority jurisdictions, at the same time, however, expressly refraining from overruling the early cases.

In Hoskins v. Johnson (1858) 5 Sneed, 469, wherein it appeared that the plaintiffs' agent, who was authorized to sell merchandise, sold the same to the defendant, who paid him the purchase price therefor, the court held that the payment bound the plaintiffs, in the absence of proof of notice to the purchaser that the agent was authorized only to sell, for an agency to sell necessarily implied authority to accept payment for the article sold.

And in Collins v. Newton (1874) 7 Baxt. 269, the court held, following Hoskins v. Johnson, supra, that an agent, authorized to sell goods, had implied authority to receive payment therefor where the purchaser had no notice of a limitation of the agent's authority. In this respect, the court said in part as follows: "Unless the defendant was notified not to pay the agent, he might safely make his payments to him, as one authorized by plaintiffs to sell and to receive payment for goods sold by them. Parties dealing with recognized agents for the sale of the wares of their principals may pay them, unless otherwise notified by the principals."

In Fabian Mfg. Co. v. Newman (1900) — Tenn. —, 62 S. W. 218, the court refused to extend the rule laid down in Hoskins v. Johnson and Collins v. Newton, supra, saying: "We have found no cases, and have been cited to none, overruling these two cases. The elementary principle cited and relied on in both cases is undoubtedly correct, but we feel sure that both of these cases are out of accord with the general rule and overwhelming weight of authority in the United States, and certainly out of accord with the general rule and custom of business as now conducted. While in no instance will this court undertake to overrule a decision of the supreme court of this state, yet in a case of this kind we certainly would not feel justified in extending the apparent principle of these two cases. In the first case, reported in 5 Sneed, 469, the statement is made . . . that goods were invariably shipped on the order of this agent. It is further stated that the merchants who bought the goods and made the payment had no correspondence nor other transaction with the merchant who sold, except through the agent. It is not clear that we have all the facts presented in the record, but from the facts stated these things do appear: that all the dealings were with the agent, and it would appear that in that case the payment was made in due course of business. In the last case,—that reported in 7 Baxt. 269,—it appears that there had been a draft, that the draft had not been paid, and that the agent subsequently called on the parties to whom he had sold, and it appears that when he called there was some conversation in regard to a rebate claimed on account of the inferior quality of the whisky sold. In neither of these cases does it appear that the agent was merely authorized to take orders for goods, but it is clear that in both cases they were agents authorized to, or at least the court treated them as having full power and authority to, make absolute sales, that they did so, and that such sales were confirmed by the principals. Aside from these cases, we would have no doubt about the rule in this state being that a mere authority to sell does not imply an authority to receive payment, unless the agent who made the sale had in his possession the property or indicia of its ownership, with authority to deliver such, and unless the sales were made for cash. In such case, where the agent has the property in possession, and is authorized to deliver the same, and where the sale was for cash, of course the authority to receive payment is implied, because there the payment is necessarily incident to and a part of the sale. But where, as in this case, the agent was not in possession of the goods, was not in fact authorized to absolutely close any sale, but simply was an agent to take orders, subject to acceptance or rejection of the house, we are of the opinion that no authority to collect was or could be implied. To hold otherwise than here announced would, in our opinion, be contrary to reason, contrary to the present course and custom of an immense business of this character done in the United States, and would work great inconvenience, and would also be contrary to the overwhelming weight of authority, both in textbooks and decisions." Thus, where it appeared in the present case that the plaintiff's agent sold goods not in his possession, the court held to the majority rule, holding that the agent had no implied authority to receive payment where he was merely authorized to sell goods which were not in his possession. However, the court did not overrule the holdings in the cases cited above, and the result is that two apparently contrary rulings exist in this jurisdiction.

See also Hackney v. Jones (1842) 3 Humph. 612, wherein the court said, among other things, that an unrestricted power to sell authorized an agent to receive payment for the articles sold. That case, however, turned on the mode of payment, rather than the authority to receive the same.

V. Implied authority of factor or auctioneer.

A factor or auctioneer has authority to receive payment of the purchase price of commodities sold for the principal, except where the latter has given notice to the purchaser to pay direct to him. But after the sale is made and the goods have been delivered, the factor's or auctioneer's authority is at an end, and no authority is implied subsequently to receive the purchase price. Adams v. Fraser (1897) 27 C. C. A. 108, 49 U. S. App. 481, 82 Fed. 211; Allen v. Pierce (1796) 1 Dane, Abr. (Mass.) 612; Kelley v. Munson (1811) 7 Mass. 319, 5 Am. Dec. 47; Golden v. Levy (1814) 4 N. C. (1 Car. Law Repos.) 527) 6 Am. Dec. 555; Higgins v. Grindrod (1883) 16 Phila. (Pa.) 200; Sykes v. Giles (1839) 5 Mees. & W. 645, 151 Eng. Reprint, 273, 9 L. J. Exch. N. S. 106. See also Drinkwater v. Goodwin (1775) Cowp. pt. 1, p. 256, 98 Eng. Reprint, 1072.

Thus, in Allen v. Pierce (1796) 1 Dane, Abr. (Mass.) 612, the court held that where a factor, or one intrusted with property to sell, sold it and received the purchase money, the vendee was not liable afterwards to the real owner of the goods, though the factor misapplied the money; but where a factor sold goods, and before payment was made the real owner gave notice of his claim and demanded payment, a subsequent payment to the factor was made at the purchaser's peril, and he was liable to pay the real owner the value of the goods sold.

And in Higgins v. Grindrod (1883) 16 Phila. (Pa.) 200, it appeared that a broker employed by the plaintiff sold a bill of goods to the defendants, and for the purpose of delivering the same entered the plaintiff's warehouse without authority and took therefrom the goods sold. And it appeared further that, although they had been notified by the plaintiff not to do so, the defendants paid the purchase price to the broker, claiming in justification of such a payment that he was a factor. The court held that, conceding the broker did act as a factor for the owner of the goods, a payment to him after notification from the owner not to pay would be a payment by the buyer in his own wrong, and would not prejudice the rights of the principal. But it was held that the facts showed that the agent was not employed as a factor, but as a broker, and had no implied authority to receive the payment.

In Kelley v. Munson (1811) 7 Mass. 319, 5 Am. Dec. 47, the court stated the general rule relative to the authority of a factor to receive payment in the following terms: that a factor's sale created a contract between the owner of the goods sold and the buyer, and where it appeared that a factor sold upon credit, and the owner or principal gave notice of his interest and claim to the buyer before payment, and notified him not to pay the factor, the buyer was not justified in afterwards paying the factor. But it was stated that there were certain exceptions to this rule, the court saying: "There are exceptions to this rule; as where the factor sells in his own name, being himself responsible for the price of the goods sold, whether collected or not; (a) or where he sells them to his own creditor, where there are mutual dealings. The principal cannot, in those cases, interfere to the prejudice of the party dealing with the factor without any knowledge of his agency; and only the balance, if any be due to the factor, may be reclaimed by the principal."

It was held in Golden v. Levy (1814) 4 N. C. (1 Car. L. Repos. 527) 6 Am. Dec. 555, to be a well-established rule of law that a sale by a factor created a contract between the owner and the purchaser, and a payment by the purchaser to the factor for the goods sold would protect him from the demand of the owner, unless the latter had forbidden the vendee to pay the factor.

In Adams v. Fraser (1897) 27 C. C. A. 108, 49 U. S. App. 481, 82 Fed. 211, wherein it appeared that a factor was authorized only to conclude an agreement for the transfer of certain patent rights, to take place in the future, and payment to be made at the time of the transfer, the court held that immediately upon the execution of the agreement of sale the factor's duty was performed and his authority at an end, and that he had no authority to subsequently collect the purchase price, stating the rule as follows: "A factor who has the possession of property, or who has assignments of it, or other indicia of authority to transfer it, has implied power to receive the purchase price for the vendor when he sells and delivers the property, or the title deeds to it. . . . But a broker or other agent to sell property, who has concluded a contract of sale which is to be performed by a delivery of the property, or the title deeds to it, and the simultaneous payment of the purchase price at some future time, and who is not intrusted with the possession of the property, or of the conveyances of it, has no implied authority to collect the purchase price, or to extend its time of payment, or to otherwise modify the contract between the vendor and the purchaser."

And in Sykes v. Giles (1839) 5 Mees. & W. 645, 151 Eng. Reprint, 273, 9 L. J. Exch. N. S. 106, wherein it appeared that by the terms of a contract of sale made by an auctioneer he was authorized to receive a certain percentage of the purchase price as a deposit, the court held that his authority extended no further, for as soon as the sale had taken place and the deposit money paid, the authority of the auctioneer was at an end, and he had no implied authority to subsequently receive a payment of the remainder of the purchase price.

See also Drinkwater v. Goodwin (1775) Cowp. pt. 1, p. 256, 98 Eng. Reprint, 1072, wherein the court said: "A factor who receives cloths, and is authorized to sell them in his own name, but makes the buyer debtor to himself, though he is not answerable for the debts, yet he has a right to receive the money; his receipt is a discharge to the buyer, and he has a right to bring an action against him, to compel the payment." The instant case involved, however, the right of a factor to impress a lien on the price of goods in the hands of the buyer.

MRS. JENNIE HARDENBERGH.

Insurance — accident — freezing — catching foot.

A provision in an insurance policy limiting the recovery in case the accidental injury causing the loss, or the loss itself, results from freezing sustained by the insured while not engaged in his occupation, applies to the death of a hunter who catches his foot in a hole while wading in water on a cold day, and is subsequently found with his body frozen stiff and the water frozen around it.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Copiah County (Miller, J.) in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover an amount alleged to be due on an accident insurance policy. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. R. N. & H. B. Miller, Murphy O. Tate, G. Q. Whitfield, Manton Maverick, Martin P. Cornelius, and George R. Sanderson, for appellant:

The evidence conclusively shows that the death of the deceased was due to freezing while not engaged in his occupation, as provided within the policy, and the court erred in its refusal to direct a verdict for $125 as requested by the defendant.

Mr. M. S. McNeil for appellee.

Sykes, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellee, plaintiff in the circuit court, sued and recovered a judgment against the appellant for $1,000 for the death of her son, Levy Hardenbergh, as the beneficiary under the conditions and clauses of an accident insurance policy issued by the appellant company to the deceased. The material parts of this policy are as follows:

"The Continental Casualty Company—Incorporated by the state of Indiana as a stock company. Old Line Plan. General Office, Chicago, Illinois (hereinafter called the company),—in consideration of the warranties and agreements contained in the application hereof and the payment of premium as therein provided, does on this 24th day of December, A. D., 1917, hereby insure Mr. Levy Hardenbergh (hereinafter called the insured) in class Spl. — of the company, as a water service man, in the principal sum of $1,000, with weekly indemnity of $10, and subject to the conditions hereinafter specified promises to pay to the insured or to his beneficiary, Jennie Hardenbergh, his mother, indemnity as scheduled below, in the event that said insured, while this policy is in force, shall receive personal, bodily injury, which is effected directly and independently of all other causes through external, violent, and purely accidental means (suicide, sane or insane, not included), and which causes at once total and continuous inability to engage in any labor or occupation, and provided that neither such injury nor inability is in consequence of nor contributed to by any bodily or mental defect, disease, or infirmity of the insured.

“Specific indemnity.

“Part I. If, within ninety days from the date of the accident, any one of the following losses shall result necessarily and solely from such injury as is before described, the company will pay in lieu of any other indemnity and within ninety days from the furnishing of proof: A. For loss of life, said principal sum.

“Part III. A. In any of the losses covered by this policy and specified in parts I. or II., . . . or (3) where either the accidental injury causing the loss or the loss itself results from any poison, asphyxiation, or gas, or from fits, vertigo, somnambulism or intoxication, or from sunstroke or freezing sustained by the insured while not engaged in his occupation; . . . then and in all cases referred to in this paragraph A of part III. the amount payable shall be one eighth of the amount which otherwise would be payable under this policy, anything in this policy to the contrary notwithstanding, and subject otherwise to all the conditions in this policy contained.”

This policy was in effect at the time of the death of the insured.

The facts relating to the death are undisputed, and present a very pathetic picture. The insured went duck hunting on the morning of December 28, 1917, at a small station on the Illinois Central Railroad a few miles north of New Orleans, named La Branche. There was a hunting clubhouse at this place, and the keeper upon parting with the deceased that morning agreed to meet him at a certain point at 5 o'clock in the afternoon. The hunting ground was over a marshy swamp practically covered with water. The deceased wore hip boots and carried his gun and ammunition. It was a very cold day, and the wind was blowing almost a gale during the day. The thermometer stood at about 10 degrees above zero. The deceased failed to keep his appointment that afternoon with the lodge keeper. A fruitless search was made by the keeper and others for the deceased until midnight that night. Signal lights were also displayed to guide the deceased to his place of destination. The next morning a party of searchers was led to the body of the deceased by a hunting dog which belonged to the gamekeeper, but had accompanied the deceased on the hunt. The deceased was lying on his back dead about 150 yards from the agreed meeting point with the gamekeeper. The water around his body had frozen. His face and the upper part of his body were not submerged, however. The body itself was frozen stiff. The left leg was sunk to the knee in a hole of some kind, and there was some little trouble in extricating it. There were one or two empty shells near the body, indicating that the deceased had fired his gun after getting his foot caught in this hole. About a mile from the body was found a string of twenty-one ducks evidently killed by the deceased in his hunt of that day. The undisputed testimony shows that the body of the deceased was frozen stiff, and that the water around his body had become frozen, and the ice had to be broken before it could be moved. The faithful dog had remained with the deceased all night, and the dog hair upon the clothing of the deceased showed that the dog had slept on the chest of the deceased.

It was the contention of the appellee in the lower court, and is his contention here, that it was a question of fact to be decided by the jury whether or not the proximate cause of the death of the deceased was getting his foot caught and mired up in the hole. The jury adopted this theory and returned a verdict in favor of the appellee for $1,000.

The appellant contends that the uncontradicted testimony shows that the deceased met his death by freezing, and that under the terms of the policy above set out only one eighth of the principal sum can be recovered. The insuring clause of this policy provides that where the insured shall receive personal injury which is effected directly and independently of all other causes, etc. Under part III. caption "Special indemnities," and eliminating those parts not material to this issue, clause 3 reads as follows: "Where either the accidental injury causing the loss or the loss itself results from . . . freezing sustained by the insured while not engaged in his occupation."

Under this clause the insurer is liable for only one eighth of the amount of the policy: First, where the injury causing the loss results from freezing; or, second, where the loss itself results from freezing. This clause of the policy is plain and unambiguous. It is a valid and binding clause. The parties to the contract were sui juris and had the right to make a contract with this clause therein. The uncontradicted facts in this case conclusively show that the death was the result of freezing, and under the plain terms of the insurance contract above set out the recovery must be limited to one eighth of the principal amount. Judgment will be entered here in favor of the appellee for this sum, namely, $125, with interest.

Insurance—accident—
freezing—catching foot.

The judgment of the lower court is reversed, and judgment entered here for the appellee.

ANNOTATION.

Liability under accident policy for injury or death from freezing.

It will be observed that in the reported case (CONTINENTAL CASUALTY CO. v. HARDENBERGH, ante, 229), a provision was held valid which limited recovery to one eighth of the face of the policy where the accidental injury causing the loss resulted from freezing sustained by the insured while not engaged in his occupation, and that the evidence was held to conclusively show that the insured's death was the result of freezing.

Little authority exists on the question under consideration, but one other case having been disclosed.

In that case, North West. Commercial Travellers' Asso. v. London Guarantee & Acci. Co. (1895) 10 Manitoba

L. R. 537, it was held that the insured, a commercial traveler, met his death as the result of a bodily injury effected through accidental means, and that death was not in consequence of exposure to obvious or unnecessary danger, it appearing that while returning from a trip to see customers the driver lost the trail and the wagon broke down; that the weather turned colder after he started back; that although he was dressed as warmly as his driver he was so numb with cold that he was unable to walk the remaining 8 miles, or to ride on horseback; that the driver returned on horseback and sent a rescuing party, which lost their way in the storm, and that when the insured was found by a second party he was frozen to death. Dubuc, J., said: "Now, as to its being caused by accidental means, it was argued by the defense that Church's death was occasioned by his own voluntary act or negligence in exposing himself to obvious and unnecessary danger. They contend that he should have gone to Macleod on horseback with the driver, or should have walked between the horses to keep himself from freezing. But the evidence shows that when he was invited by the driver to ride on one of the horses, he stated that he could not do it, but could walk; and after having tried he declared that he could not. The driver told him to keep moving and stamping to keep warm until he got back from Macleod, and he replied that he would. The driver then left him. He was found the next morning frozen to death. No doubt that he was already benumbed by cold and could hardly help himself. It is shown by the evidence that he was sufficiently clad to be protected from an ordinary cold, and the defense does not charge any negligence in driving through the prairie on that day. But after their starting the weather became colder and the wind blew and drifted the snow, and the driver lost the trail. Then the wagon broke down and they could not proceed any further with it. Now Church died either by natural death, or by a voluntary or suicidal one, or by accidental means. Death by freezing cannot be said to be a death by natural causes. There is nothing in the evidence to show, or even to create, the least suspicion that he intended or desired to end his life.

Everything points out that his death was accidental. An accident is defined to be 'an event happening without a concurrence of the will of the person by whose agency it was caused,' or 'any event that takes place without one's foresight or expectation,' and, again, 'the happening of an event without the aid and the design of the person, and which is unforeseen.' Church's death, according to the evidence, did certainly happen without a concurrence of his will, without his foresight or expectation, without his aid and design, and was clearly unforeseen. It was by accident that the weather grew colder, that the snow drifted by the wind covered the track and made the driver lose the trail; it was by accident that the wagon broke down and could not be used to proceed with the journey. It was by accident that Church was so benumbed by cold that he could neither walk nor drive the 8 or 9 miles remaining to be made to reach Macleod. It was by accident that while awaiting there the return of the driver or other persons to rescue him, he became insensible by cold and was frozen to death. He cannot be charged with exposing himself to obvious or unnecessary danger. He was in the exercise of his calling and occupation in traveling from one post to another with his samples of merchandise. When he started in the morning he had no reason to anticipate that the cold would grow stronger, with a higher wind, that the trail would be lost and the wagon broken. All these things occurred by accident."

W. S. BULLOCK, Circuit Judge, et al.

(— Fla. —, 82 So. 866.)

Courts — power to order railroad dismantled.

1. A circuit court in this state has no jurisdiction in a suit brought by a trustee against a common carrier railroad company to foreclose a trust deed upon the properties of such railroad company, given to the trustee to secure the payment of the indebtedness of the railroad company, without the assent of the state, to order the railroad dismantled, its properties sold and removed, and its operation as a common carrier discontinued.

Railroad — right to abandon.

mantled by a proceeding in which the state and the public are not represented, when such discontinuance and dismantling have not been consented to by the state.

[See 22 R. C. L. 908.]

APPLICATION for a writ of prohibition to require the respondent judge to show cause why a writ should not issue, forbidding him to enter an order in a certain cause, confirming the sale of the property of the defendant as junk to be dismantled, and from authorizing the dismantling or removal of the rails or tracks of said defendant, and from exercising further jurisdiction relating to the dismantling of the property. Demurrer to petition overruled and writ issued.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Mr. Dozier A. De Vane, for petitioners:

The circuit court is without jurisdiction in a suit brought, to foreclose a mortgage, to decree dismantling of a carrier's property, for the mere purpose of satisfying to better advantage the lien of a creditor of the carrier.

Hadley v. Bernero, 103 Mo. App. 549, 78 S. W. 64; Holland v. State, 15 Fla. 455.

West, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Upon a suggestion and petition for a writ of prohibition, a rule to show cause was issued by this court. It is made to appear that suit was brought in the circuit court of Marion county by William S. Hood, as trustee, against the Ocklawaha Valley Railroad Company, a corporation. The object of the suit was to foreclose a certain trust deed given by the railroad company, conveying all properties owned by it to said trustee for the purpose of securing to Assets Realization Company, a corporation, the payment of certain indebtedness of said railroad company to said Assets Real- zation Company. The bill of complaint, which is in the usual form, was filed December 10, 1917. On the following day the defendant filed its answer, admitting the allegations of the bill, and, upon motion of solicitors for complainant, an order was made appointing a receiver for all the properties of the defendant described in the trust deed. Thereafter both the bill and answer were amended in unimportant particulars, and by agreement the cause was submitted, without testimony, upon bill and answer and certain affidavits in behalf of complainant. On December 24, 1917, a final decree in favor of complainant was entered.

In the final decree it was ordered that the properties of the defendant covered by said trust deed "be sold on a legal sale day at public auction, at public outcry to the highest and best bidder, in front of the courthouse door in said county of Marion, state of Florida, and at such sale the master herein appointed is hereby instructed to first offer (1) all the property included herein to be held, used, and operated as a common carrier of goods and passengers from Silver Springs, Florida, to Palatka, Florida, and if as much as $200,000 is bid under such first offering herein provided for, the master will not offer the same for sale under the second offering herein provided for; otherwise he will immediately thereafter, on the same day and at the same place, (2) offer all of said property for the purpose of and with the privilege on the part of the purchaser of dismantling the same, and that unless the bid received under the second offering herein provided for shall exceed by $100,000 the bid received under the first offering herein provided for, in the event any bid is made under the said first offering, then in that event it will be the duty of the said master to accept the highest bid made under the first offering herein provided for; but if no bid is made the first offering, or the bid under the second offering herein provided exceeds by $100,000 the bid made under the first offering, then the said master shall accept the highest bid made under the second offering, and the said master shall report his doings in this behalf to the court."

The master was, by said decree, directed, upon making sale of said properties, to execute a deed therefor to the purchaser, pay the costs incurred in the suit, all taxes properly assessed against such properties, and out of the remainder of the proceeds of the sale to pay to the complainant, as trustee, the amount due by the defendant to Assets Realization Company.

Subsequently, other proceedings were had in said cause not necessary to be recited here. The state, by the Florida Railroad Commission, from time to time during such proceedings, asked leave to intervene and be made a party to said suit, but was not permitted to do so, and was not formally made a party until March 27, 1919.

In the meantime, and after having been by order of court for various reasons from time to time postponed, the sale of said property was made by the special master on February 3, 1919. At the sale there was no bid under subdivision 1 of the quoted paragraph of the final decree for the property to be operated as a common carrier. There was a bid under subdivision 2 of the quoted paragraph of the final decree for the property with the privilege of dismantling it and ceasing to operate the said railroad as a common carrier, which bid was accepted, and the sale and proceedings of the special master reported to the court.

Upon exceptions to the master's report and a motion for confirmation of the sale after an extended recital of the proceedings in the cause, and at the request of counsel, the court, by its order dated May 5, 1919, fixed a day when an order would be made confirming the sale and directing the execution of a deed to the purchaser, and further directing that upon the consummation of the sale the railroad be dismantled and the receiver discharged. The purpose in fixing a day for the making of such order, so it is recited, was to give opportunity to the receiver and the Railroad Commission to take such further action in the matter as seemed to them to be necessary and proper.

On May 10, 1919, two days before the day fixed by the court for the entry of its order confirming the sale and permitting the dismantling of the road, upon suggestion and petition to this court, a rule was issued as prayed, requiring the circuit judge to show cause why a writ of prohibition should not issue forbidding him to enter an order in said cause confirming the sale of the property of said defendant railroad company as junk to be dismantled, and from authorizing or decreeing the dismantling, taking up, or removing any of the rails or tracks of said carrier, or from exercising any further jurisdiction in said cause relating to the junking or dismantling of said property.

By demurrer to the suggestion and petition the question is presented of whether a circuit court in this state has jurisdiction in a suit in which the state is not a party, brought by a trustee against a common carrier railroad company to foreclose a trust deed upon the properties of such railroad company, given to the trustee to secure the payment of the indebtedness of the railroad company, and in such suit order the railroad dismantled, its properties sold and removed, and its operation as a common carrier discontinued.

This question must be answered in the negative upon the theory that the operation of a common carrier railroad is a business so affected with a public interest that when once undertaken and begun it cannot be discontinued and the road so operated dismantled and abandoned by a proceeding in which the state and the public are not represented. By the acceptance of its charter from the state such a company is permitted to exercise certain rights not enjoyed by individuals. It is given certain of the attributes of sovereignty itself, such as the power of eminent domain. It likewise is charged with the performance of certain public duties, namely, the duties of a common carrier. While it is constructed by private capital and is primarily controlled by individual effort, it is a public instrumentality, subject in its operation to regulation by public authority. Accordingly, therefore, the public has such an interest in the operation of such a road that, when once undertaken, it may not be discontinued by a proceeding in which the state is not represented, when such discontinuance has not been consented to by the state. 22 R. C. L. p. 750; State ex rel. Naylor v. Dodge City, M. & T. R. Co. 53 Kan. 377, 42 Am. St. Rep. 295, 36 Pac. 747; Gates v. Boston & N. Y. Air Line R. Co. 53 Conn. 333, 5 Atl. 695; People ex rel. Hubbard v. Colorado Title & T. Co. — Colo. —, 178 Pac. 6; Brooks-Scanlon Co. v. Railroad Commissioner, 144 La. 1086, P.U.R.1919E, 1, 81 So. 727.

In the case of State ex rel. Naylor v. Dodge City, M. & T. R. Co. 53 Kan. 377, 42 Am. St. Rep. 295, 36 Pac. 747, the supreme court of Kansas, in discussing a similar question, said: "Railroads, like all other public thoroughfares, are public instrumentalities. The power to construct and maintain railroads is granted to corporations for a public purpose. The right to exercise the very high attributes of sovereignty, the power of eminent domain and of taxation, to further the construction of railways, could not be granted to aid a purely private enterprise. The railway corporation takes its franchises subject to the burden of a duty to the public to carry out the purposes of the charter. The road, when constructed, becomes a public instrumentality, and the roadbed, superstructure, and other permanent property of the corporation, are devoted to the public use. From this use neither the corporation itself, nor any person, company, or corporation deriving its title by purchase, either at voluntary or judicial sale, can divert it without the assent of the state. It matters not whether the enterprise as an investment be profitable or unprofitable; the property may not be destroyed without the sanction of that authority which brought it into existence. Without legislative sanction, railroads could not be constructed. When once constructed, they may only be destroyed with the sanction of the state."

Courts—power to order railroad dismantled.

This, we think, is the true rule. In the instant case, as may be observed from the statement, the state was not made a party to the suit until after the decree of foreclosure had been entered and the sale of the property made, when the Railroad Commission was permitted to intervene and be made a party. There is no contention that the consent of the state to the discontinuance of the road had been secured. On the contrary, it is alleged in the suggestion and petition that, upon application by the railroad company to the Railroad Commission, consent to the discontinuance of operation of its road had been denied.

It follows that the portion of the decree of foreclosure authorizing the dismantling of the road was in excess of the jurisdiction of the court.

The demurrer to the suggestion and petition is overruled, and the peremptory writ of prohibition will be issued, unless the respondent files a plea or answer within thirty days.

Taylor, Ellis, and Whitfield, JJ., concur.

Browne, Ch. J., absent and not participating.

Whitfield, J., concurring:

A common carrier railroad company is a corporate entity with franchise rights and obligations, and its property is devoted to a public service which is continuous under the laws of the state. The franchise rights of the corporation may be forfeited to the state; but the corporation cannot lawfully dismantle its roadbed of ties and rail and withdraw the property that has been devoted to the public service, without the acquiescence of the state in some manner prescribed by law.

While a court of equity may enforce a mortgage lien on the property of a railroad corporation by a sale of the property, the court has no authority to order or permit the track and other property of the company to be withdrawn or removed from the public service to which it was devoted, except as may be prescribed by statute; and there is no statute in this state giving such authority to the courts or to other tribunals.

Mortgage contracts cannot give to the courts a power not conferred by law. In this case the contract lien is upon the property of the railroad company as an operating entity charged with the public duty; and the lien can give no right to destroy the operating character of the property in which the public have an interest; nor can the right of the mortgagees be enforced except pursuant to law. If the mortgage lien contracted for is ineffectual to secure the indebtedness, the mortgagee cannot justly complain, since the lien was taken under the law governing the subject-matter of the lien.

The court was without power to order a sale of the railroad company's track and property as junk, thereby destroying the public use of the corporate property, and the writ of prohibition should be made effective.

Petition for rehearing denied October 30, 1919.

ANNOTATION.

Power of court to authorize discontinuance of public service corporation upon foreclosing a mortgage on its plant.

It is not altogether clear from the decision in the reported case (STATE EX REL. RAILROAD COMRS. v. BULLOCK, ante, 232) whether the court there proceeds upon the theory that there was no jurisdiction to order the abandonment of the railway because the consent of the state, through its railroad commission, had not been obtained, or whether it was merely because the state had not been made a party to the foreclosure proceedings. There is considerable difference between the effect of these theories. If the decision denying the jurisdiction is based upon the latter theory, jurisdiction might be obtained by making the state a party to the proceedings,—assuming that there is the right to sue the state. But if the decision is based upon the theory that a railroad cannot be abandoned without the consent of the state, either directly or through its railroad commission, an entirely different situation is presented. The latter is the theory of People ex rel. Hubbard v. Colorado Title & T. Co. (1918) — Colo. —, 178 Pac. 6, where it is held that a court has no jurisdiction, in foreclosing a mortgage on the railroad, to order its abandonment without the consent of the state, or a public utilities commission to which this question has been delegated. The court holds that the statute of that state confers upon the Public Utilities Commission exclusive jurisdiction to determine whether a railroad company may abandon service upon and dismantle a railroad lying wholly within the state, and holds further that the statute which gave the Commission jurisdiction over receivers appointed by any court whatsoever subjected a receiver appointed by a court in a foreclosure proceeding to the same control as the railroad before the appointment of the receiver. It was accordingly held that the court in the foreclosure proceedings had no jurisdiction to order a junking of the railroad. The statute conferring upon the Public Utilities Commission the above jurisdiction was sustained over the objection to its constitutionality that it conferred judicial power upon the Commission, it being held that a determination of the fact whether a railroad company should discontinue service and dismantle its road is not the exercise of judicial power in a constitutional sense.

It is the general theory of both of the foregoing cases that the state has an interest to be considered in determining upon the abandonment of a railroad. This is a general theory that runs through all the cases. The majority of cases, although adhering to this theory, sustain the jurisdiction of a court in a foreclosure action to order the abandonment of the road. Thus, where the state is represented in the foreclosure proceedings by its attorney general, it has been held that a Federal court has jurisdiction to dispose of the property of a street railway company in any reasonable way which may be for the best interests of the mortgagee, and, if necessary, may order a sale under such circumstances as will permit the purchaser to dismantle the road as a railway and dispose of the property as junk. New York Trust Co. v. Portsmouth & E. Street R. Co. (1911) 192 Fed. 728. With reference to the public interest to have the operation of the road continued, the court, after stating that in some cases there has been a refusal to compel railroad companies to operate their roads at a loss, on the theory that it deprives the owners of their property without compensation, says that "other cases suggest the idea that the public interest is somewhat involved; but perhaps the better view would be that the public interest is one of the principal questions to be considered. Under this view it will become necessary that the plan of sale must be so arranged as to first enable the public or members of the public to buy the road as a going concern at a sum considerably less than an upset price based upon the value of the materials sold under such authority and conditions as will permit the road to be dismantled."

In Gilchrist v. Waycross Street & Suburban R. Co. (1917) 246 Fed. 952, an action to enjoin the purchasers of a street railway at a mortgage foreclosure from dismantling the property and abandoning the operation thereof, the court, in denying the injunction, and in answer to the contention that the purchasers could not be relieved of the burden of continuing the operation of the road without the consent of the state, and that the courts have no power to give such assent, says: "We may concede all this to be true, but it does not follow in every case that the court is lacking in jurisdiction to enforce its decree because an incidental effect may be to put it out of the power of a street railway to operate its lines in a particular city under a permissive grant by virtue of a charter obtained under the general state law.

. . . The street railway company had the authority to mortgage all of its property for corporate purposes. A decree of foreclosure by sale would amount to nothing if the conditions were such that the railroad must be operated by the purchaser at foreclosure sale where the railroad could not be operated without loss. No purchaser would buy under compulsion of operating a street railroad at a loss, and unless the court under such circumstances could sell the physical property with the right of removal, the mortgage lien as well as the debt would be destroyed. . . . Under these circumstances, a court of equity had jurisdiction of the subject-matter and its decree is not void. To hold otherwise is to say that a mortgage creditor of an insolvent street railway company could never realize on his security by a sale of it if the circumstances are such that the railroad cannot be operated except at a loss, and the purchaser be compelled to operate the same."

In South Carolina ex rel. Cunningham v. Jack (1906) 76 C. C. A. 165, 145 Fed. 281, where the court ordered the dismantling of a railroad and the sale of the iron rails, rolling stock, etc., in an action in which the state was not a party, the court subsequently refused to order the reconstruction of the railroad in a suit by the state. This case is approved in Central Bank & T. Corp. v. Cleveland (1918) — C. C. A. —, 252 Fed. 530, where the court ordered the discontinuance of a road upon the mortgage foreclosure.

In Gasser v. Garden Bay R. Co. (1919) — Mich. —, 171 N. W. 791, the owners of the railway, in their answer to the bill for foreclosure, asked the court to authorize abandonment of the railroad and decree that it might be dismantled and its steel sold as personal property. It is stated that the decision of the trial court that it had in the foreclosure proceedings jurisdiction to entertain this application to abandon operations and dismantle the line was not questioned in the appellate court. The mortgage sought to be foreclosed contained a provision that the mortgagees might enforce collection of the indebtedness by dismantling the road if that was necessary. At the time the mortgage was given the railroad company was a private, unincorporated logging road, and was held to no legal obligation as a common carrier, and it is stated that the subsequent incorporation of the road and its assumption of the obligations of a common carrier could not affect vested rights under the prior mortgage. Speaking of the duty of continuing the road, the court states that while the objectors to the abandonment may not be legally or equitably entitled to require that the operation of the road be continued at a loss, the court may, for preservation of that public function, give them an opportunity to bid for the same at the foreclosure sale on such conditions before authorizing the road to be dismantled and abandoned.

The question whether a court in a foreclosure proceeding has a right to sell the property of the railroad company as personal property and abandon the operation of the road is not expressly decided in Royal Trust Co. v. Washburn, B. & I. R. Co. (1902)

113 Fed. 531. It is, however, the assumption of that case that the court has jurisdiction, but as to the correctness of the judgment the court does not decide, saying that if the judgment "was an error, the court had jurisdiction to commit the error." The judgment in this case was modified on other grounds in (1905) 71 C. C. A. 579, 139 Fed. 865, where the court did not decide the question under annotation.

Some cases, while admitting that there is a public interest which must be considered in ordering the abandonment of a railroad, do not go to the extent of holding that the assent of the state must be obtained. Where there is no contract obligation to maintain a railway, it is held that the operation of a railroad cannot be compelled when it appears that it cannot be operated except at a loss. Under this theory some courts in foreclosure proceedings have directed that the question whether the road can be operated except at a loss be determined, and if it appears that it cannot, have ordered that the road be sold, with the right to the purchaser to abandon its operation. Potter Matlock Trust Co. v. Warren County (1919) 182 Ky. 840, 207 S. W. 709. A street railway was involved in this case, and the county and city in which the railroad operated were parties to the foreclosure proceedings. In the original action the question whether the road could be operated at a reasonable profit had not been determined; accordingly, the court ordered a further test of this question. It was first directed that the property should be offered for sale as a going concern at an upset price, with an obligation upon the part of the purchaser to continue its operation, and if no purchaser could be found at this price and under these conditions, then the court directed that the railway should be put in the hands of a receiver, to be operated for a year without incurring any expense in excess of the income of the property, and if, at the expiration of the year, it was found that the road could not be operated so as to yield a reasonable profit to the owners, an order should be made permitting the owners or trustees for the bondholders, as the case might be, to sell the road in any manner they pleased and for any price that suited them, with the right on the part of the purchaser to take up the tracks and other equipment and abandon the road upon leaving the streets and highways in as good condition as the remainder of the adjacent streets and roads. The power of the court to grant this relief is not expressly considered in this case.

In Iowa v. Old Colony Trust Co. (1914) L.R.A.1915A, 549, 181 C. C. A. 581, 215 Fed. 307, it was held that a court which, through its receiver, had taken possession of a system of railroads in a suit to foreclose a mortgage upon it, might order the abandonment of a branch of the road which was unproductive and dilapidated, and imperiled the continuance of the system, where no funds were available for putting it in condition to operate. The petition for abandonment seems to have asked for the abandonment pending the foreclosure action, and there was not an order that the property should be sold with the right in the purchaser to abandon the property. The court, after stating that a railroad corporation is, in an important sense, a public corporation, and dependent upon the public for its franchises to exist and carry on business, and that, in consideration of these franchises, it assumes and must perform certain duties and obligations for the benefit of the public, among which, as a general rule, is the duty of maintaining its entire line of road in a reasonably safe and operative condition, states that there are some conditions which necessarily excuse full compliance with the requirements of these rules, and that the case at bar afforded a striking example of such conditions which justify an abandonment. The court then states that the principle justifying an abandonment seems especially applicable to railroads organized under and subject to the laws of the state of Iowa, as in that state authority is directly conferred to change or remove a line of road after it has been permanently located and constructed. A provision of the Iowa statute was to the effect that any railroad company desiring to change or remove the line of its road might file a petition in the district court in any county wherein the change or removal was proposed to be made, and it was contended that the state court was the only tribunal authorized to grant this relief. In answer to this contention, the court states that "we have already seen that on a state of facts such as disclosed by the pleadings and proof in this case, any railroad company would have been justified, on general principles of the common law, in abandoning a part of its road in similar condition to that sought to be abandoned in this case, and without doubt could have received judicial sanction for such abandonment at common law, irrespective of any statute. The prayer for general relief in this case is quite sufficient to enable the court to grant all proper relief, whether the right be based on statute or common law." Speaking particularly of the jurisdiction of the Federal court to order the abandonment of a portion of the road, the court, referring to the dilapidated, worn-out condition of the portion abandoned, and to the fact that the continued operation of this portion imperiled the operation of the more important parts of the system, says: "In these circumstances what could the court, charged with the duty of caring for and protecting the whole property, have done except order the abandonment of the steam line and the sale of its salvage? . . . We think the court not only had the power to make the order complained of in the foreclosure suit, but that its exercise under all the facts and conditions of this case was wise and for the best interests of all concerned."

The Indiana Public Service Commission refused to order the continuance of the operation of a railroad sold under a judgment in foreclosure, which ordered the property to be disposed of without limitation, restriction, or condition of any kind, where the road was not earning enough to pay operating expenses, and would be unable to do so if passenger rates were increased 2½ cents per mile and freight rates increased 20 per cent. Dunbar v. Bluffton, G. & C. Traction Co. (Ind.) P.U.R. 1918B, 670. In the opinion it is stated that the court which entered the judgment of foreclosure had jurisdiction of the subject-matter and of the parties, and determined the rights of the parties in the controversy, and that when a court has jurisdiction and has determined the rights of the parties, an administrative commission or another court has no authority to take jurisdiction and render a contrary decision. A similar decision appears in Re Lake Erie, B. G. & N. R. Co. (Ohio) P.U.R. 1916F, 553, where it was held that a public utility commission could not require the continuation of operation of a railroad in possession of a purchaser at a judicial foreclosure sale, who, not having yet paid the purchase price, is reselling the property piecemeal and carrying the proceeds into court under orders which probably gave him the right to dismantle the property, or, if not giving such right, expressly retained jurisdiction in the court to determine all undisposed-of questions.

In Boisot v. Amarillo Street R. Co. (1917) 244 Fed. 838, where the trustee under a mortgage and the receiver appointed in a foreclosure proceeding did not ask that the franchise of the street railway be sold, believing the same to be of no value, and taking it for granted that the purchaser would prefer to tear up the tracks, the court said that it was by no means certain that such a course would be thought advisable by the purchaser, but, without determining any question of the right of the city to demand that the purchaser continue to operate the cars in compliance with the franchise obligation, ordered the sale of the property and franchises to be made without prejudice to such right as the city might have in the premises.

ERROR to the Court of Appeals for Shelby County to review a judgment affirming a judgment of the Court of Common Pleas in favor of plaintiff in a suit brought to enjoin discontinuance of the operation of interurban railroads. Reversed on condition.

Statement by Robinson, J.:

In 1910-11 an interurban railroad was built by the Minster & Loramie Railway Company, between the villages of Minster and Ft. Loramie, a distance of 3 miles. At the same time a street railway was built over certain streets in the village of Ft. Loramie by the same company, under a twenty-five-year franchise granted by the village. No power plant was ever constructed and no rolling stock ever acquired by said company, but said railways were operated under a contract with the Western Ohio Railway Company, which furnished both.

The cost of construction was provided by the issuance of bonds in the sum of $42,700.

In 1914 the Minster & Loramie Railway Company was judicially declared insolvent and placed in the hands of a receiver, owing all its original bonded indebtedness, with interest, and some thousands of dollars additional.

For the purpose of continuing the road in operation, the holders of the bonded indebtedness canceled the bonds. A new bond issue in the sum of $20,000 was made, the bonds being purchased by the First National Bank of New Bremen at $17,000, which paid the indebtedness of the company and lifted the receivership.

The company then operated until 1916, when it was again placed in the hands of a receiver, owing at the time to the First National Bank of New Bremen the face of the bonds, eighteen months' interest, and $1,-630 in addition thereto.

By order of the court the receiver sold all the property of the Minster & Loramie Railway Company to C. P. Gress, acting for the First National Bank of New Bremen, for the sum of $23,000. The bank continued to operate the roads for the period of forty days, pending negotiations looking to their sale. Failing to secure a purchaser, it was about to discontinue the operation of the roads, when the village of Ft. Loramie brought suit against the plaintiffs in error and others to enjoin such discontinuance. Injunction was allowed, affirmed by the court of appeals, and the cause is here upon order of this court to certify the record.

Mr. John Oldham also for defendants in error.

Robinson, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

While some eighteen assignments of error are made in the petition of the plaintiffs in error, the determination of the following legal propositions will decide this case:

(1) Did the ordinance of the village of Ft. Loramie, granting a franchise to the Minster & Loramie Railway Company to construct and operate a street railway in said village, and its acceptance by the company, constitute a contract obligating the company to operate the road for the life of the franchise?

(2) If so, did the First National Bank of New Bremen, by the purchase of said road at judicial sale, assume the obligation to so operate the road?

(3) Had the bank power to assume the obligation?

(4) Can the bank plead its own assumption of a power beyond that granted to it by its charter, for the purpose of avoiding performance of its contract?

(5) Has a chancery court jurisdiction to relieve a public utility from its obligation other than contractual to operate such utility?

The Minster & Loramie Railway Company having first obtained a franchise from the village of Ft. Loramie, which franchise was for a period of twenty-five years, and, among others, contained a provision that "the owner, or owners, of said electric street railway, shall maintain thereon improved passenger cars with all modern conveniences for the comfort of passengers, and such cars shall be run at least as often as the Western Ohio Railway Company, or its successors, lessees, or assigns, shall run its regular passenger cars into the village of Minster, Auglaize county, Ohio, and said cars shall be run at such times as to make direct and immediate connections with all regular passenger cars leaving said village of Minster over what is now known as the Western Ohio Railway," constructed in 1910 a street railway in the village of Ft. Loramie and an interurban railway from the village of Ft. Loramie to Minster, at a cost of $42,700, for all of which it issued bonds. From the date of completion to 1914 it operated the street and interurban railways, under a contract with the Western Ohio Railway Company, as one road, when it became so financially involved that it was judicially declared insolvent and placed in the hands of a receiver.

For the purpose of giving it another trial and saving the service to the public, the bondholders consented to a cancelation of the bonds. A new bond issue was made in the sum of $20,000, and sold to the First National Bank of New Bremen for $17,000, out of which a general indebtedness of some $6,000 was paid, the receivership lifted, and the road continued in operation until 1916, when it, having defaulted in three instalments of interest, having accumulated an additional indebtedness of some $1,600, and having made no improvements or repairs since its original construction, was again declared insolvent and a receiver appointed at the instance and suit of the First National Bank of New Bremen.

Such proceedings were had in such suit that the receiver was ordered to sell the railroad and all the property thereof, including the franchise, as a going concern. At the sale thereof, C. P. Gress, acting for and as agent of the First National Bank of New Bremen, bid the sum of $23,000, and the sale was made to him for the bank for that sum.

Thereafter, the bank undertook to sell the road as a going concern, and pending negotiations continued for a period of forty days to operate the road, when, failing to make a sale as a going concern, it was about to discontinue operation and dismantle the road.

That the bank understood and believed that it had bought all the rights of the Minster & Loramie Railway Company under the franchise is apparent from its own acts in operating the road thereunder, and in attempting to sell it, including the franchise, as a going concern; and the court is disposed to adopt the bank's own interpretation of the scope of the purchase—especially in view of the fact that the sale was made at the instance of the bank and no issue made in that case as to the necessity for discontinuance of operation and dismantling of the road—and to hold that if the purchaser had the power to assume the obligations of the franchise contract that it so did, and that the ordinance granting the franchise, and its acceptance by the Minster & Loramie Railway Company amounted to a contract to operate for twenty-five years.

The power of a national bank to contract to operate a railroad, street, or otherwise, if it exists, must be found in subdivision 7 of § 5136, U. S. Rev. Stat. (13 Stat. at L. 101, Comp. Stat. § 9661, 6 Fed. Stat. Anno. 2d ed. p. 654), which reads: "To exercise by its board of directors, or duly authorized officers or agents, subject to law, all such incidental powers as shall be necessary to carry on the business of banking; by discounting and negotiating promissory notes, drafts, bills of exchange, and other evidences of debt; by receiving deposits; by buying and selling exchange, coin, and bullion; by loaning money on personal security; and by obtaining, issuing, and circulating notes according to the provisions of this title."

The limitation of the power of a national bank to that expressly granted by the statute has been so definitely held by the Federal courts that it would seem that there is nothing that could be added by this court.

In Logan County Nat. Bank v. Townsend, 139 U. S. 67, 35 L. ed. 107, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 496, it was held: "The National Banking Act is an enabling act for associations organized under it, and one cannot rightfully exercise any powers except those expressly granted, or such incidental powers as are necessary to carry on the business for which it was established"—followed in California Nat. Bank v. Kennedy, 167 U. S. 362, 366, 42 L. ed. 198, 200, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 831.

It would not be contended that the bank could have accepted the franchise in the first instance from the village, nor have obligated itself to operate a street railroad or any other kind of a railroad. Upon the suit of any stockholder, a court would have promptly enjoined, and upon the initiative of the United States government its charter would have been revoked. Nor will it be permitted by indirection to do that which it cannot do directly.

In First Nat. Bank v. Converse, 200 U. S. 425, 50 L. ed. 537, 26 Sup. Ct. Rep. 306, it was held: "A national bank has no power to engage in or promote a purely speculative business or to take stock in a corporation organized for that purpose, nor can the power to take such stock as a means of protecting itself from loss on pre-existing indebtedness be inferred from the right to accept it as security for a present loan"—followed in Merchants' Nat. Bank v. Wehrmann, 202 U. S. 295, 301, 50 L. ed. 1036, 1040, 26 Sup. Ct. Rep. 613.

In Cooper v. Hill, 36 C. C. A. 402, 94 Fed. 582, it was held:

"A national bank which has lawfully acquired the title to property in payment of a debt has implied authority to make reasonable repairs thereon for the purpose of putting it in salable condition, and its directors cannot be held personally liable for money so expended in good faith.

"A national bank, however, has no power to prosecute a mining business on property which it has acquired—much less, to expend its funds in prospecting for mineral on such property; and directors who authorize such expenditure are personally liable therefor to the bank or its receiver."

In Cockrill v. Abeles, 30 C. C. A. 223, 86 Fed. 505, 58 U. S. App. 648, it was held in the syllabus: "Where a national bank acquired certain mill property in satisfaction of a debt, and the directors organized a corporation among themselves for the purpose of operating the mills as the bank's agent, using its funds, and operated them for the bank at a loss of $23,000, the directors of the bank participating are liable to the creditors for the loss."

In the opinion, at page 230 of 30 C. C. A., it is stated that "the most liberal view which may be fairly taken of the implied powers of national banks would not sustain their right to engage directly in a manufacturing or business enterprise under any circumstances; but, even if the power in question should be conceded to exist under certain conditions, the present case was not one which warranted its exercise. The directors of the bank had no right to employ its funds in an attempt to operate the cotton mills for the bank's account, in the manner alleged in the bill, and such action on their part was unauthorized and wrongful."

Is the defense of ultra vires available to plaintiff in error the First National Bank of New Bremen?

This proposition, too, has been the subject of repeated decisions of the Federal and other courts.

In First Nat. Bank v. American Nat. Bank, 173 Mo. 153, 72 S. W. 1059, it was held: "When a national bank enters into a contract which is beyond its powers, it cannot be estopped from pleading ultra vires by the performance of the contract by the other party."

operation of railway by

In Merchants' Nat. Bank v. Wehrmann, 202 U. S. 295, 50 L. ed. 1036, 26 Sup. Ct. Rep. 613, it was held:

"While a national bank may take by way of security property in which it is not authorized to invest, and may become the owner thereof by foreclosure in satisfaction of the debt, but, without deciding whether it could take shares in a partnership formed for purely speculative purposes as security, it cannot, even in satisfaction of a debt so secured, become the absolute owner of such shares. It would be ultra vires, and as it cannot take the shares it is not, and cannot be held, liable for any of the debts of the firm.

"A national bank which has taken such shares in satisfaction of a debt is not estopped either from denying that it was a partner or that it is liable for the debts of the firm."

In First Nat. Bank v. Converse, 200 U. S. 425, 50 L. ed. 537, 26 Sup. St. Rep. 306, it was held: "Notwithstanding its subscription, a national bank, taking stock in a corporation organized for purely speculative purposes, may plead its want of authority so to do as a defense to the claim of a receiver of such corporation for the double liability imposed by a state statute on the stockholders thereof."

In California Nat. Bank v. Kennedy, 167 U. S. 362, 363, 42 L. ed. 198, 199, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 831, it was held: "The want of such authority may be set up by a bank to defeat an attempt to enforce against it the liability of a stockholder."

In First Nat. Bank v. Hawkins, 174 U. S. 364, 43 L. ed. 1007, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 739, it was held: "In the case of such an actual purchase by a national bank, it is not estopped to deny its liability, as an apparent stockholder, for an assessment of such stock ordered by the Comptroller of the Currency."

The principle that a national bank has not the power to engage in business, other than banking business, to an extent beyond that necessary to save itself from loss, and the principle that it may plead such lack of power in its own defense, seems to be stare decisis in the Federal courts, and it would be a vain thing for a state court to attempt to overrule them. We are not holding, however, that the court would not be authorized to refuse to confirm a sale that had been made to an organization which could not, because of such lack of power, assume the obligations incident to the purchase, nor that a reviewing court would not be justified in setting such sale aside. This proceeding being wholly independent of the proceeding in which the sale was made, and with different parties plaintiff and defendant, that question is not here for determination.

Had the court, at the time this action was instituted, jurisdiction to authorize the discontinuance of service by the then owners of the road?

Having held that the bank was without power to enter into a contract to operate a railroad as a public utility, and that the defense of ultra vires is available to it, we have the situation of a national bank owning, as a going concern, a street and interurban railroad which had been devoted to the public service, to which the public by reason of such devotion and operation had adjusted its business and social relations, thereby acquiring a right to have the service continued if such service could reasonably be continued without such loss as would amount to confiscation, but the owner of the road being without the power to obligate itself to operate it, and therefore without any contractual obligation to operate it, and, in addition, the power of a court of equity invoked to compel the owner to continue to render such service. Surely the bank had the right in such case to appeal to the same court to relieve it from such implied obligation and to judicially determine its rights as to the future use and disposition of the property.

The court having taken jurisdiction for the purpose of compelling the performance of an obligation will retain jurisdiction for the purpose of hearing the defense thereto, even though to establish such defense it will be necessary to grant affirmative relief and especially where for such affirmative relief there is no adequate remedy at law.

Equity—power to permit discontinuance of railway.

That the road at all times has been unable to earn a fair return on the capital invested must be conceded by everyone. That it has not been self-supporting seems apparent from its history as disclosed by the record. We are therefore of opinion that, independent of the lack of power in the First National Bank of New Bremen to operate the road, its financial history is such that the court ought to authorize the discontinuance of its operation and the dismantling of the road.

We, however, are not disposed to deprive the village of Ft. Loramie and the public of that vicinity of the opportunity to preserve the public service character of the road, nor to allow the bank to take advantage of its own lack of power to fulfil its void contract, and make a profit from the transaction to the detriment of the village and of the public, without first giving all parties in interest an opportunity to purchase the road and assume an obligation to continue its public service operation under the franchise, or such new franchise as the village may have the power and be willing to grant.

The judgment of the Court of Appeals and of the Court of Common Pleas will therefore be reversed, and the plaintiff in error the First National Bank of New Bremen be authorized to discontinue the operation of said road at once. And, in the event that no tender be made said bank of the amount paid by it for said road, with interest, plus the deficits which the bank has obligated itself to pay, if any, within thirty days, by an organization authorized and willing to obligate itself to operate said road under said franchise, or such franchise as the village is willing and empowered to grant, that the First National Bank of New Bremen be authorized to dismantle and sell all the assets of said road.

ANNOTATION.

Power and duty of bank which has acquired a public service plant to continue its operation.

The power of a bank to engage in an ordinary business other than banking has been the subject of many decisions. An extensive search, however, has disclosed no case other than the reported case (GRESS v. FT. LORAMIE, ante, 242) dealing with a public utility. It seems, however, that such a business stands on the same footing as any other with the exception that, in the case of railroads, at least, there is held to be a duty on the part of the owner which passes to and rests upon the purchaser at a judicial sale of the utility as a going concern to continue the business. The court in the reported case refuses to enforce such duty as against a national bank by enjoining the discontinuance, but, because of the lack of power of the bank to operate the railroad, holds the bank entitled to discontinue the road, dismantle it, and sell the assets, where it could not be sold by the bank as a going concern.

In Continental Trust Co. v. Brown (1915) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 179 S. W. 939, where a bank, under its right to act in a trust capacity, was acting as executor, the court states that ordinarily a bank could not own a railroad, but the handling of the stock of the railroad company as executor is quite a different matter.

As may be seen by a reference to some of the cases dealing with other kinds of business, cited in the reported case (GRESS v. FT. LORAMIE), the courts, while recognizing that banks have no power to engage in the ordinary business, have been liberal in allowing banks to rehabilitate property which has been acquired in payment of a debt. See Cooper v. Hill (1899) 36 C. C. A. 402, 94 Fed. 582, discussed in the reported case.

In Emigh v. Earling (1908) 134 Wis. 565, 27 L.R.A. (N.S.) 243, 115 N. W. 128, it is held that a bank which, to recover the debt owing it by a creamery company, takes an assignment of its property and undertakes to carry out its contract to receive the milk of patrons, convert it into butter, deduct a certain portion of the proceeds for its services, and turn the remainder over to the patrons, holds such remainder as the property of the patrons, and cannot refuse to turn over the money, although it has no power to conduct such business.

As indicated in the title, this note is confined to the power and duty of the bank to operate a public service plant, and does not deal with this power as it relates to business generally; hence it is not exhaustive of cases of the class illustrated by Cooper v. Hill and Emigh v. Earling.

RAILROAD COMMISSION OF THE STATE OF CALIFORNIA et al.

Public utilities — sale of water for irrigation.

1. That the owners of land sold under a water system, to whom water is sold for use for irrigation purposes upon their own lands and as an appurtenance thereto, are numerous, does not convert the several private uses into a public use within the control of the Public Service Commission.

— separation of service and consumption.

2. A distributing system used by a water company for the purpose of supplying water for the irrigation of lands sold under the system cannot be considered as a thing separate from the right to receive water, and declared to be a separate and public service, the rate for which can be fixed by the Public Service Commission, and made to exceed the rate specified in the water certificates under which the water is distributed.

Constitutional law — impairing obligation of contract — changing water rate.

3. Landowners having a right to receive for irrigation purposes water from a distribution system under which their lands were purchased have, by reason of the easements and servitudes thereby created, property interests in the system, and the contract fixing the rate for the use of such system cannot, under the contract clause of the Federal Constitution, be changed by the Public Service Commission so as to raise the rate.

4. So far as the increasing of rates of a corporation supplying water for irrigation purposes to those having an easement in the system because of the purchase of their lands thereunder, for the supplying of their quantum of water, inures to the benefit of the public use of other water through the same system, it is an unconstitutional taking of the private property of the owners of such easement for public use without compensation.

Appeal — review of findings of Commission.

5. The finding of a Public Service Commission that a corporation whose rates it attempts to regulate is a public utility goes to the jurisdiction of the Commission, and is therefore subject to review by the courts notwithstanding the statute provides that the finding of the Commission on questions of fact shall be final, where the statute also preserves to the corporation a hearing of the question whether the decision violates any provision of the Constitution.

Public utility — water supply company.

6. A water company, when it undertakes to supply a town site and the succeeding city with water for municipal and domestic purposes, and proceeds to fulfil its undertaking, becomes a public service corporation.

7. A water company does not, by undertaking to furnish a water supply to a municipality which will require only a small percentage of its products, become a public utility as to the remainder which it sells under private contracts.

— claiming to be public utility — effect.

8. A corporation which has sold real estate and undertaken to furnish water for its irrigation does not become a public utility so as to permit the changing of the rates established by its contract of sale by itself fixing the rates and charges for the water which it sells, or by declaring itself to be a public utility, and submitting to the jurisdiction of the Public Service Commission.

—declaration of intent to supply towns with water.

9. A declaration in the charter of a water company which has sold land under contract to supply it with water for irrigation purposes, that it is organized inter alia to supply the inhabitants of towns with water, does not, standing alone, constitute a dedication of all its property to a public use.

Evidence — dedication to public use — presumption.

10. Dedication of property to public use is never presumed without evidence of unequivocal intention.

Constitutional law — impairment of obligation of contract — state Constitution.

11. The state cannot, in view of the contract clause of the Federal Constitution, by its Constitution and laws, place under the control of the Public Service Commission private contracts for the purchase and sale of water for irrigation of land sold by the vendor of the water rights under the express agreement that water will be furnished for its irrigation.

Public utility — definition.

12. To constitute a public utility through the devotion of property to public use, the devotion must be of such character that the public generally, or that part of it which has been served and which has accepted the service, has the right to demand that the service shall be continued so long as it is continued with reasonable efficiency, under reasonable charges.

Constitutional law — construction — declaration of public utility.

13. Constitutional and statutory provisions declaring that every private corporation furnishing water to or for the public, or which sells, rents, or delivers water to any person whatever, under contract or otherwise, is a public utility, must be construed to apply only to corporations which have in fact devoted their property to public use.

(Wilbur, J., dissents.)

PETITION by certain landowners for a writ to review a decree of the Railroad Commission declaring the applicant water company a public utility and fixing water rates to be charged and collected by it. Decree annulled.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. E. E. Keech and Henry Goodsell for petitioners.

Messrs. Douglas Brookman and Max Thelen for Railroad Commission.

Messrs. Oscar Lawler, James E. Degnan, W. A. Purington, William Collier, and H. H. Craig for applicant Water Company.

Messrs. Short & Sutherland and L. L. Cory, amici curiæ.

Messrs. Hunsaker & Britt and Joseph L. Lewinsohn for protestant Hart.

Mr. H. S. Dukes for city of Hemet.

Shaw, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Upon further consideration of this case we adhere to the opinion prepared by Mr. Justice Henshaw and rendered by the court upon the original submission. Some additional treatment of points discussed upon the rehearing is appropriate.

The principal reason for the order granting a rehearing was the desire of the court to re-examine the evidence upon the question of fact whether the Lake Hemet Water Company, at the time it executed to the respective petitioners the water contracts held by them, had dedicated to public use the water which the company thereby agreed to sell and deliver to the holders of the contracts, or whether these contracts were made without such dedication, and in each case for the private advantage of the parties contracting. Further examination on this point has satisfied us that our original conclusion was correct. The water was held in private ownership, it had not been dedicated to public use at the time these several contracts or water certificates were executed, and the right thereby vested in the landowners to whose land the water was thereby made appurtenant was private property.

In the subsequent briefs emphasis is laid on evidence to the effect that in the year 1898, prior to the execution of a large number of the water certificates in question, the water company sold to persons who were not owners or purchasers of any part of the land to which Whittier and his associates intended the water to be applied, an amount of water equal to 50 per cent of its supply for that year. This, it is claimed, was in effect a dedication of that proportion of the water to public use. It is plain from the evidence in the case that these sales were not made with the intent to dedicate that water to public use. They were made solely and only because that year was one of extreme drouth in that vicinity, and as a temporary relief for that time only to outside lands which would otherwise have suffered great damage from the failure of their usual water supply. There was no intention to vary the original plan of applying the water to the land which the managers of the enterprise had for sale, and to none other, except to the extent of any incidental surplus.

In the argument by the attorneys for the Commission great reliance is placed on the decision in Munn v. Illinois, 94 U. S. 113, 24 L. ed. 77, and especially on the phrase, "affected with a public interest," used in the opinion. This case and this phrase are frequently invoked to advance the idea that the general interest of the state in the welfare and prosperity of its citizens is a sufficient basis for the right of the state to regulate prices for the use or sale of private property. Because of the use of this phrase the case itself is misunderstood. The phrase was used in quotations from the old English authorities declaring that there could be public regulation of the tolls to be taken by millers for grinding grain. These millers, having invited all persons to bring their grain to the mill to be ground, and having thus established a business, sought to increase the tolls, or to favor some customers above others, and claimed the right to do so. It was held that, having thus dedicated the mill to this public use, the public had a right or interest in it, and in describing this right it was said that when property was thus "affected with a public interest" it ceases to be exclusively private property. So with the great grain elevators involved in the Munn Case, which, by the development of modern commerce and steam machinery, had become established as an adjunct to railroads, though managed by others, and as practically the only means of shipping grain on the railroads, it was said that they, too, as well as the ancient English mills, had become "affected with a public interest," and were, therefore, no longer private property only, and were subject to public regulation. The parallel is obvious

but it does not apply to water sold with land, for use upon the land, and as an appurtenance thereto, in the manner shown in the present case. The fact that the parties holding separate water rights, each upon his own land, are numerous, does not convert their several private uses into a public use.

There is no ground for the claim that the water distributing system used by the water company can be considered as a thing separate from the right to receive water, and declared to be a separate and public service, the rates —separation of service and consumption.

for which, as to these petitioners, can be fixed by the Railroad Commission, and made to exceed the rates specified in the water certificates. The distributing system is a species of real property. Stanislaus Water Co. v. Bachman, 152 Cal. 726, 15 L.R.A. (N.S.) 359, 93 Pac. 858. The right of a landowner to receive water not devoted to public use upon land for its benefit, from an outside source, through a system of canals or pipes for conducting it to the land, is an easement attached to the land, and a corresponding servitude upon the source of supply and the distributing system. Copeland v. Fairview Land & Water Co. 165 Cal. 154, 131 Pac. 119; Palermo Land & Water Co. v. Railroad Commission, 173 Cal. 386, P.U.R.1917A, 447, 160 Pac. 228. The easement and the servitude constitute a single entity, and the one cannot be separated from the other without destroying both. The petitioners have property interests in the distributing system by reason of these easements and servitudes. The contract fixed the rate, not only for the water as such, but also for its delivery; that is, for the use of the system for that purpose. To raise the rate without consent of the landowner would impair the obligation of the contract, and, so far as the increase inured to the benefit of the public use of other water through the same system, it would be taking the private property of these petitioners for public use without compensation.

It may be that the rates fixed by the contracts with petitioners are too low, and that the company will be unable to go on with the service, either to the public utility serving the town of Hemet or to the petitioners, unless both shall pay more for the service. That will demonstrate that the contracts which the water company voluntarily made for disposition of its own property were improvident and unwise. But that does not give the Railroad Commission power to interfere, however desirable such interference might be if the power were wisely exercised. It is not the guardian of those who do not wisely manage their property.

All the other points that are material or important to the decision of this case are fully and adequately treated in the former opinion. It leaves nothing more to be said and we adopt it as the opinion of the court.

"The Lake Hemet Water Company, a corporation, hereinafter called the applicant, petitioned the Railroad Commission to fix the rates to be charged and collected by it for the sale and distribution of water, asserting itself to be a public service corporation. Some three hundred or more landowners receiving water under contracts from the applicant appeared and made objection, insisting that, so far as their water and water rights were concerned, these rights were held in private ownership, and that as to them at least the applicant was not a public service corporation, and jurisdiction to fix the rate charges for such water was therefore not in the Commission. The Commission heard evidence, made its finding and decree, by which it was declared that the applicant, as to all of its corporate functions, was a public utility, and thereupon fixed water rates. From this determination the aggrieved landowners sought and obtained this writ of review.

"This review is held under § 67 of the Public Utilities Act of 1915. It is plain, and indeed it has in effect been decided, that the declaration in that section that 'findings and conclusions of the Commission on questions of fact shall be final and shall not be subject to review,' has to do with the Commission's determinations upon questions of fact within its jurisdiction. When the question, ever one of mixed law and fact, goes, as here, to the jurisdiction itself, when the whole controversy revolves around the inquiry as to whether or not the corporation is a public utility, to say that the determination of the Commission upon this matter is final and conclusive, and is not subject to review, is the equivalent of denying to a petitioner a hearing upon a right carefully preserved to him by the language of § 67 itself,—a hearing and a determination of whether the order and decision under review

'violates any right of the petitioner under the Constitution of the United States or of the state of California.' So it will be found that in such petitions as Pacific Teleph. & Teleg. Co. v. Eshleman, 166 Cal. 640, 50 L.R.A.(N.S.) 652, 137 Pac. 1119, Ann. Cal. 1915C, 822; Del Mar Water Co. v. Eshleman, 167 Cal. 666, 140 Pac. 591, 948; Title Guarantee & T. Co. v. Railroad Commission, 168 Cal. 295, 142 Pac. 878, Ann. Cas. 1916A, 738; Marin Water & Power Co. v. Railroad Commission, 171 Cal. 706, 154 Pac. 864, Ann. Cas. 1917C, 114; Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Railroad Commission, 173 Cal. 577, 2 A.L.R. 975, P.U.R.1917B, 336, 160 Pac. 828; Western Asso. v. Railroad Commission, 173 Cal. 802, 1 A.L.R. 1455, P.U.R.1917C, 178, 162 Pac. 391,—this court has uniformly and without a dissenting voice investigated every complaint where the petitioners upon reasonable grounds asserted that the Commission had either exceeded its jurisdiction or refused to exercise the jurisdiction which in law it possessed. In the last-cited case the Commission, believing it did not have jurisdiction to entertain the application of the petitioner, refused to do so, and this court, reviewing its powers, held that it did possess this jurisdiction, and issued mandate to the Commission to exercise it. The converse of this proposition must be equally plain. If this court by mandate may compel the Commission to exercise powers which it does possess, upon the other hand it may restrain the Commission from exercising powers which it does not possess, or annul its decree when such unwarranted powers have been exercised.

"Thus we are brought to a consideration of the evidence upon which the Commission acted in holding this plaintiff to be in toto a public service corporation. The evidence, consisting for the most part, and indeed, so far as value is concerned, wholly, of undisputed record and written facts, is without substantial controversy. And indeed it may be added that the pure findings of fact set forth by the Commission are not seriously disputed, petitioners' grievance arising over the conclusion—one of mixed law and fact—that the applicant is wholly a public service corporation.

"Into a Mexico rancho, the San Jacinto Viejo, flows the San Jacinto river. This rancho was partitioned between Estudillo, Stone, Jordan, and others. The allotments to the named persons did not border on the stream, but the partition judgment provided that each of these and their successors should have a right of way for a ditch, flume, or aqueduct across the lands of intervening owners for the purpose of securing and using, upon equal terms with the owners of all other allotments, their due proportion of the waters of the San Jacinto river for irrigation and other purposes in connection with their land. In 1886 the Fairview Land & Water Company was the owner of that portion of the rancho whereat the river entered. In that same year W. F. Whittier and his associates acquired certain rights and asserted certain claims to the waters of the river, and secured a contract from Estudillo for the sale to them of 3,000 acres of his land. The following year Mr. Whittier and his associates simultaneously organized two corporations under the laws of this state,—the Hemet Land Company and the Lake Hemet Water Company. These two corporations were in all essentials under identical ownership and control, with the same stockholders, boards of directors, offices and letterheads. From time to time Mr. Whittier acquired the interests of his associates, and at the time of this hearing, in January, 1916, he was the sole and real owner of both corporations, owning all the stock in equity and all of the stock in law, saving a few shares outstanding and used to qualify the members of his directorates. Sixty per cent of the stock of the Lake Hemet Water Company was originally issued to Mr. Whittier and his associates in consideration of their transfer to the corporation of their interests in the land along and adjacent to San Jacinto river, and of their water, water rights, and claims to water pertaining thereto, and, in addition, of similar rights and claims to the waters of South Fork, North Fork, and Strawberry creek, tributaries of the San Jacinto river. To the Hemet Land Company they conveyed their interests in the lands of Estudillo, Stone, and Jordan which they had acquired, and under the ownership of the Hemet Land Company these lands became known as the Hemet tract. In 1887 Mr. Whittier caused the survey of these lands to be made and recorded. It was known as the 'map of the lands of the Hemet Land Company and of the 3,000-acre Estudillo tract.' This map was adopted by the Hemet Land Company. Upon it a town site embracing 160 acres was delimited, and the Hemet Land Company dedicated the streets and avenues thereon designated and named to public use, reserving therefrom, however, certain rights of way for street cars, steam cars, telegraph lines, sewers, gas conduits, 'flumes and water pipes for domestic use or irrigation purposes.' During this year also the Lake Hemet Water Company and the Fairview Land & Water Company adjusted and settled their conflicting claims to these waters, as will be found adequately set forth in Copeland v. Fairview Land & Water Co. 165 Cal. 148, 131 Pac. 119. The Lake Hemet Water Company in this year carried a pipe line into this 160-acre tract where the town or city of Hemet now is and established a public watering trough therein. Aside from the question of dedication, this was the first actual devotion to public use of any of the waters of the company. Lots were sold in the town site, homes and other structures erected, and the applicant supplied them with water from its system. In 1891 the applicant began the construction of the Hemet dam on South Fork, and completed it in 1895, and contemporaneously constructed a diverting, transmitting, and distributing system to deliver water for irrigation and domestic purposes to, and was at the time of the hearing delivering water upon, practically all of the lands as shown on its official map.

"If it has not already become apparent it soon will be that so far as Mr. Whittier and his associates are concerned, this was a purely private business venture for purposes of legitimate private gain. Vast areas of land in Southern California are valueless (except for grazing purposes) unless artificially supplied with water. Because of this, two methods of meeting the exigencies arose and both came into common use,—the one the method whereby certain landowners associated themselves together and expended money in securing water to be used on their own lands, forming for this purpose a mutual water company; the second, the method here put in practice, whereby men of means—for only men of means could do this thing—secured tracts of land at almost nominal prices (because the land without water had so little value), upon which lands they knew or believed they could put water. They then developed their water system and advertised the lands with appurtenant water rights for sale at a greatly enhanced price. The latter was the method here adopted by Mr. Whittier and his associates. In some of the minor details these companies moved along different plans. In their essentials, however, the methods were the same. Sometimes with the land went proportionate shares of water stock to the purchaser, entitling him to the use of a given amount of water on his land. Sometimes the land and water rights were held by a single corporation, and the conveyance of the land in express terms carried with it the right to the use of a given quantum of water. Mr. Whittier and his associates, soon after the official map of the Hemet Land Company was approved, began to advertise and sell these lands, and the practice is set forth in the finding of the Commission as follows: "The testimony shows that, with possible minor exceptions all water regularly sold by petitioner for irrigation (as distinguished from "extra water") was sold to persons who are owners of water-right certificates issued by petitioner. Under the plan originally formulated by Mr. Whittier and his associates, owning both Hemet Land Company and Hemet Land & Water Company, whenever a parcel of land was sold by Hemet Land Company the purchaser of such land desiring water thereon was obliged to purchase a water-right certificate from Hemet Land & Water Company. Later, when other lands were purchased by Mr. Whittier and his associates, in addition to the original Hemet tract, a similar arrangement was made. The land company sold the land and the water company sold so-called "water certificates." These certificates entitled the holder to 1 miner's inch of water for 8 acres of land.'

"On the average these land purchasers paid \$75 per acre for their land and \$75 per acre for their water rights appurtenant to their land. The company issued prospectuses in 1887, 1902, and 1906, each prospectus in similar language declaring that 'each purchaser of land in the Hemet tract is provided with a contract calling for both a domestic and irrigation supply of water. Domestic water is free during the irrigation season, and \$1 per month for each family the remaining five months. The irrigation supply costs \$2 per acre per annum. Each acre of land under this contract is entitled to  $\frac{1}{8}$  of a miner's inch of water, continuous flow, during the irrigation season. That is, the water right is inseparable and is only transferable with the land.' These water-right certificates contained a binding obligation upon the water company to deliver to the purchaser a constant flow of 1 inch of water for each 8 acres on his designated land during the irrigation season, with a right to cumulate the water, under such regulations as would best subserve the interest of all parties. The purchaser agreed to pay, and did pay, the \$75 per acre or such other sum as might have been designated in the contract for this water right, and the further sum of \$2 per acre while the contract remained in force. The use of the water was limited to described land. Provision was made for the use of water for domestic purposes as above outlined. The contract bound all assignees or successors in interest, but could not be assigned by the purchaser without the written consent of the water company. At the time of the hearing these water-right certificates covered 69 acres at an annual rate of \$5 per acre and 5,874 at an annual rate of \$2 per acre. The applicant also announced special rates, whereby the owners of these water-right certificates could, when the quantity of water which the applicant possessed justified it, secure extra water for irrigation at fixed rates, measured by the California miner's inch for all excess water above that provided for in the water certificates,—10 cents an inch when there was a large abundance of excess water, 25 cents an inch when there was an abundance of water immediately preceding the opening of the regular irrigation season, April 14th, and 50 cents an inch during the period of the irrigation season proper.

"The quantity of water which can be supplied by the applicant is limited. Of that 'net, safe yield,' not to exceed 3 per cent, and perhaps but  $1\frac{1}{2}$  per cent, is actually required and used by the city of Hemet. All the rest of this 'net, safe yield' is used under these water certificates, and after such use there is a protective remainder of water amounting to but 3 or 4 per cent of the total supply. This, of course, takes no account of excess waters, which being occasional, are not to be depended upon. Thus approximately 94 per cent of the waters of applicant are devoted to use under its water-right certificates, 3 per cent in supplying the needs of the municipality and citizens of the city of Hemet, while the remaining 3 per cent remains in storage.

"The articles of incorporation of the Lake Hemet Land & Water Co. declared the purposes of the corporation to be 'to acquire by purchase and appropriation water and water rights and to develop water and to use, hold, and enjoy the same, . . . and to acquire all other and further easements necessary for the storing, conveyance, use, sale and other disposal of such water in the county of San Diego and elsewhere in the state of California; and to construct dams, reservoirs, flumes, and ditches and other conduits for the storage and distribution thereof; and to supply the inhabitants of the towns in San Jacinto valley with pure water for domestic purposes.'

"The petition of applicant to the Railroad Commission to fix its water rates upon the asserted ground that it was a public service corporation was based upon the allegation that the remuneration which was received by the applicant from the existing rates was wholly inadequate. In brief, the time had come when the applicant, Mr. Whittier, concluded that the duty was an onerous one and he sought a repudiation of these contracts and water-right certificates upon the ground, unquestionably sound in law, that if the corporation which entered into the contract was, at the time of entering, a public service corporation, these contracts were subject to modification at the instance of the Commission. Southern P. Co. v. Spring Valley Water Co. 173 Cal. 291, L.R.A.1917E, 680, 159 Pac. 865; Limoneira v. Railroad Commission, 174 Cal. 232, P.U.R.1917D, 183, 162 Pac. 1033. Certain facts in addition to those above set forth were presented to the Commission. Beginning with the year 1912, in response to a general order issued by the Commission to all public utilities, this applicant filed its schedule of rates, rules, and regulations for the service of water for irrigation and domestic use, and did so each year thereafter. The applicant further recognized its own character and the jurisdiction of the Commission by making an application before it for an order authorizing the sale of certain of its properties. No doubt can be entertained but that from 1912 Mr. Whittier, who, as the sole owner of these corporations, may be indifferently regarded with the water company itself as the applicant, did all that lay in his power to declare the company to be a public service corporation and to destroy the water rights of these petitioners, for which water rights he had received the sum of $438,938.60.

"The next series of facts presented to the Commission comes, first, from the testimony of Mr. Whittier as to the 'policy' of the water company, which was to sell its water 'to everyone that wanted water.' Mr. Whittier, at the time he gave this testimony, was eighty-four years of age. But Mr. Whittier further testifies that he is giving his evidence from his recollection, and that he is quite sure the records are better evidence, and this, of course, may not be questioned. The final fact before the Commission is that the applicant established and maintained a public watering trough on the town site of the present city of Hemet before it issued any of its water certificates.

"It is well now, for a clear understanding of the question, to epitomize the position of these petitioners. They concede that the applicant is a public service corporation in so far as the city of Hemet is concerned, and as to the amount of water which that city does or may require. They will not object to a finding that such present or future needs on behalf of the city constitute a first and preferential right to the use of the water. They insist, however, that, subject to that public use only, they have a private right in ownership by virtue of their water-right certificates to the use of all water provided for in those certificates; that their rights, being private rights, are governed wholly and exclusively by their contracts. Next, as to the excess waters, the rates for which have been fixed by the applicant itself, their attitude is one substantially of indifference as to whether or not the rates to be charged for those waters shall or shall not be fixed by the Commission.

"The position of the Commission, and of the applicant before it, is, first, that, under the facts above set forth, applicant was from the time of its creation, and continuously thereafter, a public service corporation, and that it had dedicated all of its waters to public use; second, that whether or not it had so dedicated its waters and properties to public use, by virtue of the laws of this state and their definition of a public utility, the applicant was such a public utility. Necessarily resulting from the upholding of either of these positions it is declared (and granting the premise the conclusion is unescapable) that all of these water-right certificates were, in contemplation of law, issued subject to the rate-fixing power of the Commission, and that therefore in so fixing the rates in derogation of these contracts no right of contract is violated.

"1. Treating first of the facts above set forth as establishing or failing to establish the public service character of applicant, it may at once be said that when it engaged to supply the town site and the succeeding city of Hemet with water for municipal and domestic purposes, and proceeded to do this thing, it became a public service corporation, at least in so far as the needs, present or future, of the growing city of Hemet, were concerned. But, of course, it does not follow, either in law or in reason, that because of this it had dedicated all its water to public use. To-day the city of Hemet requires but 1½ per cent, or, at the utmost, 3 per cent, of those waters. It would be little short of ridiculous to contend that upon the 97 per cent remaining had been imposed the same servitude. Our decisions fully recognize that a private water company may be organized to sell water for purposes of private gain, and not in so doing become a public utility. Thayer v. California Development Co. 164 Cal. 117, 128 Pac. 21. Further, that a company having a single and undivided supply of water (if that circumstance be considered of consequence) may devote its properties and a part of those waters to public service, and may retain a part for the advantages of private sale, and not become a public service corporation as to all by virtue of the dedication of a part. Leavitt v. Lassen Irrig. Co. 157 Cal. 83, 29 L.R.A. (N.S.) 213, 106 Pac. 404; Thayer v. California Development Co. supra; Del Mar Water & P. Co. v. Eshleman, 167 Cal. 666, 140 Pac. 591, 948. Manifestly, the applicant did not become a public utility merely by itself fixing the rates and charges for the water which it sold, nor could its submission to the jurisdiction of the Railroad Commission, and its declaration that it was a public utility, in the slightest affect the previously vested rights of these petitioners. Herein this case is broadly differentiated from that of Francioni v. Soledad Land & Water Co. 170 Cal. 221, 149 Pac. 161. In the last-named case a private corporation had been delivering water for private use under contract. It petitioned the proper authority to fix the rates to be charged for this service. The landowners who had been receiving water under private contract acquiesced in this petition and the rates were fixed. These rates were acted upon by all the parties in interest without question or dissent. Thereafter the company sought to amend its articles of incorporation and declare therein that it was supplying water 'as a private corporation, and not as a public water company,' and this court held that it was within the power of a private corporation to change the character of its use, with the assent of the recipients of the water under private contract, that this change had been so effected, and, the property having thus become stamped with a public use, it was not within the power of the corporation alone to change that use back to a private use, as it undertook to do. So, while a public service corporation cannot, out of these waters impressed with a public use, sell private or preferential water rights, a private corporation can and may. Leavitt v. Lassen Irrig. Co. supra; Byington v. Sacramento Valley West Side Canal Co. 170 Cal. 124, 148 Pac. 791. Of course, the purposes avowed in articles of incorporation do not fix the character of the corporation in its future activities as being a public service corporation. Such declarations of purpose merely serve to give the corporation capacity to engage in such public service if it shall so desire. Del Mar Water, Light & P. Co. v. Eshleman, 167 Cal. 666, 140 Pac. 591, 948.

"So far as weight is to be attached to the purposes of the organization of the applicant as expressed in its articles of incorporation, amongst those purposes is one 'to supply the inhabitants of the towns in San Jacinto valley with pure water for domestic purposes.' But this, standing alone, constitutes no dedication of applicant's properties to a public use. A most thorough and elaborate exposition of this, and, indeed, it may be added, of many other matters pertaining to this consideration, having been made by this court in Thayer v. California Development Co. supra, better cannot be done than to quote at some length from that exposition:

"The language plainly imports that the right, when acquired, is the property of the person who claims it and takes the steps prescribed to gain it. . . . The property does not become impressed with a public use or trust until after the owner has first acquired it and then dedicated it to the use. The acts of acquisition and of dedication, respectively, are distinct from each other. Technically the latter must follow the former and cannot precede or accompany it. An "appropriation of water" under the Code is therefore not, ipso facto, a dedication or appropriation to public use. The additional act of dedication is as necessary to the creation of a public use in a water right so acquired as it would be if the right was acquired by conveyance or in any other manner, or as in the case of any other property dedicated to public use. . . .

"According to the theory of the plaintiff in this case, whenever the owner of a water supply determines to and does sell it for a price agreed on between himself and the purchasers, it immediately becomes subject to public use, and any other person to whom it can be conveniently distributed in the same manner would have the right to a proportionate share of the water on the same terms as the purchasers, and, if the supply is limited, the first purchasers must divide with all others who may come in and claim a share. Under that theory, where a person having a surplus of water parts with a portion of it by sales to others, he thereby appropriates such portion to purposes of sale and dedicates it to public use. This application of the section would destroy private rights in water and convert every sale thereof into a dedication to public use. We do not believe that the Constitution was intended to have such effect, or that it should be so construed. Article 14, taken as a whole, shows plainly that it was intended to regulate the use of water appropriated and dedicated generally for sale and distribution among an indefinite number of users. It could not have been intended to declare that a single sale of a part of his water by one having more than he needs would convert the use into a public use in which others could share. If a single sale could not do this, other sales of like character would not accomplish it. The section must be understood to apply to cases where one has appropriated water generally, for sale, rental, or distribution, and not to cases where sales are made to particular persons at a fixed price by ordinary contracts of purchase and sale. To compel such a subdivision and distribution of water supplies as this construction would entail would destroy the value of all water rights. In this state the water supply is so small that large areas must go without irrigation entirely. Such water as there is must be applied, as far as it will go, in quantities sufficient to make the lands profitably productive. The principal benefit of irrigation comes from its use in growing vineyards and orchards. These require a large expenditure and a permanent water supply to make them profitable. If those engaging in such enterprises know that they must be ready always to divide their water supply with those in the vicinity who may subsequently choose to engage therein, such enterprises would be discouraged, the development, growth, and progress of the state would be much retarded, and its productive capacity greatly decreased.

"This provision of the Constitution has been in force thirty-three years. It has never been understood that it had the effect here contended for. There have been many instances in which the owners of large tracts of land have acquired water, conducted the same to the land, and sold and conveyed the land in small tracts to actual settlers with a proportionate share of the water appurtenant to the land, coupled with an agreement to continue the water supply at a fixed annual rate. Such a disposition is essentially a matter of private contract, and it shows no intent to create a public use."

applicant did carry out this declared purpose by dedicating so much of its water to public use as was or might be necessary to supply the town of Hemet. Further than that it has not gone. Further, the articles of incorporation as to the purposes declare that the corporation will acquire its water and water right 'by purchase and appropriation,' both methods being wholly within the purview of private ownership of such rights when acquired. It is not without significance that there is omitted therefrom the declaration of the right to acquire by condemnation, which right runs only with a public service; and of similar significance is the fact that when this applicant, in the course of its activities, needed to acquire, and did acquire, certain rights of way, it did not undertake to do so by condemnation, but effectuated its purpose by purchase.

"To hold that property has been dedicated to a public use is 'not a trivial thing' (San Francisco v. Grote, 120 Cal. 60, 41 L.R.A. 335, 65 Am. St. Rep. 155, 52 Pac. 127), and such dedication is never presumed 'without evidence of unequivocal intention' (Niles v. Los Angeles, 125 Cal. 572, 58 Pac. 190). The character of the contracts evidenced by these water-right certificates, the restriction upon transfer, the fixing of the acreage quantum, the enormous sum in the aggregate paid by these petitioners for their water rights, establish beyond the need of further discussion that the parties to those contracts believed that they were dealing in their private capacities and selling and receiving water for private use. But one suggestion here is sufficient. Is it conceivable that these landowners would have given Mr. Whittier and his associates a bonus of $438,938.60 for the right to use water, which right the law had given them without the expenditure of one dollar of it?"

dedication to public use—presumption.

"Upon this branch of the case, then, the conclusion is inevitable that the applicant was not, as to all of its water and properties, a public service corporation, and that these petitioners entered into their contracts with applicant, both parties to each contract acting as of right in their private capacities. Nothing in the cases relied on by respondents militates against this conclusion. Franscioni v. Soledad Land & Water Co. 170 Cal. 221, 149 Pac. 161, has already been considered. In that case there was an acquiescence upon the part of the holders of private contracts to change in use from private to public. Here the holders of such contracts are protesting and have protested from the moment that it appeared that their contractual rights might be impaired. Limoneira v. Railroad Commission, 174 Cal. 232, P.U.R.1917D, 183, 162 Pac. 1033, was a case where the company was indisputably a public service corporation, but it had entered into two agreements which were asserted to be private and beyond regulation. It has heretofore been said that such private right cannot be carved out of a public use (Leavitt v. Lassen Irrig. Co. 157 Cal. 83, 29 L.R.A.(N.S.) 213, 106 Pac. 404), and the decision of this court upholding the jurisdiction of the Railroad Commission was based upon this ground, this court recognizing that if a new appropriation had been made by the company, waters from which appropriation were to be devoted to this private use, it might well be held that the contracts were of private character. But, so reads the decision, 'there is nothing to compel the conclusion that there was any new appropriation of water to enable the utility to satisfy the requirements of these contracts.' Palermo Land & Water Co. v. Railroad Commission, 173 Cal. 380, P.U.R.1917A, 447, 160 Pac. 228, is of no value to the present consideration, since the contracts there under review in themselves provide for a rate which should be 'fixed by public authority.' And, finally, it may be added upon this matter that in Copeland v. Fairview Land & Water Co. 165 Cal. 148, 131 Pac. 119, this applicant here contended, and successfully contended, against the position which it now takes, the position there taken being that it was not a public service corporation. We do not cite this as being a determinative adjudication upon the question, but it serves at least to illustrate the changeable views which the applicant has entertained of its own activities, functions, and duties. In all respects vital to this consideration these certificates are of the character of those considered in Stanislaus Water Co. v. Bachman, 152 Cal. 716, 15 L.R.A.(N.S.) 359, 93 Pac. 858. In the Thayer Case, supra, it was decided that the sale in gross by a water company of water to a mutual water company was not a dedication of such waters to public use. In Marin Water & Power Co. v. Sausalito, 168 Cal. 587, 143 Pac. 767, it was decided that a sale and delivery of water by a water company to a municipality owning its own water system, to be sold by the municipality to its inhabitants, was not a dedication of such water so sold in gross to a public use so that the gross rates were subject to municipal regulation. It is not possible to see how, in the light of the principles upon which these adjudications are rested, it can be held that these private contracts with private individuals for a private supply of water upon their private lands was a dedication of such waters to public use.

"2. The second position adopted by respondents, as above outlined, is that this applicant is a public service corporation, without regard to the question of the dedication of its properties to public use, by virtue of the definitions of such public service corporations found in our law. To begin with, the Constitution, art. 12, § 23, declares that every private corporation furnishing water 'either directly or indirectly, to or for the public . . . is hereby declared to be a public utility subject to such control and regulation by the Railroad Commission.' Further, this section of the Constitution declares that 'every class of private corporations, individuals, or association of individuals, hereafter declared by the legislature to be public utilities, shall likewise be subject to such control and regulation.' And, finally, this section provides that the right of the legislature to confer powers upon the Railroad Commission respecting public utilities is plenary and unlimited by any provisions of the Constitution. Pursuant to this constitutional definition and grant of power, the legislature in 1913 (Stats. 1913, p. 84, chap. 80) declared: "Whenever any . . . corporation . . . sells, leases, rents or delivers water to any person, firm, private corporation, municipality, or any other political subdivision of the state whatsoever, except as limited by § 2 hereof, whether under contract or otherwise, such person, firm or private corporation is a public utility, and subject to the provisions of the Public Utilities Act of this state and the jurisdiction, control and regulation of the Railroad Commission of the state of California."

"And the Public Utilities Act (Stat. 1915, p. 115) defines a water corporation in the following language: "The term "water corporation," when used in this act, includes every corporation or person, their lessees, trustees, receivers or trustees appointed by any court whatsoever, owning, controlling, operating or managing any water system for compensation within this state."

"It must in this be recognized that the Constitution of this state, and the legislature in pursuance of it, has undertaken to put out of existence any and all private rights in the matter of the rental or sale of water. So far as our Constitution and laws are concerned, the state has done this thing. There stands between it and its enforcement, so far as this court is concerned, only the Constitution of the United States, which, as the supreme law of the land, is, whenever it speaks, the supreme law of this state.

Constitutional

ment of obliga-

Constitution.

"What is a public utility, over which the state may exercise its regulatory control without regard to the private interests which may be affected thereby? In its broadest sense everything upon which man bestows labor for purposes other than those for the benefit of his immediate family is impressed with a public use. No occupation escapes it, no merchant can avoid it, no professional man can deny it. As an illustrative type one may instance the butcher. He deals with the public; he invites and is urgent that the public should deal with him. The character of his business is such that, under the police power of the state, it may well be subject to regulation, and in many places and instances is so regulated. The preservation of cleanliness, the inspection of meats to see that they are wholesome, all such matters are within the due and reasonable regulatory powers of the state or nation. But these regulatory powers are not called into exercise because the butcher has devoted his property to public service so as to make it a public utility. He still has the unquestioned right to fix his prices; he still has the unquestioned right to say that he will or will not contract with any member of the public. What differentiates all such activities from a true public utility is this, and this only: That the devotion to public use must be of such character that the public generally, or that part of it which has been served and which has accepted the service, has the right to demand that that service shall be conducted, so long as it is continued, with reasonable efficiency

Public utility—

under reasonable charges. Public use, then, means the use by the public and by every individual member of it, as a legal right. Such is not only the accepted significance of the phrase by the great weight of authority, as expounded by Mr. Lewis (Em. Dom. §§ 164 et seq.), but is the definition repeatedly announced by this court. Thus, in Pinney & B. Co. v. Los Angeles Gas & E. Co. 168 Cal. 12, L.R.A.1915C, 282, 141 Pac. 620, Ann. Cas. 1915D, 471, explaining that it is not the use which the consumer makes of the commodity which constitutes the test as to whether or not the owner or purveyor of that commodity is a public service corporation, it is declared: "It is the duty which the purveyor or producer has undertaken to perform on behalf of and so owes to the public generally, or to any defined portion of it, as the purveyor of a commodity, or as an agency in the performance of a service, which stamps the purveyor or the agency as being a public service utility."

"To the same effect is Thayer v. California Development Co. 164 Cal. 117, 128 Pac. 21, while in Del Mar Water Co. v. Eshleman, 167 Cal. 666, 680, 140 Pac. 596, it is declared that 'even a constitutional declaration cannot transform a private enterprise, or a part thereof, into a public utility, and thus take property for public use without condemnation and payment.'

"Our Constitution and our statutory definitions above quoted, therefore, must be construed as applying only to such properties as have in fact been devoted to a public use, and not as an effort to impress with a public use properties which have not been devoted thereto. For if the latter be the true construction of our Constitution and statutes, then manifestly in their operation they are void wherever they unjustly interfere with private property or private contractual rights by force of article 1, § 10, and of the 14th of public utility.

Amendment of the Constitution of the United States. If the first alternative be selected, then, for reasons already given, such parts of these properties as are affected by the contracts with these petitioners have not been devoted to public use, and their private contractual rights must prevail.

"For these reasons the determination, conclusion, and judgment of the Commission that these petitioners' contractual and vested rights are subordinate to the regulatory powers of the Commission is in excess of the Commission's jurisdiction, and therefore void, and in so far the decree of the Commission is annulled."

Wilbur, J., dissenting:

I dissent. The main opinion holds that our state Constitution, and laws passed in pursuance thereof, authorizing the Railroad Commission to fix rates for the use of water, are in conflict with the Federal Constitution prohibiting the impairment of contracts, and are to that extent void and of no effect. It concedes that the state has exerted to the full all its sovereign powers to regulate and control the rates for the use of water, but holds the state to be impotent in the presence of the private rights to water and its distribution in this case. I concur in the main opinion in so far as it holds that the right to water ( $\frac{1}{2}$  inch per acre) is a private right. It was so held in Thayer v. California Development Co. 164 Cal. 117, 128 Pac. 21, and the subsequent constitutional amendment and statute must be held to have been adopted in view of that decision. But the decision of the Railroad Commission does not interfere with that right. To an understanding of the case it is essential that some facts disclosed by the record be stated in addition to those set forth in the main opinion. The contracts under which the petitioners claim, in addition to securing to them a certain amount of water, require the water company to deliver such water "at such points on the pipes or conduits of the party of the first part (water company) as may be nearest the land" of the grantee. The contract thus recognizes that the distributing system belongs to the water company. For this system the water company has expended \$447,000, paid in by its stockholders. It has also received \$438,938.60 from the sale of its water, a part or all of which was expended in payment of current expenses. It would cost \$657,385 to reproduce the distributing system. That the water company has done all in its power to dedicate its water and its distributing system to a public use is held in the main opinion, and that, having conceded and invoked the jurisdiction of the Railroad Commission, the water company should be bound by its dedication, is held in Palermo Land & Water Co. v. Railroad Commission, 173 Cal. 380, 384, 160 Pac. 229, where it is said by the court in banc: "It appears that in December, 1912, the Palermo Company applied to the Railroad Commission to have its rates for water established, and that the Commission made its order allowing an increase in the rates theretofore in effect. 3 Cal. R. C. 1247. The case, therefore, falls directly within the doctrine of Franscioni v. Soledad Land & Water Co. 170 Cal. 221, 149 Pac. 161, where we held that, as against the water company, such submission to the authority of the regulating body was effective to 'change the use from a private and particular use to a public use so as to make the service and terms of delivery subject to regulation and control by public authority.' No valid distinction can be drawn between the Franscioni Case and the one before us."

In the instant case the owners of property costing $657,385 to reproduce dedicate the same to a public use, and the state, through its Constitution, its laws, and its duly accredited representatives, accepts and acts upon such dedication. It is held in the main opinion that such dedication of such property is ineffectual. If it is once conceded that the distributing system is, or has been, dedicated to a public use, it follows that the rates to be charged for the use thereof are to be fixed by public authority, and that the inhibition of the Federal Constitution against the impairment of contracts does not apply, even though rates in excess of the contract rates are fixed. Limoneira Co. v. Railroad Commission, 174 Cal. 232, 162 Pac. 1033. The main opinion holds that the purchasers of the water contracts not only secured a right to the water, but also secured an easement in the distributing system attaching to the land, and thus have a property right in the pipe lines; citing Stanislaus Water Co. v. Bachman, 152 Cal. 726, 15 L.R.A.(N.S.) 359, 93 Pac. 858; Copeland v. Fairview Land & Water Co. 165 Cal. 154, 131 Pac. 119; Palermo Land & Water Co. v. Railroad Commission, 173 Cal. 386, P.U.R. 1917A, 477, 160 Pac. 228. If we hold that the owners of water certificates have a property right so definite in the pipe lines and distributing system as to prevent the dedication thereof to a public use by the water company, it would seem that such owners should at least bear the corresponding burden of the maintenance thereof, including their proportion of the expense of distribution of the water contained therein, particularly as against the public also served thereby. The Railroad Commission finds that the system has at all times been run at a loss. Neither the public nor the private users of water have paid their proportion of the expense of maintenance. The annual loss, including depreciation, now approximates $30,000. The proportion thereof properly apportioned to the owners of water certificates (94 per cent, according to the main opinion) would be $28,200. If the system is to remain a going concern, this amount, at least, must be assessed upon the public users (the 3 to 6 per cent), if the private users cannot be required to pay more than the contract rate. The holders of water certificates bought with knowledge that the system was used and to be used to distribute water devoted to a public use. By thus consenting that public waters, mingled with their private waters, could be conveyed through the distributing system in which they have an interest, they assented to the use of their property (the pipe line) for a public use. If they owned the whole pipe line and thus used it, it must be conceded that they thereby dedicated the same to a public use. Why does not their assent to such use of their undivided right therein necessarily constitute such a dedication thereof to a public use? Their rights in the water and in the system can be recognized by the Railroad Commission in fixing rates. A rate proportionately lower than that imposed on those having no property right in the water or distributing system can be fixed. Although it is conceded that the statute authorizes the fixing of rates by the Railroad Commission in this case, if constitutional, it is well to observe that the commingling of public and private waters in a privately owned distributing system is expressly made a basis of the jurisdiction of the Railroad Commission. Stat. 1913, p. 84, §§ 2-4.

"Sec. 2. Whenever any private corporation or association is organized for the purpose solely of delivering water to its stockholders or members at cost, and delivers water to no one except its stockholders or members at cost, such private corporation or association is not a public utility, and is not subject to the jurisdiction, control or regulation of the Railroad Commission of the state of California.

"Sec. 3. Whenever any private corporation or association organized for the purpose of delivering water solely to its stockholders or members at cost does deliver water to others than its stockholders or members for compensation, such private corporation or association becomes a public utility and subject to the terms of the Public Utilities Act and the jurisdiction, control and regulation of the Railroad Commission of the state of California.

"Sec. 4. Whenever any private corporation or association is organized both for the purpose of delivering water to its stockholders or members at cost and to persons, firms, corporations, municipalities or other political subdivisions of the state in addition thereto, such private corporation or association is a public utility and subject to the provisions of the Public Utilities Act and to the jurisdiction, control and regulation of the Railroad Commission of the state of California." Stat. 1913, p. 85.

It is, of course, the duty of the Railroad Commission to recognize private and constitutional rights and fix the rates with reference thereto. In this case, while finding, erroneously, as we hold, that all the water distributed by the water company was dedicated to a public use, it nevertheless refused to consider the value of the water as a basis for fixing the rates, and, although the water company at first sought a reasonable interest upon the alleged value thereof ($494,000), the company abandoned its claim, and the Railroad Commission refused to recognize it. In short, in effect, the water users who had paid $438,000 therefor were recognized as entitled to water claimed to be worth $494,000. The Railroad Commission fixed rates for water that would pay the operating and maintenance expenses and give a revenue to the company on a capitalization of less than one half of the value of their distributing plant. It seems clear that the water company and the certificate holders, by express dedication and by necessary implication, have consented to the jurisdiction of the Railroad Commission in so far as the distributing system is concerned, and that, therefore, it has jurisdiction, and that in the exercise of that jurisdiction it has not violated any rights of petitioners in the water or distributing system, such as would justify our interference. I therefore conclude that the jurisdiction of the Railroad Commission may be well predicated upon the consent of the water company and the implied consent of the certificate holders whose property rights are given due consideration by the Railroad Commission. It is also true, I think, that the business of storing, conserving, and distributing water, whether privately owned or dedicated to public use, to large tracts of land for the use of large numbers of persons for domestic and irrigation purposes in an arid state, particularly where such distributor enjoys a monopoly, is so clearly a matter of great public concern as to justify the people in declaring that such business is a public utility. It is unnecessary to give reasons in detail for such an obvious conclusion, but it may be noted that changed labor conditions, increased cost of supplies and materials necessary to maintain such distributing system, bankruptcy, termination of corporate existence, or death of individuals furnishing water, all have a marked effect upon the ability of the distributor to distribute water, and upon the public so furnished with water, and that the ordinary remedies for breach of contract to distribute or deliver water, or equitable actions to protect and enforce such contract rights, would be wholly inadequate to protect the public directly and indirectly affected by such failure and the consequent damage. Many of these considerations, however, do not apply to the corporations excepted from control of the Railroad Commission, for the reason that in such mutual companies the actual cost of maintenance, whether great or small, is distributed among the water owners. As we are dealing with legislation that definitely and clearly authorizes the fixing of the rates for the water company under constitutional provisions, authorizing such legislation and providing for such fixing of rates (art. 14, and art. 12, § 23), we need only consider whether the Federal Constitution prohibits such action, and for that purpose we must look to the Supreme Court of the United States as final and conclusive authority. The question of the limitations upon state legislative power by the Federal Constitution has been frequently under consideration by that court. Only a few cases need be noted.

In Spring Valley Waterworks v. Schottler, 110 U. S. 347, 28 L. ed. 173, 4 Sup. Ct. Rep. 48, the Supreme Court of the United States said: "That it is within the power of the government to regulate the prices at which water shall be sold by one who enjoys a virtual monopoly of the sale, we do not doubt. That question is settled by what was decided on full consideration in Munn v. Illinois, 94 U. S. 113, 24 L. ed. 77. As was said in that case, such regulations do not deprive a person of his property without due process of law."

In the case of Munn v. Illinois, supra, in passing upon the power of the legislature of the state of Illinois to declare grain elevators public utilities, and regulating rates for the storage and handling of grain, the Supreme Court said: "This brings us to inquire as to the principles upon which this power of regulation rests, in order that we may determine what is within and what without its operative effect. Looking, then, to the common law, from whence came the right which the Constitution protects, we find that when private property is 'affected with a public interest it ceases to be juris privati only.' This was said by Lord Chief Justice Hale more than two hundred years ago, in his treatise De Portibus Maris, 1 Hargrave's Law Tracts, 78, and has been accepted without objection as an essential element in the law of property ever since. Property does become clothed with a public interest when used in a manner to make it of public consequence and affect the community at large. When, therefore, one devotes his property to a use in which the public has an interest, he, in effect, grants to the public an interest in that use, and must submit to be controlled by the public for the common good, to the extent of the interest he has thus created. He may withdraw his grant by discontinuing the use; but, so long as he maintains the use, he must submit to the control."

In Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. v. Goldsboro, 232 U. S. 548, 58 L. ed. 721, 34 Sup. Ct. Rep. 364, the rule is thus stated: "It is settled that neither the 'contract' clause nor the 'due process' clause has the effect of overriding the power of the state to establish all regulations that are reasonably necessary to secure the health, safety, good order, comfort, or general welfare of the community; that this power can neither be abdicated nor bargained away, and is inalienable even by express grant; and that all contract and property rights are held subject to its fair exercise. Slaughter-House Cases, 16 Wall. 36, 62, 21 L. ed. 394, 404; Munn v. Illinois, 94 U. S. 113, 125, 24 L. ed. 77, 84; Boston Beer Co. v. Massachusetts, 97 U. S. 25, 33, 24 L. ed. 989, 992; Mugler v. Kansas, 123 U. S. 623, 665, 31 L. ed. 205, 211, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 273; Crowley v. Christensen, 137 U. S. 86, 89, 34 L. ed. 620, 621, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 13; New York & N. E. R. Co. v. Bristol, 151 U. S. 556, 567, 38 L. ed. 269, 272, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 437; Texas & N. O. R. Co. v. Miller, 221 U. S. 408, 414, 415, 55 L. ed. 789, 795, 796, 31 Sup. Ct. Rep. 534."

In determining the question whether or not a business is of such public interest and concern as to subject it to regulation as a public utility, the Supreme Court of the United States holds that that question is primarily one for the legislature. In Munn v. Illinois, supra, it is said: "For our purposes we must assume that, if a state of facts could exist that would justify such legislation, it actually did exist when the statute now under consideration was passed. For us the question is one of power, not of expediency. If no state of circumstances could exist to justify such a statute, then we may declare this one void, because in excess of the legislative power of the state. But if it could, we must presume it did. Of the propriety of legislative interference within the scope of legislative power, the legislature is the exclusive judge."

It seems clear from these authorities, upon the facts found by the Railroad Commission, that the state had power to declare the water system a public utility. It finds that "the consumers concede that, in so far as the supply of domestic water to persons other than the holders of water certificates is concerned, petitioner is a public utility." That the "petitioner adopted rules and regulations for the sale of water for irrigation and domestic use, which rules were printed and distributed to its consumers and referred to in petitioner's advertisements. Petitioner's business has grown from its initial supply of domestic water to the first inhabitants of what is now the town of Hemet, until in 1915, as shown by petitioner's annual report for the year ending December 31, 1915, on file with the Railroad Commission, petitioner sold water through 85 meters for irrigation, 481 meters for domestic use, 5 meters for manufacturing and power, and 6 meters for public use. During the same year petitioner sold water measured through other devices for irrigation of 5,554 acres of land. Approximately 2,500 people, including approximately 1,500 in the town of Hemet, rely upon petitioner's system as their sole source of water." That the "petitioner is a water company, incorporated under the laws of this state. It is the only water system in control of water which it sells for compensation. For more than twenty-five years petitioner has been engaged in the sale of water to the entire public on the land to the service of which petitioner has dedicated its water. Petitioner has fixed and enforced rates, rules, and regulations for the service of water for irrigation and domestic purposes and to the town of Hemet for public purposes. Petitioner's water system consists of watershed lands, the Lake Hemet reservoir on the south fork of the San Jacinto river diversion works at four points of diversion, transmission mains of riveted steel and wood pipe, wooden flume and lined ditch and a distributing system of wooden and concrete flume, concrete and riveted steel pipe, all used in the delivery of water to wholesale and irrigation consumers. In addition, petitioner owns and operates a separate system with a separate diversion for the distribution of water through riveted steel and standard screw pipe to domestic consumers. In the operation of its system petitioner for more than fifteen years has had the control and use of 17/20 of the water of the north fork of the San Jacinto river and Strawberry creek under agreements with Fairview Land & Water Company, the owner of such waters. The safe yield of petitioner's water system is 161,000 miner's inch days annually, or 6,376 acres feet, delivering 725 miner's inches during the irrigating season."

It is also found that the water company had issued:

(a) Contracts covering 69.36 acres at the rate of $5 per acre per year.

(b) Contracts covering 5,874.77 acres at the rate of $2 per acre per year, and that the amount of acres irrigated was 5,554; that "petitioner's total operating expenses to December 31, 1914, were $512,353.87; $93,607.43 was depreciation. Total cost of operation was $418,746.44. Total revenue, after deducting receipts from the sale of water rights, $239,824.47. It thus appears that the result of petitioner's operations under its rates now in effect has been a gross revenue of $178,921.97, less than bare operating and maintenance expenses."

We are not called to pass upon the reasonableness of the rates fixed by the Railroad Commission, if no constitutional right is invaded.

I therefore conclude that the Railroad Commission had authority to fix rates under the Constitution and law:

First, for the reason that the water company had consented thereto by the express dedication of all its interest in the system, and that the Railroad Commission was empowered and required, in fixing rates, to fix them with due regard to the private ownership of the water-certificate holders in the water and the distributing system.

Second, for the reason that the owners of water certificates had consented to the use of the distributing system, and their interest therein by the public, and had thus jointly with the water company dedicated the distributing system to a public use.

Third, for the reason that the character of the business conducted by the water company and water users authorized the state to declare the same a public utility, and to provide for the fixing of rates by the Railroad Commission, whose duty it was to fix rates in due recognition of the private rights of water-certificate holders in such property, and that the intervention of this court is only proper where a clear violation of such rights appears.

I. Scope: subject as related to question of eminent domain.

The present annotation deals with the question whether irrigation companies are public utilities, and, if not always public utilities, under what circumstances they are such. It does not cover the various questions as to rights and duties arising from such a status, once it is assumed or decided that the status of public utility exists. No attempt has been made to define or restrict to a narrow limit the term "public utility;" but the annotation aims to include cases in general which involve the question of governmental or judicial control of irrigation companies on the ground that they are affected with a public interest.

At the outset of the present discussion arises the question of the relationship of the question herein considered to that of the right of irrigation companies to exercise the power of eminent domain. It may be said in general that in some jurisdictions the fact that an irrigation company is clothed with the power of eminent domain, and exercises that power, is considered as marking it as in some sense, at least, affected with a public interest, and as separating it from the class of mere private corporations. But this does not appear to be the universal rule. Both on principle and authority, it would seem that a company formed for the purpose of irrigating land in an arid state might conceivably be regarded as taking its land for a canal for a public purpose within the meaning of eminent domain statutes, and yet, because of the circumstances of its delivery of water to consumers, might not be regarded as a public utility in the sense that it could be compelled to deliver water generally to all under its canal who applied, or could be compelled to furnish water on rates and terms fixed by a utilities commission. The differences in the views of the courts will appear from the authorities herein cited. But since these views are divergent, and cases on the question of the right of irrigation companies to exercise the power of eminent domain are not conclusive in their reasoning, irrespective of the conclusion reached, on the question whether irrigation companies are public utilities, it seems desirable in the present annotation to point out these distinctions and the relation of the present question to that of eminent domain, rather than to cover the latter question.

In Kinney on Irrigation & Water Rights, vol. 3, pp. 2613, 2614, it is said: "As far as the use of the water appropriated and controlled by private water companies is concerned, whether they are incorporated or unincorporated, under the later authorities, a distinction must be observed between the terms 'public use,' and 'public service.' An individual may alone be engaged in the conducting of water from a natural source of supply solely for the purpose of irrigating his own tract of land, and such a use of the water is deemed a public use, for the utilization of which he may condemn a right of way over the private lands of others, yet it could not be contended for an instant that this person was engaged in a public service, as the term is used in connection with public service companies. Again, to carry our illustration further, a group of individuals owning lands in the same immediate neighborhood, and each owning a water right, which he used to irrigate his own particular tract, may band themselves together and organize a water company, either incorporated or unincorporated, for the purpose of furnishing water to others, and the use to which the water is put is a public use, yet this company, where the distribution of the water is exclusively to its shareholders, is not a public service company, or comes within the restrictions imposed by the statutes regulating such companies. 'Public service' or 'quasi public' water companies, may be defined as those companies, either incorporated or unincorporated, which are engaged in the business of furnishing or carrying water for hire, to all consumers who can be provided with water under their systems, and who may apply for the same, up to the full capacity of such systems. Such a company is, therefore, a public agency, and the use to which the water is put is also a public use."

And in Nampa & M. Irrig. Dist. v. Briggs (1915) 27 Idaho, 84, 147 Pac. 75, in reply to the contention that the plaintiff irrigation district was a public service corporation, the court said: "The appellant is not a public service corporation in the sense that it is a common carrier to any other or greater extent than the term implies when applied to its own membership, and confined to the business of carrying water for the irrigation of lands within its own district. It is a mutual, co-operative corporation, organized not for profit, engaged in distributing water to its members for use upon lands within its district. . . . It is true, as has been suggested, that a corporation such as the appellant is may exercise the power of eminent domain, but it must be remembered that in Idaho the right to take private property for a public use, upon payment of just compensation therefor, does not, of necessity, constitute a corporation invested with that right a public service corporation in the sense that the public may exact any service from it."

The distinctions above referred to appear more clearly from consideration of the case of Nash v. Clark (1904) 27 Utah, 158, 1 L.R.A.(N.S.) 208, 101 Am. St. Rep. 953, 75 Pac. 371, 1 Ann. Cas. 300, affirmed in (1905) 198 U. S. 361, 49 L. ed. 1085, 25 Sup. Ct. Rep. 676, 4 Ann. Cas. 1171. Referring to the term "public use" for which property may be taken under eminent domain, the court, in holding that the reclamation of land by irrigation was such a public use that the legislature might lawfully authorize the condemnation of a right of way over private property to convey water for that purpose to land belonging to a private individual, stated: "What is a public use cannot always be determined by the application of purely legal principles. This is evidenced from the fact that there are two lines of authority, neither of which attempts to lay down any fixed rule as a guide to be followed in all cases. One class of authorities, in a general way, holds that by public use is meant a use by the public or its agencies, —that is, the public must have the right to the actual use in some way of the property appropriated; whereas the other line of decisions holds that it is a public use within the meaning of the law when the taking is for a use that will promote the public interest, and which use tends to develop the great natural resources of the commonwealth. After a careful examination of the leading cases on this subject, we are of the opinion that the class of decisions last mentioned is more in harmony with enlightened public policy, and the liberal interpretation given the term 'public use' which the legislature has, in effect, declared shall be followed in this state, is far more conducive to individual and public advancement than the restricted construction adopted and followed by the line of decision first referred to."

The rule was laid down in State ex rel. Galbraith v. Superior Ct. (1910) 59 Wash. 621, 140 Am. St. Rep. 893, 110 Pac. 429, in holding that an irrigation company, assumed to be under no obligation to serve the public, might exercise the power of eminent domain; that the test of public use in the acquisition of water rights and rights of way for canals and ditches for irrigation purposes is not necessarily the service the party seeking to acquire such rights may be compelled to render to the public in connection therewith. The court cited a provision of the state Constitution that private property should not be taken for private use, except for private ways of necessity, and for drains, flumes, or ditches for agricultural purposes.

There are, however, some cases in which the courts closely associate the question of the exercise of the power of eminent domain with the question whether the irrigation company is affected with a public interest as a public or quasi public corporation.

Thus, in Raywood Rice Canal & Mill Co. v. Erp (1912) 105 Tex. 161, 146 S. W. 155, the court, in connection with a ruling which involved the view that an irrigation company was a quasi public corporation, stated: "The granting of the power of eminent domain imposes a public service in return. No authority under our law exists for conferring the power of eminent domain for private use. The moment such power is granted, the grantee becomes quasi public in character, and while his or its functions are exercised for profit, they must be exercised in the interest of the public, upon reasonable terms and without discrimination. This is the rule, independent of statutory enactment."

And in Colorado Canal Co. v. McFarland (1906) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 94 S. W. 400, the court stated that the power of eminent domain could be granted only for a public use, and that when it was conferred by law, as in that state, on irrigation companies, their status as quasi public was fixed, regardless of whether the power was exercised or not.

Although holding the irrigation company in question, which had not exercised the power of eminent domain, not a public utility within the meaning of a statute requiring public utilities to make certain reports to the secretary of state, the court in State ex rel. Coco v. Riverside Irrig. Co. (1917) 142 La. 10, 76 So. 216, stated that the statutes conferred on corporations organized for the construction and maintenance of canals, and specifically accepting the statutory conditions, the right of eminent domain and other privileges, which would probably convert those which accepted into public service or public utility corporations.

After holding that water of an irrigation company had not been dedicated to public use, the court in Thayer v. California Development Co. (1912) 164 Cal. 117, 128 Pac. 21, stated that it would follow, as a matter of course, that the company did not possess the power of eminent domain.

And in Gravelly-Ford Canal Co. v. Pope & T. Land Co. (1918) 36 Cal. App. 556, 178 Pac. 150, it was held that the California statute declaring irrigation to be a public use, and providing that the power of eminent domain might be exercised on behalf of such use, should not be construed as authorizing condemnation of property by a private irrigation company not proposing to deliver water to any except its own stockholders.

In ALLEN v. RAILROAD COMMISSION (reported herewith) ante, 249, the court, in holding that the irrigation company in question had not dedicated its water to a public use, called attention to the fact that it had not exercised the power of eminent domain, and that its articles of incorporation declared that it would acquire its water and water rights "by purchase and appropriation."

An irrigation company which has obtained judgment in condemnation proceedings on the theory that it is exercising the right of eminent domain for the benefit of a specified district, including the land through which the right of way is obtained, may be estopped by the judgment, as against the landowner, to deny that, so far as he is concerned, it is exercising a public use for the benefit of the landowners along the line of the ditch. Lowe v. Yolo County Consol. Water Co. (1910) 157 Cal. 503, 108 Pac. 297.

The annotation does not cover the question whether an irrigation canal is dedicated to a public use in the sense that it cannot be taken by condemnation proceedings for another public use, where the taking of property already dedicated to a public use is unauthorized. See, for example, Albuquerque v. Garcia (1913) 17 N. M. 445, 130 Pac. 118, holding that a community ditch in actual use for the conducting of water for the irrigation of land was dedicated to a public use, and could not be condemned by a city for use as a street.

The annotation does not cover the question whether irrigation districts are public or quasi public corporations.

II. Irrigation companies as public service corporations, in general.

a. Statement of rules.

The increasing importance of irrigation in the arid states has led in comparatively recent years to the enactment of many constitutional and statutory provisions declaring a public use in waters appropriated for sale, rental, and distribution, and providing, in some instances, that corporations so distributing water are public utilities or common carriers. But, irrespective of whether the statute so expressly declares, it seems to be well settled that an irrigation company which holds itself out generally to serve for compensation all who may apply for water within the area served by its irrigation system is not a mere private corporation, but is affected with a public interest, and is subject to regulation and control as a public service or quasi public corporation. The view that irrigation companies are public service or quasi public corporations, or are affected by a public interest, and are not mere private corporations, obtains in many cases, it appearing in most of these cases that the corporation was organized for the purpose of supplying water to the public generally in the area served by it, and not merely to its stockholders or those having fixed contractual relations with it.

Some cases seemingly without any distinction of the nature and purposes of different companies have used language broad enough to imply that all irrigation companies are public service or quasi public corporations, or affected with a public interest; but the court probably was dealing with a company which held itself out generally for hire, or was relying on a special statutory declaration of the nature of such companies. Of this class of cases are the following: Atlantic Trust Co. v. Woodbridge Canal & Irrig. Co. (1897) 79 Fed. 39; Crow v. San Joaquin & K. River Canal & Irrig. Co. (1900) 130 Cal. 309, 62 Pac. 562, rehearing denied in (1900) 130 Cal. 315, 62 Pac. 1058; Farmers' Independent Ditch Co. v. Agricultural Ditch Co. (1896) 22 Colo. 513, 55 Am. St. Rep. 149, 45 Pac. 444; Wilterding v. Green (1896) 4 Idaho, 773, 45 Pac. 134; Sherman County Irrig. Water Power & Improv. Co. v. Drake (1902) 65 Neb. 699, 91 N. W. 512; Sammons v. Tri-State Land Co. (1912) 92 Neb. 121, 138 N. W. 171; McCook Irrig. & Water Power Co. v. Burtless (1915) 98 Neb. 141, L.R.A.1915D, 1205, P.U.R.1915C, 587, 152 N. W. 334; Evergreen Farm v. Attalia Land Co. (1916) 91 Wash. 192, 157 Pac. 487.

Thus, in the syllabus by the court in Wilterding v. Green (1896) 4 Idaho, 773, 45 Pac. 134, supra, it is said that under the Constitution and statutes of Idaho the waters of the state are appropriated for rental, sale, or distribution, and when so appropriated and taken out they become a public use, and are dedicated to the public; that the owners of canals and ditches are entitled to reasonable compensation for appropriating and delivering said water, and that those owning or controlling land under the ditches or canals are entitled to waters therein upon paying or tendering to the owners of the canals a reasonable compensation for such use. See also Bardsly v. Boise Irrig. & Land Co. (1901) 8 Idaho, 155, 67 Pac. 428, among other cases of a somewhat similar nature construing constitutional and statutory provisions in that state declaring the use of water appropriated for irrigation purposes a public use, and entitling persons owning or controlling land under irrigation canals to receive water therefrom on proper demand and the giving of reasonable security for payment.

The Nebraska statute, as set out in Farmers & M. Irrig. Co. v. Hill (1912) 90 Neb. 847, 39 L.R.A.(N.S.) 798, 134 N. W. 929, Ann. Cas. 1913B, 524, expressly declares that "irrigation works constructed under the laws of the state are hereby declared to be common carriers." And in the Nebraska cases cited above, without distinguishing between the different purposes or modes of operation of various companies, and without setting out in detail the nature of the company in question, irrigation companies have been held to be quasi public corporations.

Thus, in McCook Irrig. & Water Power Co. v. Burtless (1915) 98 Neb. 141, L.R.A.1915D, 1205, P.U.R.1915C, 587, 152 N. W. 334, supra, the rule is laid down in the headnote by the court that an irrigation company is a common carrier of water to a limited degree, and its rates and charges are subject to regulation and control; that contracts between an irrigation company and water users under its ditch, providing for the use of water and for the maintenance of the ditch, are entered into with the law as to the right of the state to regulate rates forming a part of the contract, and such rates are subject to control. The court said: "At the time the canal was built the practice of irrigation in this state was in its infancy; but from the very first the legislature recognized the public interest in the use of water from the streams of the state for irrigation purposes. It placed canal companies in the same class as railways and other common carriers, and it has uniformly been considered that their rates were subject to regulation and control. . . . The question involved is an important one, and one as to which there has been some difference of opinion; but we believe the larger and broader view—that most consistent with the spirit in which the law of irrigation should be administered, and that to which the courts are more and more tending—is that any contracts entered into between the irrigation company and consumers under the ditch, with reference to the annual rates which should be charged for the use of water, were entered into with the law forming a part of the contract, and were subject to legislative control."

Without setting out the nature of the particular company, except that it was organized to construct a canal for irrigation and power purposes, and had used its ditch for several years for irrigation purposes, the court in Sherman County Irrig. & Water Power Improv. Co. v. Drake (1902) 65 Neb. 699, 91 N. W. 512, supra, held that the company was a quasi public corporation, and that its property was not subject to seizure and sale on execution.

And a corporation organized for the purpose of owning and operating canals, reservoirs, dams, and other works for irrigation and water power purposes was held a quasi public corporation in Sammons v. Kearney Power & Irrig. Co. (1906) 77 Neb. 580, 8 L.R.A.(N.S.) 404, 110 N. W. 308, supra, the court stating: "In the case at bar we are dealing with an irrigation company,—a quasi public corporation. It also is a governmental agency, but its main purpose is the administration of a public utility. To the extent of its capacity, it is bound to furnish water from its canal to persons desiring to use it, on equal terms and without discrimination. In this respect it stands on the same footing as a railroad company."

Also in Fenton v. Tri-State Land Co. (1911) 89 Neb. 479, 131 N. W. 1038, supra, the court said: "A stock corporation formed for the purpose of constructing an irrigation canal, though private as to its manner of organization, is of the nature of a public service corporation. Its rights and duties are modified by the nature of its functions. It cannot serve the public generally, but only the occupiers of land lying under the ditch. Its duties to the respective consumers may be modified and affected by the operation of rights of priority and by the operation of the police powers of the state." In this case the court denied a contention of an irrigation company, made on the ground that it was a public service corporation and bound to serve the public on equal terms, and without preference or discrimination, that a provision in the contract of purchase of the irrigation system, constituting a part of the purchase price, which relieved the sellers, who were consumers under the ditch, of payment of annual assessments, was invalid on grounds of public policy.

Without consideration of the nature of the particular company, the court in Evergreen Farm v. Attalia Land Co. (1916) 91 Wash. 192, 157 Pac. 487, supra, held that an irrigation company which, in a contract of sale of land to the plaintiff, had attempted to limit its liability to cases of gross negligence, was a public service corporation, and hence could not thus limit its liability.

Ditch corporations, it was said in Farmers' Independent Ditch Co. v. Agricultural Ditch Co. (1896) 22 Colo. 513, 55 Am. St. Rep. 149, 45 Pac. 444, supra, are quasi public carriers.

As stated above, in the majority of cases in which irrigation companies have been held to be public service or quasi public corporations, facts have been set out showing that the company was operating an irrigation system for hire; in other words, was holding itself out generally as a carrier of water, and not limiting its service to those merely of a certain class or in a certain area, with whom it had fixed contractual relations.

"We hold," said the court in Slosser v. Salt River Valley Canal Co. (1901) 7 Ariz. 376, 65 Pac. 332, "that the ownership and possession of arable and irrigable land is essential, under the statutes, for the acquisition of the right of appropriation of water from a public stream for purposes of irrigation. We hold that a corporation not the owner or possessor of arable and irrigable land may lawfully construct a dam, canal, or other conduit of water, and divert from such stream water for purposes of irrigation, but that in so doing it becomes in no sense an appropriator or owner of the water so diverted. Its status is that of either a private or public agency, depending upon whether its diversion is for the purpose of supplying owners or possessors of arable and irrigable land with whom it has fixed contractual relations, binding it to perform said service, or whether its purpose or practice be to supply owners or possessors of such land who are not its water-right holders, or with whom it has not bound itself by contract to permanently render such service. If it confined its service as the private agent of certain appropriators, it cannot be compelled to render service to others. On the other hand, if it undertakes to and does divert and carry water for the use of consumers with whom it is not bound by such contract, and hence becomes a public agency, it cannot, under the law, discriminate by giving preference otherwise than with due regard to priority of appropriation."

A corporation owning a canal from which it supplies water for hire for irrigation purposes is a quasi public agency, subject to legislative control. Wheeler v. Northern Colorado Irrig. Co. (1888) 10 Colo. 582, 3 Am. St. Rep. 603, 17 Pac. 487; White v. Farmers' Highline Canal & Reservoir Co. (1896) 22 Colo. 191, 31 L.R.A. 828, 43 Pac. 1028; Junction Creek & N. D. D. & Irrigating Ditch Co. v. Durango (1895) 21 Colo. 194, 40 Pac. 356.

An irrigation company carrying water for hire is not the proprietor of the water which it is entitled to divert, but must be regarded as an intermediate agency existing for the purpose of aiding consumers in the exercise of their rights to appropriate water, as well as a private enterprise prosecuted for its benefit. Denver v. Brown (1913) 56 Colo. 216, 138 Pac. 44; Wyatt v. Larimer & W. Irrig. Co. (1893) 18 Colo. 298, 36 Am. St. Rep. 280, 33 Pac. 144; Wheeler v. Northern Colorado Irrig. Co. (1887) 10 Colo. 582, 3 Am. St. Rep. 603, 17 Pac. 487; Wright v. Platte Valley Irrig. Co. (1900) 27 Colo. 322, 61 Pac. 603.

It is quite uniformly held, it was said in Colorado Canal Co. v. McFarland (1908) 50 Tex. Civ. App. 92, 109

S. W. 435, that irrigation companies furnishing water to consumers for compensation, although private corporations, are public or quasi public carriers of water, charged with a public duty or trust, engaged in the business of transporting for hire water owned by the public to the people owning the right to its use; that as public carriers they are charged with certain duties to the public, and are subject to a reasonable control by the legislature and the courts.

The status of irrigation companies carrying water for hire to all who apply within the area served by the irrigation system is not generally considered as precisely that of a common carrier. The laws relative to prior appropriation rights of consumers, application to beneficial use, etc., enter into and affect the relationship of the company to the consumer.

In Colorado, an irrigation company which distributes water for hire, while at least a quasi public servant or agent, and not a mere private agency, occupies a status differing in some particulars from that of the ordinary carrier; it does not become the proprietor of the water diverted; and its rights with respect to such water are dependent for their birth and continued existence upon the use made by the consumer; it is charged with a public duty or trust; and, in the absence of legislation on the subject, would be held at common law to have submitted itself to a reasonable judicial control, invoked and exercised for the common good, in the matter of regulations and charges. Wheeler v. Northern Colorado Irrig. Co. (1888) 10 Colo. 582, 3 Am. St. Rep. 603, 17 Pac. 487. -

And in Wright v. Platte Valley Irrig. Co. (1900) 27 Colo. 322, 61 Pac. 603, the court said that the status of a ditch company was not, in the strict legal sense of the term, that of a common carrier, but was more like that of a private carrier, whose duties were measured by the obligations it assumed toward its consumers and those imposed by law, by reason of the nature of the business in which it was engaged.

It was held in Wright v. Platte Valley Irrig. Co. (Colo.) supra, that a provision in a contract between a consumer and an irrigation company, limiting the use of the water to the necessities of the particular land described in the contract, was not against public policy and unenforceable against the consumer, on the theory that the water company was simply a common carrier, clothed merely with the right to carry water and receive compensation therefor.

An irrigation company which does not confine its service to the diversion and carriage of water from a public stream as the agent of particular appropriators with whom it has a fixed contractual relation, but undertakes to and does serve other consumers of water, becomes in a sense a public agency, although not, strictly speaking, a common carrier. Slosser v. Salt River Valley Canal Co. (1901) 7 Ariz. 376, 65 Pac. 332. The court said that were it not for the fact that appropriators of water from a public stream did not have equal rights to the use of such water, but each appropriation, as against other appropriations, depended for its priority upon the time when it was made, the status of a corporation undertaking to supply consumers of water for agricultural purposes, without regard to fixed contractual relations, would become that of a public carrier; that some of the courts in the arid states had chosen to regard such corporations as, in a sense, public carriers; but that, inasmuch as, in the nature of things, their ability to supply the public with water must be limited, and as the consumers, under the law of prior appropriations, were not and could not be on the same footing as to their right to the use of such water, the statutory term, "public acequia," more accurately described their character and status.

But in Louisiana Rio Grande Canal Co. v. Frazier (1917) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 196 S. W. 10, the court stated that the defendant irrigation company was a corporation chartered under the Texas law as a public irrigation company, by reason of which it was a quasi public service corporation or common carrier; and that it was undisputed that it was controlled by the rules of a common carrier.

The Nebraska statute, as set out in Farmers & M. Irrig. Co. v. Hill (1912) 90 Neb. 847, 39 L.R.A.(N.S.) 798, 134 N. W. 929, Ann. Cas. 1913B, 524, provides that "irrigation works constructed under the laws of this state are hereby declared to be common carriers." It is further provided that the owner or operator of any works for the storage, carriage, or diversion of water must deliver all water legally appropriated to the parties entitled to the use thereof for beneficial purposes, at a reasonable rate, to be fixed by the state Railway Commission, according to the law in such cases relating to common carriers.

c. Particular applications.

A construction company which, under the Carey Act of Congress, contracted with the state to construct an irrigation system and to organize an operating company to which the irrigation system was to be transferred, with reservation of the right to furnish water to settlers prior to the time of such transfer, was held in Hanes v. Idaho Irrig. Co. (1912) 21 Idaho, 512, 122 Pac. 859, to be a quasi public service corporation, in the operation of its canal and the furnishing of water.

And a company undertaking an irrigation project, which in its contract with landowners who purchased water rights agreed to construct the irrigation system and turn it over to the holders of water rights within a year after completion, was held a public or quasi public corporation, in Childs v. Neitzel (1914) 26 Idaho, 116, 141 Pac. 77.

A canal company engaged in distributing water through its canal for irrigation was held a public utility in Steamboat Canal Co. v. Garson (1919) — Nev. —, 185 Pac. 801, under a statute declaring that the term "public utility" should include, among others, every company owning or operating any "plant" or equipment for delivery of water for agricultural or household purposes, the use of the term "plant" not being intended to limit the application of the statute strictly to companies engaged in delivering water, at least in part, through the agency of machinery, as a pumping station or other mechanical apparatus.

It was said in Candelaria v. Vallejos (1905) 13 N. M. 147, 81 Pac. 589, that under the Statute of 1895, providing that all community ditches theretofore or thereafter constructed should, for the purpose of the act, be considered as corporations or bodies corporate, community ditches belong to the class of corporations known as public involuntary quasi corporations. The question, however, involved in this case, was the power of a majority to change the location of the main irrigation ditch against the objection of a minority.

Assuming that the service rendered by the irrigation company was a public service, the court in Miller v. Hagerman Irrig. Co. (1915) 20 N. M. 604, 151 Pac. 763, held that a corporation organized for the purpose of collecting water from a public stream of the state, conveying and delivering it to such consumers as would contract with it for a permanent water right for irrigation purposes, could not be compelled to carry water for hire for a person who had not contracted with it for a water right, and who demanded the carriage of water from a source other than that which the corporation employed. The court said it did not wish to be understood as deciding that the service demanded by the plaintiff was a public service, but that in no event could the defendant, under the circumstances, be compelled to render the same upon the ground that it was a public service corporation; that such a corporation might limit its service to a class which it was designed to serve; that it might classify the public and supply water only to the owners of a restricted district; and that it needed no citation of precedent for the general proposition that no public service corporation could be compelled, as was sought in that case, to render a service entirely different in character from that for which it was organized.

A finding that an irrigation company operates "a water system for compensation" is not the equivalent of a finding that it is engaged in applying its water to a public use. Del Mar Water, Light & P. Co. v. Eshleman (1914) 167 Cal. 666, 140 Pac. 591, rehearing denied in (1914) 167 Cal. 682, 140 Pac. 948.

In San Diego Flume Co. v. Souther (1898) 32 C. C. A. 548, 61 U. S. App. 134, 90 Fed. 164, affirmed on rehearing in (1900) 44 C. C. A. 143, 104 Fed. 706, the court said that corporations engaged in the business of furnishing water for irrigation, under the laws of California, whether they acquired the water by appropriation or otherwise, were private corporations; that they were nowhere declared to be public or quasi public corporations. But the court stated that, for reasons affecting the public welfare, they were given the right of eminent domain, and, in order that the use of the water might be fairly and equitably adjusted to consumers, it was provided that, in a certain contingency, the rate to be paid by the consumer might be fixed in a manner prescribed by law; that the use was public only to the extent that the corporation might be compelled to furnish the water, provided it had capacity to do so, to all who received and paid for it, and that the compensation should be fixed by law in case the parties could not agree. The question at issue was the validity of contracts fixing rates, where the public authorities had not acted in the matter. The public nature of the irrigation company is recognized in a later appeal in the same case (1903) 57 C. C. A. 561, 121 Fed. 347.

In Lake Koen Nav. Reservoir & Irrig. Co. v. Klein (1901) 63 Kan. 484, 65 Pac. 684, which was a condemnation proceeding, the court recognized the right of the legislature and of the courts to regulate the rates of irrigation companies on the ground that they are quasi public carriers, and held that a statute authorizing such companies to fix rates for water furnished must be construed as subject to the provision that the rates must be reasonable and just.

In a number of cases before the California Railroad Commission, irrigation companies have been held to be public utilities.

Thus, it has been held by the Commission that the fact that an irrigation company organized as a public utility, which has held itself out to serve anyone within the area of service for compensation, has entered into water-right contracts, does not prevent it, even as to the lands covered by such contracts, from being a public utility, subject to the jurisdiction of the state Railroad Commission. Nunn v. Sutter-Butte Canal Co. (1918; Cal.) P.U.R.1918E, 563. To a similar effect is Re Madera Canal & Irrig. Co. (1917; Cal.) P.U.R.1917F, 642.

A water company which, among other things, owns, controls, and manages a water system in California, and which is not organized for the purpose of delivering water to its stockholders or members at cost, but is engaged in the business of selling water for compensation to purchasers of land, and to portions of the public located within certain boundaries, which has held itself out as willing to sell water to a certain syndicate, its successors and assigns, and which has a monopoly of the business of transmitting water for sale, rental, or distribution in a certain region, is a public utility, subject to the jurisdiction of the state Railroad Commission, and it is immaterial that the company requires consumers to enter into contracts before rendering service. Los Molinos Citrus Farms Co. v. Cone Land Water Co. (1915; Cal.) P.U.R.1915F, 554.

A land company owning and operating a water system, which undertakes to supply water for compensation to all who apply within a designated tract of land to which the water was dedicated, is a public utility subject to the jurisdiction of the state Railroad Commission, and not a mutual company, although it was the intention of the land company that ultimately the water system should be operated upon a mutual basis for the sole benefit of the landowners. Comp-

A company that holds itself out to serve the public within a given area with water upon specified terms is a public utility. Berry v. Ora Loma Farms Co. (1917; Cal.) P.U.R.1917F, 631.

It was held also that the water company was not relieved of its character of a public utility by requiring, as a condition to furnishing service, the execution of contracts establishing rates and rules for the use of water. Ibid.

And it was held in Berry v. Ora Loma Farms Co. (Cal.) supra, that a provision in a contract of an irrigation company that the service was in effect that of an agency operating temporarily as an agent preliminary to the taking over and operating the system by mutual companies did not relieve the company of its present character of a public utility, subject to the jurisdiction of the state Railroad Commission, where the water was being delivered generally to water users who had no stock in a mutual concern, and had no voice in the establishment of the rates, nor the fixing of conditions other than those in the contract.

Irrigation companies organized as public utilities, which have appropriated water for the irrigation of certain lands, and have so applied it, which have obtained franchises from certain counties as public utilities, which have held themselves out to serve anyone within the area of service for compensation, and which, by advertising or otherwise, have solicited business generally from everyone within such area, are public utilities subject to the jurisdiction of the state Railroad Commission. Nunn v. Sutter-Butte Canal Co. (1918; Cal.) P.U.R.1918E, 563.

A land development company operating a water system in connection with its colonization scheme is a public utility with respect thereto, where it serves many persons not stockholders, at established rates. Monte Vista Valley Bd. of Trade v. Western Em- pire Suburban Farms Asso. (1918; Cal.) P.U.R.1918C, 748.

It was held in Re Lake Hemet Water Co. (1916; Cal.) P.U.R.1917A, 458, that a water company which served consumers who were not stockholders, at established rates filed with the state Railroad Commission, and had always held itself out to serve, in accordance with its existing rules and regulations, any user, and had submitted itself to the jurisdiction of the Commission, was a public utility, under the Constitution and statutes of California, although it originally served only holders of water-right certificates.

A water company supplying water for domestic and irrigation purposes is a public utility under the laws of California, although its service is rendered by virtue of contracts to furnish water to lots within a certain tract of land. Gittings v. Windsor Water Co. (1915; Cal.) P.U.R.1915B, 1069.

The California Railroad Commission held in Re North Moneta Garden Lands Water Co. (1915; Cal.) P.U.R. 1915A, 645, that a corporation organized to carry on the business of a water company in all its branches, for the supplying of certain lands and the occupants thereof with water for irrigation or domestic uses, or both, was not a mutual water company, but a public utility, subject to the jurisdiction of the Railroad Commission, where only a portion of its stock was made appurtenant to the land, and the control of the company was vested in outside parties. The statute provided that whenever any private corporation or association was organized for the purpose solely of delivering water to its stockholders or members, at cost, and delivered water to no one except its stockholders or members at cost, such corporation or association was not a public utility, and not subject to the jurisdiction of the state Railroad Commission.

III. Mutual and private companies in general.

For cases of private corporations which sell land with a water right, see IV. infra. That irrigation companies are not in all respects common carriers, see II. b, supra. See also San Diago Flume Co. v. Souther (Fed.) under II. c, supra, recognizing the private character of an irrigation company in some respects, although taking the view that its rates were subject to regulation, and that it might be compelled to furnish water.

The private nature of irrigation companies has been determined or assumed in a number of cases. And while the cases of this nature are not so numerous as those holding irrigation companies to be public service or quasi public corporations, it appears to be well settled that the mere fact that a company is delivering water for irrigation purposes does not, in the absence of express constitutional or statutory provision, necessarily make it a public service or quasi public corporation, or clothe it with a public interest, so as to subject it to public supervision. It may occupy the status of a mere private corporation, if it does not hold itself out to serve consumers generally under its canal, but only its stockholders or those with whom it has fixed contractual relations. This view is supported by the following cases: Slosser v. Salt River Valley Canal Co. (1901) 7 Ariz. 376, 65 Pac. 332; ALLEN v. RAILROAD COMMISSION (reported herewith) ante, 249; McFadden v. Los Angeles County (1888) 74 Cal. 571, 16 Pac. 397; Hildreth v. Montecito Creek Water Co. (1903) 139 Cal. 22, 72 Pac. 395, reversing (1902) 7 Cal. Unrep. 44, 70 Pac. 672; Burr v. Maclay Rancho Water Co. (1911) 160 Cal. 268, 116 Pac. 715; Garrison v. North Pasadena Land & Water Co. (1912) 163 Cal. 235, 124 Pac. 1009; Thayer v. California Development Co. (1912) 164 Cal. 117, 128 Pac. 21; Del Mar Water, Light & P. Co. v. Eshleman (1914) 167 Cal. 666, 140 Pac. 591, rehearing denied in (1914) 167 Cal. 682, 140 Pac. 948; Franscioni v. Soledad Land & Water Co. (1915) 170 Cal. 221, 149 Pac. 161; J. M. Howells Co. v. Corning Irrig. Co. (1918) 177 Cal. 513, 171 Pac. 100; Stevinson Water Users' Asso. v. Stevenson (Cal.; Decision No. 4222, Case No. 855, March 31, 1917) P.U.R.1917E, 539 (abstract); Sand Creek Lateral Irrig. Co. v. Davis (1892) 17 Colo. 326, 29 Pac. 742; State ex rel. Coco v. Riverside Irrig. Co. (1917) 142 La. 10, 76 So. 216; Larned v. Jenkins (1918) 102 Neb. 796, 169 N. W. 723; Rowles v. Hadden (1919) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 210 S. W. 251; Knight v. Oldham (1919) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 210 S. W. 567.

In the absence of special constitutional or statutory provisions, it seems to be clear from the authorities that a mutual irrigation company which supplies water to its stockholders only, at cost, is not a public service or quasi public corporation. But there are several cases in which the language of the court is to the contrary.

A mutual irrigation company devoting the water which it diverts exclusively to the use of its own stockholders, and not to the general public, is not engaged in a public service, and is not a public utility. J. M. Howells Co. v. Corning Irrig. Co. (1918) 177 Cal. 513, 171 Pac. 100.

It was held also in McFadden v. Los Angeles County (1888) 74 Cal. 571, 16 Pac. 397, that a corporation organized for the purpose of supplying water for irrigation purposes to its stockholders only, at cost, was not within the statute authorizing boards of supervisors to fix water rates. The court said: "We think the answer in the particulars above set forth shows that the water was acquired and held for the use of the stockholders of the corporation only, and not for sale, distribution, or rental to the public generally. . . . An individual can certainly acquire water to be used on his own land. With such use a board of supervisors would have nothing to do. We know of no reason why individuals cannot associate themselves, take on a corporate form, and acquire water to be used on their own lands. When this is done, we are of opinion that a board of supervisors can have no more power over the rates to be paid by the stockholders than in the case of individuals."

A mutual irrigation company not organized for profit, but for the sole purpose of delivering water to its stockholders, was said in Eldredge v. Mill Ditch Co. (1919) 90 Or. 590, 177

Pac. 989, not to be a public service corporation as that term is generally applied, and not to be a common carrier of water. The court said that, nevertheless, such a corporation has many elements of a quasi public nature; that it was dealing with property which belonged originally to the public and was of a public character; that the legislature had conferred upon it the power of eminent domain, and had declared its use of the water to be a public and beneficial use and public necessity; that it was distributing water to a portion of the public,—to how large a portion did not appear; and that it seemed that such a corporation might be fairly classed as a quasi public one, regardless of the fact that it was not a general company, and was not engaged in furnishing water to all comers. The court said further that the recognition of the public character of such corporations was constantly broadening, and that it seemed difficult longer to distinguish between corporations which served identically the same purpose because one dealt with the entire public and another dealt with a definite group. It was held that the property of the irrigation company was not subject to sale on execution; this decision, however, being based not on the ground that the company was a quasi public corporation, the court stating that it was not necessary to decide how far its water rights and franchises were exempt from execution on this ground, but on the ground that it was a holding company, trustee, or agent for the real owners of the water, the users thereof.

But a mutual irrigation company which furnished water generally for irrigation only when there was a surplus in its ditches after supplying the needs of its stockholders was said in Baker City Mut. Irrig. Co. v. Baker City (1911) 58 Or. 310, 110 Pac. 392, 113 Pac. 9, to be impressed with a public character, and to hold its property subject to an exercise of the police power of the state to a greater degree than a private person. The question involved was the right of the city to make regulations as to the use of the streets by the irrigation company, which had constructed irrigation ditches along the curbs of the streets prior to the incorporation of the city.

The mere appropriation of water of a stream by a corporation for irrigation purposes is not, under the California statutes, ipso facto a dedication or appropriation to public use; to accomplish this result there must follow the appropriation some act or declaration of the corporation, dedicating it to such use. Thayer v. California Development Co. (1912) 164 Cal. 117, 128 Pac. 21.

The use of water for irrigation is not public unless the water is available, as of right, upon equal terms, to all landowners of the class and within the area to be benefited, who can get water from the ditches to their land; if the dispenser of water has the right to say who shall have it, and upon what terms, selling to one and refusing to sell to another at will, it is not devoted to public use. Ibid.

The provision of the California Constitution that "the use of all water now appropriated, or that may hereafter be appropriated for sale, rental, or distribution, is hereby declared to be a public use, and subject to the regulation and control of the state," was held in Thayer v. California Development Co. (Cal.) supra, not necessarily to create a public use whenever any water was sold or distributed, regardless of the number of persons to whom it was delivered, or the manner or character of the disposition made of it. See quotation from this case in ALLEN v. RAILROAD COMMISSION (reported herewith) ante, 249.

And a constitutional provision declaring that the use of all water appropriated for sale or distribution is a public use should not be construed to mean that all water which is distributed among a number of persons is, from that fact alone, to be considered as devoted to a public use. Hildreth v. Montecito Creek Water Co. (1903) 139 Cal. 22, 72 Pac. 395.

So, the fact that the owners of land sold under a water system, to whom water is sold for use for irrigation purposes upon their own lands and as an appurtenance thereto, are numerous, does not convert the several private uses into a public use within the control of the Public Service Commission. ALLEN v. RAILROAD COMMISSION (reported herewith). In this case it was held that constitutional and statutory provisions declaring that every private corporation which furnishes water to or for the public, or which sells, rents, or delivers water to any person whatever under contract, or otherwise, is a public utility, must be construed to apply only to corporations which have in fact devoted their property to public use.

An irrigation ditch, constructed, repaired, and controlled by two or more persons, does not become public property, merely because the several persons interested in it have not accurately defined their respective rights therein or in the water flowing in it, nor because they have, by election or otherwise, selected a person to distribute the water among those who have contributed to the construction and maintenance of the ditch; such mode of construction and management of the ditch and its waters does not operate as a dedication of the ditch or its waters to the public. Cate v. Sanford (1879) 54 Cal. 24, 8 Mor. Min. Rep. 124.

An irrigation company which confines its service to the diversion and carriage of water from a public stream as the agent of particular appropriators of water, with whom it has a fixed contractual relation, is a private agency, owing no duty to others, whether appropriators or not. Slosser v. Salt River Valley Canal Co. (1901) 7 Ariz. 376, 65 Pac. 332.

It was held in Larned v. Jenkins (1918) 102 Neb. 796, 169 N. W. 723, that the Nebraska statute providing that "a multiplicity of outlets shall at all times be avoided so far as may be, and the same shall be under the control of a superintendent," etc., did not apply to owners in common of a ditch for irrigation purposes who were not carriers of water for hire.

The fact that a private irrigation company, organized for the purpose of supplying water to its stockholders only, furnished surplus water for several years to another company as a matter of accommodation, under express agreement that the latter should not acquire any right to the continued supply of water, was held in Garrison v. North Pasadena Land & Water Co. (1912) 163 Cal. 235, 124 Pac. 1009, not to entitle consumers of the latter company to compel continuance of the supply on the theory that the company had become a public service corporation.

And it was held that water appropriated by a corporation from a stream to irrigate lands in a specified area was not dedicated to public use so that delivery of water could be compelled by a landowner having no contractual relations with the company, where it made no declaration devoting the water to a public use and did not offer it for sale generally, but supplied the water only through subsidiary mutual water companies organized by it, which distributed the water at fixed prices to stockholders only. Thayer v. California Development Co. (1912) 164 Cal. 117, 128 Pac. 21.

A corporation which was engaged in the raising of rice, and in the supplying of water through its canal system to its own land for this purpose and to the land of others for a percentage of the rice crop, and which had acquired its right of way by purchase, and not by condemnation, was held in State ex rel. Coco v. Riverside Irrig. Co. (1917) 142 La. 10, 76 So. 216, not to be a public utility within the meaning of a statute requiring corporations operating public utilities under a franchise granted by the state to make certain reports to the secretary of state.

A land company cannot be found to be an irrigation utility upon evidence of mere statements on letterheads and circulars that it owns the canals supplying the land with water. Stevinson Water Users' Asso. v. Stevenson (Cal.; Decision No. 4222, Case No. 855, March 31, 1917) P.U.R. 1917E, 539 (abstract).

(Colo.)* under VI., infra, where an irrigation company set up the defense that it was a mutual company, and not obliged to furnish water, but the court held, in view of the charter provisions of the company, that it was not a mutual company; Hildreth v. Montecito Creek Water Co. (Cal.) under V. infra, where the transfer by private owners of a water system to a corporation was held not to change the use from private to public. #### IV. Sale of land with water rights.

For cases where, in addition to supplying water to land sold by it with a water right, the irrigation company supplied water to other consumers under its canal, see II. c, supra.

ALLEN v. RAILROAD COMMISSION (reported herewith) ante, 249, holds that a devotion of water to a public use did not result so as to subject to control of the state Railroad Commission contracts with consumers, made on a sale of land and water rights, where the irrigation company did not hold itself out to serve generally consumers under its canal.

A company engaged in selling land owned by it, and, as an incident of the sale, furnishing water for irrigation and domestic use to the purchasers, and no others, at a fixed contract rate, is not a public utility, and therefore not subject to regulation by the Oregon Public Service Commission. De Pauw University v. Public Service Commission (1917) P.U.R. 1918C, 274, 247 Fed. 183. In subsequent proceedings in (1918) 253 Fed. 848, it was held also that the company was not a public utility.

And water taken by an irrigation company to fulfil its private contractual obligations to deliver water to certain lots which it has sold with a water right, and not offered to the public generally or to all who may want it within a certain territory, is not taken for a public, but for a private, use. Burr v. Macclay Rancho Water Co. (1911) 160 Cal. 268, 116 Pac. 715.

A corporation which had not exercised the power of eminent domain, which was incorporated prior to the enactment of the Texas Statute of 1913, requiring irrigation companies to supply water to landowners along their ditches at reasonable rates, creating a board of water engineers, and giving it power to fix rates, and which merely owned springs and supplied water therefrom to purchasers of land sold by it, was held in Knight v. Oldham (1919) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 210 S. W. 567, not subject to the control of the state board of water engineers.

But where the contracts provided that the water should be supplied at such rates as might be fixed by law, it was held in Palermo Land & Water Co. v. Railroad Commission (1916) 173 Cal. 380, P.U.R.1917A, 447, 160 Pac. 228, that an irrigation company which contracted to supply water to those purchasing land of it was not engaged in a private service within the rule that the distribution of water for such purposes was essentially a matter of private contract, but was a public utility, subject to the jurisdiction of the Railroad Commission.

And the California Railroad Commission in Re Fresno Farms Co. (1915; Cal.) P.U.R.1915B, 324, held that a land company which owned valuable water rights, and owned and controlled ditches and laterals for the conveyance and delivery of water to irrigate land which it sold, was a public utility, although it does not appear that the company undertook to supply water for irrigation purposes except to purchasers of its land, and the distribution of water for irrigation to these lands was partly by contract with another irrigation company.

The Washington Public Service Commission has held that it has jurisdiction over the rates of an irrigation distribution system, although built merely to promote the sale of lands. Burford v. Consumers' Ditch Co. (1916; Wash.) P.U.R.1916D, 448. The Commission referred to the provision in the Washington Public Service Law that the term "water company," as used in the statute, should include every corporation controlling, operating or managing any water system for hire within the state.

And the obligations of a private company organized for the purpose of selling arid lands and furnishing water for their irrigation were said in Shafford v. White Bluffs Land & Irrig. Co. (1911) 63 Wash. 10, 114 Pac. 883, Ann. Cas. 1912B, 133, to be quasi public, and no arbitrary action under the guise of rules or regulations was tolerable. The point involved in the case was the right of the company to adopt an "alternating plan" in delivering water to consumers.

As to effect of the transfer to a corporation of a water system owned by an individual to distribute water to land sold by him, see Franscioni v. Soledad Land & Water Co. (Cal.) infra, V.

That a water company which is a public agency may not discontinue its service in whole or in part so as to become a mere private agency was held in Gould v. Maricopa Canal Co. (1904) 8 Ariz. 429, 76 Pac. 598, overruling the former decision of the court on this point in Slosser v. Salt River Valley Canal Co. (1901) 7 Ariz. 376, 65 Pac. 332. The court said that while a canal company, in the nature of things, could not be a common carrier, as that term was used in law, yet it was a quasi public servant, and, as such servant, having received benefits from the public, owed a duty to conduct its business as a carrier of water in such a way as might best promote the interests of the community when this might be done without sacrifice of any of its property rights; that the community was interested in the permanent reclamation and improvement of land; and that if a right of appropriation might be made of no use to its holder through the refusal of a canal company to divert and carry the water to which such holder was entitled, and which the canal company had theretofore diverted and carried, the holding of such right of appropriation by such precarious tenure would not only impair its value to the holder, but would discourage the making of improvements and the putting of the land to which it was attached to its highest and best use; that to the extent, therefore, that such a canal company has diverted and carried water from a public stream, and to the extent to which this water has been applied by appropriators for the necessary irrigation of their lands, the canal company must continue the service so long as it is required by the appropriators and the water is available.

And the rule is laid down in Riverside Land Co. v. Jarvis (1917) 174 Cal. 316, 168 Pac. 54, that water dedicated to public use cannot lawfully be converted into a private use so as to create a private preferential right thereto for the benefit of a specific parcel of land. The principle involved cannot, of course, be treated exhaustively in the present annotation, because it is supported by other cases than those involving irrigation companies.

One who has appropriated water for the purpose of sale, rental, and distribution to the public, cannot, upon disposing of his water system, reserve to himself a portion of the right which he had appropriated to public use. Leavitt v. Lassen Irrig. Co. (1909) 157 Cal. 82, 29 L.R.A. (N.S.) 213, 106 Pac. 404.

That private rights cannot be carved out of a public use of water for irrigation purposes, see Limoneira Co. v. Railroad Commission (1917) 174 Cal. 232, P.U.R. 1917D, 183, 162 Pac. 1033, which is set out in ALLEN v. RAILROAD COMMISSION (reported herewith) ante, 249, and which involves an irrigation company admittedly a public utility.

But a water company engaged in distributing water to persons to whose lands it has agreed to deliver it for irrigation, upon a use which is private, and not public or general, may, with the consent of the owners of the right to receive such water, change the use from a private to a public use, so as to make the service and terms of delivery subject to regulation and control by public authorities; and all the parties concerned and consenting thereto, including the corporation engaged in such distribution, will thereafter be bound to conform to the rates, rules, and regulations of the service as established by the public authorities. Franscioni v. Soledad Land & Water Co. (1915) 170 Cal. 221, 149 Pac. 161.

It was accordingly held in Franscioni v. Soledad Land & Water Co. (Cal.) supra, that a change from a private to a public use of water had been effected where, pursuant to a statute applicable only to persons and corporations engaged in the sale or distribution of water for public use, a water company which had theretofore been engaged in supplying water for irrigation as a private corporation joined in a petition with the inhabitants and taxpayers of the county, to the board of supervisors, to regulate and control the rates of the company, and the board fixed the company's rates, which were acquiesced in by all parties for a period of six years. It was held that the dedication of the water to public use could not be revoked by the company and the use changed to a private use, at least without the consent of all the beneficiaries of such use.

But the mere fact that a corporation takes over a water system owned by an individual, who is distributing water to land which he sells, and that the corporation undertakes to carry out his obligation to deliver water to the several purchasers of the land, does not change the use of the water from private to public. Ibid.

And in Hildreth v. Montecito Creek Water Co. (1903) 139 Cal. 22, 72 Pac. 395, it was held that the mere fact that a water system and the distribution of water thereunder were transferred to a corporation by private owners did not necessarily change the use from private to public, or constitute a dedication of the water to a public use, even though the Constitution provided that the use of all water appropriated for sale, rental, or distribution was a public use. The court said: "Where a number of persons owning land are each entitled to take water from a common stream or source for use upon their respective tracts of land, either by virtue of an appropriation under the Civil Code, or by prescription, or as riparian owners, the water right of each is individual and several, and must be considered as private property, and not the subject of public use, although the persons so owning interests in the stream are very numerous, and their lands include a large neighborhood. The owners of such water rights may make a joint diversion, and may carry the water from the point of diversion in a common conduit, made with common funds; and in such a case, in the absence of a special contract to the contrary, they will be the owners in common of the diversion works and conduits; but the respective water rights will remain several, and will remain private property. If the persons owning such rights see fit to form a corporation, and delegate to such corporation the work of making the diversion and distribution and of constructing and keeping in repair the dams and conduits, reserving to themselves their rights in the water, as was done in this case, they do not thereby dedicate or appropriate to public use the water thus reserved and used by them. The corporation becomes merely their agent for the purpose of serving their several interests, so far as they may be served by a common system of works, the water remaining the subject of individual ownership and private use as before."

Also in Sand Creek Lateral Irrig. Co. v. Davis (1892) 17 Colo. 326, 29 Pac. 742, it was held that the fact that parties constructing an irrigation ditch became incorporated did not change the use thereof from private to public, so as to prevent its being a private ditch within the meaning of a statute authorizing the enlargement, on payment of compensation, and use in common of private ditches, so as to prevent duplication of ditches through improved or occupied land.

See Palermo Land & Water Co. v. Railroad Commission (Cal.) infra, IX., where an irrigation company was held to have changed its use from private to public, so far as concerned its own right thereafter to assert that it was not a public service corporation, by voluntarily applying to the state Railroad Commission to fix its rates.

VI. Effect of charter provisions or provisions of statute under which company is incorporated.

The cases in general hold that the mere fact that an irrigation company is authorized in its articles of incorporation to engage in the distribution and sale of water in such manner as would render it a public service corporation will not necessarily fix its status as such a corporation; it may or may not avail itself of its charter privileges; and its mode of operation rather than its charter powers is controlling. But in some instances the courts have looked to the articles of incorporation to aid in determination of the question whether the corporation was a public utility.

The fact that a water company is authorized by its charter to sell water to the public does not, ipso facto, make it a public utility, if it has not in fact held itself out as ready and willing to furnish water to all who may apply within a given area, but in the sale of land, in which it is engaged, agrees to furnish water on certain terms and conditions to the purchasers, and no others, and merely undertakes to furnish water in fulfillment of these private contracts, and not to the public generally. De Pauw University v. Public Service Commission (1918) 253 Fed. 848. The court said the charter authority did not mark the nature of the operating companies, but was merely a naked authority to do business, and until pursued in a certain way did not make the companies public utilities.

And the fact that the articles of incorporation of an irrigation company empower it to engage in public service does not, of itself, constitute proof that it is engaged in such public service, or that it has dedicated its property to a public use. Del Mar Water, Light & P. Co. v. Eshleman (1914) 167 Cal. 666, 140 Pac. 581, rehearing denied in (1914) 167 Cal. 682, 140 Pac.

948. In this case the articles of incorporation conferred on the company the power to sell and distribute water for domestic, irrigation, and all other purposes, and to acquire, hold, and operate waterworks and distributing systems for these purposes. The court said that the power given in these articles of incorporation did not necessarily imply an intention to engage in public service; that "one may acquire and hold a water supply and waterworks, and thereby distribute and sell water for domestic use and irrigation or other purposes, without engaging in public service. It may make such sales to particular persons and in such a manner that the public would not be entitled to it. The mere fact, therefore, that a company having such powers has acquired a water supply and constructed waterworks constituting a system, which it is operating for compensation does not necessarily justify the conclusion that it is engaged in public service, or that its water is dedicated to public use. The only effect of the adoption of such articles by a corporation is to give it the capacity to engage in such public service if it so desires. After having become incorporated in this manner, it has the power to engage in such service in the same sense that an individual has power to engage in such service. It may or may not do so, and until it does, it cannot be said to be subject to the jurisdiction of the Railroad Commission."

That a charter declaration on the part of a water company, among other purposes, to supply the inhabitants of towns with water for domestic purposes, does not, standing alone, constitute a dedication of all the company's water to a public use, see ALLEN v. RAILROAD COMMISSION (reported herewith) ante, 249.

In Combs v. Agricultural Ditch Co. (1892) 17 Colo. 146, 31 Am. St. Rep. 275, 28 Pac. 966, the court considered the purposes of an irrigation company as expressed in its charter, in denying the contention that the company was not obliged to deliver water because it was a mutual company, stating: "Under the Constitution and laws of this state a ditch company carrying water for general purposes of irrigation cannot arbitrarily refuse to supply water to an actual and bona fide consumer making seasonable application and offering proper compensation therefor. . . . The defendant attempted to justify his refusal to deliver the water upon the ground that by the declared objects of its incorporation it was a mutual company; that it was not organized for the purpose of carrying water for others for hire; that its only obligation in the matter of carrying water was to supply its stockholders. An inspection of the certificate by which the [irrigation company] was incorporated, as introduced upon the trial, does not sustain this ground of defense. . . . There is nothing in the certificate to indicate that it might not be the legitimate business of the defendant company to carry and supply water for irrigation generally to those occupying land within the vicinity of the ditch. Hence, we do not have to consider whether a purely mutual company might or might not stand on a different footing."

It was held also in Combs v. Agricultural Ditch Co. (Colo.) supra, that refusal to deliver water could not be justified by a provision in the by-laws of the company that no water should be sold from the company's ditch except to stockholders.

The California Railroad Commission in Ferrasci v. Empire Water Co. (1915; Cal.) P.U.R.1915B, 438, held that a water company empowered to distribute water for compensation, whose articles of incorporation and by-laws did not state that the water was to be distributed to stockholders only, or limit the territory to be served, was a public utility, within the constitutional and statutory provisions of California, although it did not own the water it distributed, but acted merely as the agent of landowners in such distribution.

It was held that a water company was not a mere private agency, but was a public agency which might be compelled to furnish water for irrigation purposes without discrimination except as between prior appropriators, where its articles of incorporation did not indicate a purpose to limit its service as a carrier of water to any particular land or to serve its shareholders only, but expressed a purpose to conduct the business of supplying a portion of a river valley with water for irrigation, manufacturing, and other purposes, and the history of the company showed that it had not limited its service to shareholders, but had, for a number of years after its organization, supplied indiscriminately all landowners under its canal who applied for water, although later it discriminated in fixing rates as between shareholders and other consumers, and, at a still later period, furnished water to its shareholders and to their lessees, and declined to furnish water to others. Gould v. Maricopa Canal Co. (1904) 8 Ariz. 429, 76 Pac. 598, followed in Salt River Valley Canal Co. v. Slosser (1904) — Ariz. —, 76 Pac. 1125, and Salt River Valley Canal Co. v. Van Fossen (1904) — Ariz. —, 76 Pac. 1126. A similar conclusion was reached in Slosser v. Salt River Valley Canal Co. (1901) 7 Ariz. 376, 65 Pac. 332, and in Salt River Valley Canal Co. v. Nelssen (1906) 10 Ariz. 9, 12 L.R.A.(N.S.) 711, 85 Pac. 117, 16 Ann. Cas. 796.

It was said in Price v. Riverside Land & Irrigating Co. (1880) 56 Cal. 431, that every corporation organized under the Statute of 1862, "An Act to Authorize the Incorporation of Canal Companies and the Construction of Canals," was impressed with a public trust,—the duty of furnishing water, if it had water, to all those who came within the class or community for whose alleged benefit it was created. The statute, however, is not set out; but the irrigation company in this case was organized to supply water "to any person or corporation, for irrigation, mechanical, or other purposes."

Corporations organized under the Texas Statute of 1895, which declares the unappropriated waters of the state to be public property, authorizes the formation of corporations to construct irrigation systems for the purpose of conducting water to all persons entitled to the same, gives irrigation companies the right to eminent domain, and entitles all persons owning land adjoining an irrigation canal to be supplied with water from such canal, are quasi public corporations. See Imperial Irrig. Co. v. Jayne (1911) 104 Tex. 395, 138 S. W. 575, Ann. Cas. 1914B, 322, and other Texas cases cited under II. a, supra.

VII. Effect of provisions in appropriation notice.

The fact that the notice of appropriation of the water by a corporation states that it is appropriated for "general rental, sale, and disposition for the purposes of irrigation," does not alone make the appropriating corporation a public utility, if the company thereafter undertakes to furnish water only to purchasers of land from it in fulfilment of private contracts with such purchasers for water on certain terms and conditions. De Pauw University v. Public Service Commission (1918) 253 Fed. 848.

VIII. Effect on remainder of dedication to public use of part of water supply.

In ALLEN v. RAILROAD COMMISSION (reported herewith) ante, 249, it was held that a water company did not, by undertaking to furnish a water supply to a municipality which would require only about 3 per cent of its water, become a public utility as to the remainder, sold under private contracts.

The rule was laid down in Thayer v. California Development Co. (1912) 164 Cal. 117, 128 Pac. 21, that a part of a stream, or a part of a single appropriation therefrom, may be devoted to public use and another part entirely to private use.

So, the fact that an irrigation company, which appropriated water in a stream in California at a point near the Mexican boundary, and made a detour of its canal into Mexico before reaching the Imperial valley in California, carried on a public service in Mexico in the supply of water to those along the line of the canal, did not affect the character of the use of the water in California, but it might still

An irrigation company owning a water supply may dedicate a part of it only to public use, and reserve the remainder for private purposes or private sale or disposition, as it sees fit. Del Mar Water, Light & P. Co. v. Eshleman (1914) 167 Cal. 666, 140 Pac. 591, rehearing denied in (1914) 167 Cal. 682, 140 Pac. 948.

It was held in Del Mar Water, Light, & P. Co. v. Eshleman (Cal.) supra, that statutory provisions empowering the state Railroad Commission to direct any public utility to extend its plant and enlarge the territory supplied should be construed as limited in their application to such public service corporations as have devoted their entire property to the use of the entire public, or to those which may have undertaken to supply a certain district, and have failed or refused to furnish adequate service when it was within their means reasonably to furnish such service, and not as authorizing the Commission to order an irrigation company which has devoted only a part of its property to public use, to extend its system, and devote all or a large part of its water supply to such use.

The proposition that an irrigation company may devote its property and a part of its supply of water to public service and retain a part for private use, and not become a public service corporation as to all by virtue of the dedication of a part, is supported by the case of Leavitt v. Lessen Irrig. Co. (1909) 157 Cal. 82, 29 L.R.A. (N.S.) 213, 106 Pac. 404, holding that one who, when appropriating water for sale, rental, and distribution to the public, makes at the same time an appropriation for the benefit of his own land, to be taken through the ditches constructed for the public use, would, after selling his public rights, be limited to the amount of water which he had been actually taking and applying to a beneficial use upon his land.

That a water company has declared itself to be a public utility and submitted to the jurisdiction of the Public Service Commission does not conclusively fix its status as a public utility. ALLEN v. RAILROAD COMMISSION (reported herewith) ante, 249.

But it was held in Palermo Land & Water Co. v. Railroad Commission (1916) 173 Cal. 380, P.U.R.1917A, 447, 160 Pac. 228, that an irrigation company, otherwise engaged in a private service, by applying to the state Railroad Commission for the establishment of rates, changed the use, as against it, from private to public, so as to make it subject to the jurisdiction of the Commission. It will be observed that in this case the irrigation company was subsequently objecting to the jurisdiction of the Commission, whereas in ALLEN v. RAILROAD COMMISSION (reported herewith), the irrigation company, by submission to the jurisdiction of the Railroad Commission, was seeking to declare itself a public utility, to the impairment of the vested rights of holders of water contracts.

See, in this connection, the decision of the California Railroad Commission, in Re Lake Hemet Water Co. (Cal.) under II. c, supra, where the fact that the company had submitted itself to the jurisdiction of the state Railroad Commission was considered as a factor in determining its status.

SUPERIOR COURT OF THE STATE OF CALIFORNIA IN AND FOR THE COUNTY OF RIVERSIDE et al.California Supreme Court (In Banc) — September 24, 1919.

(— Cal. —, 184 Pac. 15.)

Judge — disqualification — wife a stockholder in corporation.

1. That the wife of a judge holds stock in a corporation which is a party to a suit before him does not disqualify him from sitting in the cause under a statute working such disqualification if he is related to a party to the cause.

Pleading — demurrer — effect.

2. In considering a cause upon demurrer to the petition, facts not stated in the petition, although pertinent to its prayer, cannot be considered.

[See 21 R. C. L. 504, 505.]

— ownership of stock.

3. A mere recital that a judge had stated that he had disposed of all his stock in a corporation is not an allegation of the fact of his ownership.

4. Lack of material averments in pleading cannot be cured by statements of counsel in argument nor by statements in affidavits.

Prohibition — jurisdiction — courts.

5. The mere fact that jurisdiction of appeals in equity cases is by the Constitution vested in a particular court does not prevent another court from taking jurisdiction of a proceeding to prohibit a trial court from proceeding to hear an equity cause.

Venue — change — disqualification of judge.

6. A judge disqualified because of holding stock in a corporation party to a cause must grant a motion to transfer the cause to another judge, not deny the motion and call in another judge.

Judge — construction of statute.

7. Under the rule that the expression of one thing excludes all others, a judge is not disqualified to sit in a cause to which a corporation in which his wife holds stock is a party, where the statute works such disqualification if he is related to an officer of a corporation which is a party.

[See 25 R. C. L. 981.]

8. There is no presumption that the liability of a judge holding stock in a corporation for the debts of the concern had accrued with respect to a controversy subsequently brought before him at the time that he disposed of his stock, so as to disqualify him from sitting in the cause.

TRANSFER by the District Court of Appeal for the Second District to the Supreme Court for rehearing of a petition for a writ of prohibition to prevent respondents from proceeding with a certain cause in the Superior Court in which petitioners were plaintiffs. Writ denied.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. George B. Bush and D. B. Chapin for petitioners.

Messrs. A. Aird Adair and A. Heber Winder, for respondents:

The district court of appeal had no jurisdiction to issue any writ of prohibition in this case.

Shaw, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an application for a writ of prohibition to prevent the superior court of Riverside county from proceeding in a cause pending in said court wherein the said petitioners are plaintiffs, and the Security Investment Company and others are defendants. This proceeding for prohibition was begun in the district court of appeal for the second district and after decision there was transferred to this court for rehearing. The original petition was filed on December 16, 1918. An amended petition was filed on December 19, 1918.

Honorable Hugh H. Craig is the regularly elected judge of the superior court of Riverside county, before whom the cause originally came on for disposition. On December 9, 1918, the petitioners here, without notice to the other party, presented to Judge Craig, ex parte, a paper purporting to set forth a motion to change the place of trial in the action. The sole ground for the motion was stated therein as follows: "On account of the disqualification of yourself to try the same." The fact which caused the disqualification referred to was not stated. Petitioners did not then file said paper, or any papers in the case, but stated to the judge that they would renew the motion on the following day. On December 10, 1918, the petitioners filed an application to change the place of trial of said cause on the sole ground that the wife of the judge was a stockholder in the said corporation, and that Judge Craig was for that reason disqualified to try the cause or make any order therein, other than to change the place of trial, as prescribed by § 398 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The attorneys for the defendants appeared to this motion, and the hearing was postponed to December 12, 1918, on which day the parties appeared, the motion was argued by the respective attorneys, and was denied by the court. It was made to appear that the wife of Judge Craig had disposed of her stock in the corporation on December 10, 1918. On the same day Judge Craig requested Honorable J. W. Curtis, Judge of the superior court of San Bernardino county, to sit for him on the following day for the purpose of disposing of the said cause. On December 13, 1918, Judge Curtis presided in the said court, and the said cause was called for further proceedings. Thereupon the petitioners objected to any further proceedings therein, and moved the court to change the place of trial thereof, upon the ground that the wife of Judge Craig was a stockholder in the defendant corporation during the pendency of the action at all times prior to December 10, 1918; that on December 9, 1918, the petitioners had made the application above mentioned to Judge Craig; that they had filed a motion for change of place of trial on December 10, 1918, as above stated; that the matter was heard on December 12, 1918, at which time it had been denied by Judge Craig. This application was heard by Judge Curtis, then presiding in the court, and, after argument, was denied. Thereupon, as before stated, this proceeding in prohibition was instituted against said superior court, and also against Hugh H. Craig, as presiding judge thereof. The object of the proceeding is to restrain the said court from making any order in the said cause, except an order changing the place of trial to the nearest or most accessible superior court, the judge of which is not disqualified from trying the same.

The cause was submitted on a demurrer to the petition. The facts alleged are therefore admitted to exist. But other facts, though pertinent to the prayer of the petition, cannot be considered.

Upon the argument here, it was stated that Judge Craig had been the owner of stock in the corporation defendant prior to June 13, 1917, and it was urged that he was, and continued thereafter to be, disqualified by reason of such fact, so long as his direct liability as a stockholder continued to exist. On this point we need only say that neither in the petition nor in the notice of motion is it alleged that he ever owned any stock in said corporation. The mere recital of the fact that Judge Craig had stated "that he had disposed of all his stock in said corporation to his wife" is not an allegation of the fact of ownership. It cannot be regarded as such allegation, and particularly in view of the fact that it is not assigned, either in the petition or in any motion addressed to the superior court, as ground for the application to change the place of trial. Nor can statements made by counsel in argument, or statements in an affidavit filed in behalf of the —supplying deficiency.

respondent, cure the lack of a material allegation in the petition. This court, therefore, cannot consider the effect of such ownership, if, as a matter of fact, Judge Craig ever did own such stock. The decision of the case must depend wholly on the effect of the alleged and admitted fact that his wife was the owner thereof at the time the application was made to the court, when Judge Craig was presiding therein, to change the place of trial.

There is no merit in the motion of respondent to quash the writ of prohibition issued by the district court. The motion was based on the claim that the case before the superior court was an action in equity—a case in which appellate jurisdiction is, by the Constitution, lodged in the first instance in the supreme court alone (Const. art. 6, § 4), from which fact, it is argued, an original proceeding in prohibition to prevent action by the superior court in such a case is cognizable only in the supreme court. This assumption is not correct. The same section of the Constitution gives equal and concurrent jurisdiction to the district courts of appeal and to the supreme court to issue writs of prohibition in all proper cases. So far as jurisdiction to do so is concerned, the questions of appellate jurisdiction and of the nature of the action in which the act sought to be prohibited is threatened are entirely immaterial. As a matter of policy and practice, both this court and the district courts of appeal, respectively, have at times refused to take jurisdiction of an original proceeding, where the case involved was in the superior court and was originally appealable to the other court. Collins v. Superior Ct. 147 Cal. 264, 81 Pac. 509; Re Turner, — Cal. App. —, 177 Pac. 854. But this practice was not adopted because of any want of original jurisdiction in such cases in either court. This was expressly stated in the Collins Case.

If the fact that the wife of Judge Craig owned stock in the corporation on December 10, 1918, when the application was filed and presented to him as judge of the superior court, is sufficient to disqualify him from sitting or acting as judge in that action, there is no doubt, under our decisions, that it was his duty, upon the fact being established, to grant the application and make an order transferring the case as provided in § 398 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Livermore v. Brundage, 64 Cal. 299, 30 Pac. 848; Krumdiek v. Crump, 98 Cal. 119, 32 Pac. 800. There was but one judge of the superior court of Riverside county, and hence the rule stated in Oakland v. Oakland Water Front Co. 118 Cal. 249, 50 Pac. 268, that an action could be retained and tried by another judge of the same court, does not apply. If his disqualification depends upon a fact not within the knowledge of the judge, as might be the case, power to determine from the evidence whether or not the fact existed would be implied from the necessity of the case, but, when established, the mandate of § 398 would certainly apply and be imperative, as was held in said cases, leaving him no discretion in the matter. It is true, as was said in Paige v. Carroll, 61 Cal. 215, that if, before the motion was made, the disqualified judge had called in another judge, not disqualified, to sit for him in the cause, the judge so called in could properly deny the motion to change the place of trial. But in this case Judge Craig did not call in Judge Curtis to sit in the cause until after he had denied the motion, and therefore, as said in Upton v. Upton, 94 Cal. 28, 29 Pac. 411, it was "his duty to grant it," instead of denying the motion and thereafter calling in the judge. See also Barnhart v. Fulkert, 59 Cal. 130; Finn v. Spagnoli, 67 Cal. 330, 7 Pac. 746. The first question presented on the merits, therefore, is whether or not the ownership of the stock by his wife at the time the motion was regularly presented to him operated to disqualify him from trying the case.

The claim that the fact that the wife is a stockholder disqualifies the husband from trying the case as judge rests upon the following language of § 170 of the Code of Civil Procedure: "No justice, judge, or justice of the peace shall sit or act as such in any action or proceeding: 1. To which he is a party or in which he is interested. 2. When he is related to either party, or to an officer of a corporation which is a party, or to an attorney, counsel, or agent of either party, by consanguinity, or affinity, within the third degree, computed according to the rules of law."

A provision follows for the waiver by the parties of such disqualification under subdivision 2. It is not material here. The argument is that the wife, as holder of corporate stock, is the owner of an interest in the corporation; that the corporation represents her in such action, and acts for her protection and benefit, and consequently that she is a "party" to the action, within the meaning and scope of the first clause of subdivision 2. That a stockholder is not technically a party cannot be doubted. "When a corporation sues or is sued in its corporate name, the action is by or against the corporation itself as a legal entity, and its members are not in any legal sense parties to the action." 1 Clark & M. Priv. Corp. p. 15.

It is only where the corporation defendant refuses to defend the action, or, having begun a defense, it is made to appear that it will not prosecute the defense in good faith, that a stockholder may, upon a proper application showing the facts, be allowed to become a party and defend on behalf of the corporation. He must show that he cannot induce those in control of the corporation to do that which is right in the matter. Waymire v. San Francisco & S. M. R. Co. 112 Cal. 650, 44 Pac. 1086; 2 Clark & M.

Priv. Corp. p. 1690. Hence the use of the word "party" in the clause relied on does not signify that the ownership of stock by person related to the judge within the prohibited degree disqualifies the judge from trying a case against the corporation.

The succeeding clause clearly indicates that the legislature intended that it should not have that effect, for that clause states the fact which the legislature must be presumed to have considered necessary to disqualify the judge where a corporation is a party. It limits the disqualification to cases where the relative is an officer of the corporation. The rule of construction that the expression of one thing excludes all others applies, and it is therefore to be presumed that the legislature did not intend to create a disqualification by reason of the relationship of the judge to any person connected with the corporation except an officer thereof. That this is the proper construction of a statute prohibiting action by one who is related to a party to the suit is well established. It was directly held under a statute precisely like ours in this respect that the judge was not disqualified by his relationship to a stockholder. Searsburgh Turnp. Co. v. Cutler, 6 Vt. 322. And a statute prohibiting a sheriff or constable from serving process in a case to which he is a party, or is related to a party, does not apply to prevent him from serving process in a case where a corporation is a party and he is a stockholder therein. Adams v. Wiscasset Bank, 1 Me. 365, 10 Am. Dec. 88; Merchants' Bank v. Cook, 4 Pick. 415. The supreme court of Maine in the above case stated the reasons in very apt and convincing language as follows: "The argument arising from inconvenience is very strong. . . . Shares are continually changing owners; and a corporation of this kind if disposed to be evasive

These reasons apply with greater force to the present case. If the corporations of this state could disqualify a judge and obtain a change of the place of trial whenever some relative of the judge within the third degree was or should become a stockholder of such corporation, it might be made very difficult, as against many corporations, to find a judge or a court where the cause to which such corporation was a party could be tried. No great effort of the imagination is necessary to perceive the consequences of such a rule. In many cases it would operate to defeat justice. We are satisfied, therefore, that the subdivision should not be construed so as to include the stockholder as a party where the corporation only is named as such.

The petitioner relies on the decision in Howell v. Budd, 91 Cal. 342, 27 Pac. 747, in support of his position. In that case the sons of the judge were the vendees of certain persons claiming heirship to an estate under an executory contract by which such heirs agreed to convey to the sons an interest in the estate, in consideration of their services as attorneys in establishing the heirship. The decision in the case would settle the question of such heirship. The sons were therefore as much interested in the controversy as the parties themselves. Upon a distribution they would not be improper parties, and would have a right to appear in respect to their personal interests. The general notice of the proceeding to be given to all persons would be notice to them, as well as to every other person who claimed any interest in the estate. In view of this direct interest as compared with the remote and indirect interest of the stockholders of a corporation, and because of the provisions of the section itself above referred to implying the contrary intention in the case of corporations, we do not think this case should be extended to include cases like the one at bar. Our conclusion, therefore, is that Judge Craig was not disqualified to act in the matter by reason of his wife's ownership of stock in the corporation defendant.

We have shown that there is no allegation in the petition to the effect that Judge Craig was himself at any time a stockholder in said corporation. Inasmuch as it may be claimed that his ownership was a matter within his personal knowledge and that he should have taken cognizance thereof at the mere suggestion, it may be proper to present some further considerations on the subject. Upon the hearing in the district court of appeal an affidavit of Judge Craig was filed by the respondents, showing that he had not been the owner of any stock in the corporation since the date of June 13, 1917. There is no information obtainable from the record to show that ownership at that date would disqualify him. The cause was submitted, as we have said, upon a demurrer to the petition. The petition does not set forth the complaint in the action pending in the superior court, nor purport to state the substance thereof. No evidence was introduced at the hearing, either in the district court of appeal or in this court, as to the character of said action or as to the allegations of the complaint therein. The petitioners in their briefs set forth what purports to be a statement of some of the facts alleged in said complaint. As these facts were not alleged we cannot take notice of them when presented in this manner. It is true that the liability of a stockholder for the debts and liabilities of the corporation is direct and is created as soon as the corporate debt or liability is contracted or incurred (Const. art. 12, § 3), so that, if the liability involved in the action was contracted or incurred prior to the disposition by Judge Craig of his stock, as stated in his affidavit, he might still be interested in the action and be disqualified by subdivision 1 of § 170. But there can be no presumption in this case that such liability did exist at that time, for we have no facts upon which it could be predicated. Hence the contention that he is disqualified by reason of his own interest is not sustained by the allegations or proof.

as to disquali-

It may properly be suggested that there is no good reason for further contention in the court below upon this subject. By calling in Judge Curtis, Judge Craig has already indicated his intention not to try the case. If it is improper for him to do so, or to choose the judge, under the actual circumstances of the case, as they may appear, the objection can easily be obviated by requesting the governor to designate the judge to try the case.

The application for a peremptory writ of prohibition is denied, and the proceeding is dismissed.

ANNOTATION.

Disqualification of judge by relative's ownership of stock in corporation which is party to action or proceeding.

Generally.

It is held as a general proposition that a stockholder of a corporation is not a "party" to a suit merely by reason of the fact that the corporation is an actual party, and that consequently a judge is not disqualified to hear the suit by reason of his relationship to the stockholder. Ewa Plantation Co. v. Holt (1907) 18 Haw. 509; Re Dodge & S. Mfg. Co. (1879) 77 N. Y. 101, 33 Am. Rep. 579; Place v. Butter-nuts Woolen & C. Mfg. Co. (1863) 26 How. Pr. (N. Y.) 601, reversing (1857) 28 Barb. 503; Bank of Lansingburgh v. McKie (1852) 7 How. Pr. (N. Y.)

360, affirmed (see (1855) 14 How. Pr. 549); Houston Cemetery Co. v. Drew (1896) 13 Tex. Civ. App. 536, 36 S. W. 802; Ex parte Tinsley (1897) 37 Tex. Crim. Rep. 517, 66 Am. St. Rep. 818, 40 S. W. 306; Lewis v. Hillsboro Roller-Mill Co. (1893) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 23 S. W. 338; Kingman-Texas Implement Co. v. Herring Nat. Bank (1913) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 153 S. W. 394; Wise County Coal Co. v. Carter Bros. (1887) 3 Tex. App. Civ. Cas. (Willson) 372; Searsburg Turnp. Co. v. Cutler (1834) 6 Vt. 315. See David Colliery Co. v. Charlevoix Sugar Co. (1908) 155 Mich. 228, 118 N. W. 929.

In Searsburgh Turnp. Co. v. Cutler (1834) 6 Vt. 315, the defendant pleaded to the jurisdiction of a justice of the peace that he was related within the second degree of affinity to one of the corporators and stockholders of the plaintiff company. The action was for trespass on the case for breaking down and passing a turnpike gate owned by the company. The statute provided that a justice of the peace "shall not take cognizance of a case, where he is related within the fourth degree, either by affinity or consanguinity to either of the parties." It was held that the stockholder was not in a legal sense a party to the suit and that the justice was not disqualified.

Houston Cemetery Co. v. Drew (1896) 13 Tex. Civ. App. 536, 36 S. W. 802, was an appeal from an order of the district court appointing a receiver of the property of a cemetery company. On a bill brought by a shareholder on behalf of himself and all others similarly situated, it was held that the judge who granted the order for a receiver was not disqualified by the fact that his grandmother was a shareholder in the cemetery company; that she was not a party to the suit, since a bill filed in the interest of a party and all other persons similarly situated did not make the persons similarly situated parties to the suit. In Ex parte Tinsley (1897) 37 Tex. Crim. Rep. 517, 66 Am. St. Rep. 818, 40 S. W. 306, the court followed the decision in Houston Cemetery Co. v. Drew (Tex.) supra, on a proceeding arising out of the same receivership.

In Wise County Coal Co. v. Carter (1887) 3 Tex. App. Civ. Cas. (Willson) 372, it was held that a judge was not disqualified to hear an action to which a corporation was a party by the fact that he was related to one who was president of, and a stockholder in, the corporation.

In Lewis v. Hillshow Roller-Mill Co. (1893) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 23 S. W. 338, a roller mill company brought suit to recover a sum of money due on a subscription for the purpose of erecting the mill. It was urged that the presiding judge was disqualified to try the case because he was a brother-in-law of one of the stockholders in the company. The court held that a stockholder was in no sense a party to a suit by the corporation.

In Kingman-Texas Implement Co. v. Herring Nat. Bank (1913) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 153 S. W. 394, a garnishment proceeding against a bank, it appeared that the judge was the father-in-law of the cashier, who was a stockholder of the bank. The court held that the judge was not disqualified, since his interest was contingent on his daughter's dying without issue, in which case he would inherit from her, and that this was too remote to work a disqualification.

Bank of Lansingburgh v. McKie (1852) 7 How. Pr. (N. Y.) 360, affirmed (see (1855) 14 How. 549) was a motion to vacate an attachment by the plaintiff bank. The defendant moved to set aside the attachment on affidavits in which it appeared that the president of the plaintiff bank, who was a stockholder therein, was the brother-in-law of the judge. It was held that the judge was not disqualified; that the statute (2 Rev. Stat. 275, § 2) which disqualified judges by reason of consanguinity or affinity to either of the "parties" meant persons for whose immediate benefit the action was prosecuted, and that a stockholder was not such a party, not having immediate interest in the suit.

Re Dodge (1879) 77 N. Y. 101, 33 Am. Rep. 579, was an appeal from an order denying a motion to set aside an order appointing a receiver for a corporation and directing an assessment against its stockholders. It was held that relationship to a stockholder did not disqualify the judge to make the order. The court said: "It is very certain that to exclude a judge from sitting in any cause by reason of kinship, such kinship must exist between him and some person who is actually a party to the cause. It is not enough that he is related to some person, not a party, who is or may be interested in it, or affected by his order. Interest on the part of the judge disqualifies him from sitting, but interest on the part of a relative of the judge does not. The statute very clearly expresses that such relative must be one of the parties to the cause, to render the judge incompetent."

The holding in Place v. Butternuts Woolen & C. Mfg. Co. (1857) 28 Barb. (N. Y.) 503, that a stockholder in a corporation was a party to a suit by the corporation so as to disqualify a justice of the peace, who was the stockholder's brother, was reversed without opinion in (1863) 26 How. Pr. 601.

In Ewa Plantation Co. v. Holt (1907) 18 Haw. 509, it appeared that two of the justices of the Hawaiian Supreme Court, before which were pending several appeals involving the income taxes of corporations, had relatives within the third degree of consanguinity or affinity who owned shares of stock in one or more of the corporations. The court held that the stockholders were not parties, whatever their pecuniary interest in the outcome of the suit might be, and as long as the justices themselves had no pecuniary interest in the suits, they were not disqualified.

However, in Davis Colliery Co. v. Charlevoix Sugar Co. (1908) 155 Mich. 228, 118 N. W. 929, an action against a corporation, a decree was entered in the trial court in favor of the defendant. The complainant appealed, alleging that the trial judge was disqualified because the sister of his wife was a stockholder in the corporation. It was held that the judge was disqualified.

Wife of judge as stockholder.

In South Dakota it is held, contrary to the decision in the reported case (FAVORITE v. SUPERIOR CT. ante, 290) that a judge whose wife is a stockholder in a corporation which is a party to a suit is disqualified to hear the case. First Nat. Bank v. McCarthy (1900) 13 S. D. 356, 83 N. W. 423; First Nat. Bank v. Keenan (1899) 12 S. D. 240, 80 N. W. 1185; First Nat. Bank v. McGuire (1899) 12 S. D. 226, 47 L.R.A. 413, 76 Am. St. Rep. 598, 80 N. W. 1074.

First Nat. Bank v. McGuire (1899) 12 S. D. 226, 47 L.R.A. 413, 76 Am. St. Rep. 598, 80 N. W. 1074, was an action for the foreclosure of collateral given by the defendant to secure payment of promissory notes. The defendant presented a petition to the court praying that the judge should proceed no further in the case because of his being unconsciously biased and prejudiced in favor of the plaintiff corporation on account of the fact that his wife owned a large amount of stock in the corporation. It was held that the judge was disqualified on these grounds; that the interests of his wife were his interests.

In First Nat. Bank v. Keenan (1899) 12 S. D. 240, 80 N. W. 1185, the facts and decisions were the same as in First Nat. Bank v. McGuire (S. D.) supra.

First Nat. Bank v. McCarthy (1900) 13 S. D. 356, 83 N. W. 423, was an action to foreclose a mortgage given by the defendants to secure a loan from the plaintiff bank. It was shown that the wife of the presiding judge was a stockholder of the plaintiff and one of the directors. The court held that the judge was not qualified to hear the case, following the rule in First Nat. Bank v. McGuire (S. D.) and First Nat. Bank v. Keenan (S. D.) supra.

NATIONAL BANK OF SAN MATEO, Resp.,

v.

ST. JOHN WHITNEY, Appt.

(— Cal. —, 183 Pac. 789.)

Banks — check to order of cashier — loss from misappropriation.

1. The loss due to the misappropriation by a bank cashier of the proceeds of a check made payable to him personally to satisfy a note held by the bank against the drawer must, in case both persons are equally innocent, fall upon the bank, rather than upon the drawer.

2. The maker of a note held by a bank does not become chargeable with loss due to the misappropriation by the bank's cashier of the proceeds of a check given to pay the note, by the fact that, upon request of the cashier, he made the note payable to the cashier's order.

Notice — intention of cashier to defraud.

3. That the cashier of a bank applies for payment of a note given by an officer of a corporation which has borrowed to its limit from the bank, in order to secure more funds for the corporation, within twenty-four hours after the note was made and at the place of business of the corporation, to be made by check payable to himself, is not so suspicious as to place the loss caused by the cashier's misappropriation of the funds upon the drawer of the check, if the excuse given by the cashier was that the payment was necessary to meet the requirements of the bank examiner.

4. The maker of a note to a bank has a right to rely on statements of the bank's cashier with respect to necessity and form of payment of the note in determining his course of action with respect thereto.

Trial — instructions — presumption as to purpose of payment.

5. Upon an issue whether or not a check payable to the cashier of a bank was intended to pay a debt to him or to the bank, an instruction is erroneous that the presumption of law is that money paid by one person to another was due the latter.

6. An instruction that a check made payable to a bank cashier in response to his demands, made at the office of the drawer, and in order to satisfy a note given by him to the bank, was not in the ordinary course of business, is erroneous as being upon a question of fact.

— jury — question of suspicion of drawer of check.

7. Whether or not the suspicions of the drawer of a check to the order of a bank cashier to take up a note payable to the bank were or should have been aroused by the fact that the cashier made demand at the drawer's place of business for a check payable to himself is for the jury.

Evidence — authority of bank cashier.

8. Upon the question whether or not a check made payable to a bank cashier was to pay a note to the bank or a debt to the cashier, testimony by the bank's directors that the cashier had no authority to collect the note, and that no examination was to be made by the bank examiner, which was the excuse given by the cashier for demanding payment, is immaterial.

Bills and notes — payment to agent — demand for production of note.

9. The rule that one paying a note to an agent, without demanding production of the note, does so at his own risk, does not apply in case of payment to a bank cashier of a note held by the bank.

(— Cal. —, 183 Pac. 789.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Superior Court for San Mateo County (Buck, J.) in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover the amount alleged to be due on a promissory note. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Mr. Norman A. Eisner for appellant.
Messrs. Walter H. Linforth and Ross & Ross for respondent.

Wilbur, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action upon a promissory note executed on September 13, 1915, to the plaintiff for $3,000. The case was tried before a jury. Plaintiff recovered judgment, and defendant appeals. The sole issue presented to the jury was whether or not the promissory note was paid on September 14, 1915, by a check of the Leslie Salt Refining Company, drawn on the Bank of California for $3,000. This check was issued by the defendant as secretary of the Salt Company, and was received by W. M. Roberts, cashier of the plaintiff. That it was deposited by him to his credit with the plaintiff bank is admitted. The plaintiff, in support of its contention that the note was not paid by the check in question, relies upon the possession of the note as prima facie evidence of its nonpayment, and upon the fact that the check was made payable to W. M. Roberts, instead of to the bank, and was a check of the Leslie Salt Refining Company, instead of the defendant, and in support of its claim presented instructions to the jury, which were given by the court, to the effect that its possession of the note raised a presumption of its nonpayment; that the giving of the check to W. M. Roberts personally gave rise to the presumption that it was in discharge of an obligation owing to Roberts.

In order to understand fully the assignments of error made by the appellant, it will be necessary to state additional facts. The defendant was a stockholder and the secretary of the Leslie Salt Refining Company. W. M. Roberts, plaintiff's cashier, was a director of the Leslie Salt Refining Company, holding five shares of stock to qualify him as such director. The Salt Company was a borrower from the plaintiff, and, having borrowed to the limit of its credit, the defendant negotiated a loan for $3,000 on the 13th day of September, 1915, and gave his personal note, herein sued upon, as evidence of such indebtedness. Miss Zula Clements, stenographer and general office assistant of the Leslie Salt Refining Company, testified that, on September 14th, William M. Roberts, plaintiff's cashier, called at the office of the Salt Company in the Flatiron Building, in San Francisco, between 3 and 4 o'clock in the afternoon, and left a message for the defendant to the effect that the bank examiner had been at the bank and had questioned the loan, and that it was necessary for the bank to have a check for $3,000 to take up the note, and that the check was to be made out personally to him and mailed down that night without fail, as he expected the examiner would be there again in the morning; that about 4:30 of that afternoon she gave this message to the defendant; that the check in question for $3,000 was made out at that time. The defendant testified that in pursuance of this message he wrote the check in question and mailed it to Mr. Roberts at the bank; that the check was made payable to W. M. Roberts, because it was requested in that form, although other checks in payment of moneys borrowed from the plaintiff had been made payable to the plaintiff bank; that neither the defendant nor the Leslie Salt Refining Company owed anything to Mr. Roberts personally, nor was there any debt to Mr. Roberts in which the defendant or the Salt Company was interested; and that the $3,000 check was not sent as a loan to Mr. Roberts. Roberts testified that he received the check in question for the purpose of taking up a note of the defendant for the sum of $3,000, that he received the check at the bank, that he had no personal transaction with the defendant, and that the defendant owed him no money and loaned him no money.

It will be observed, then, that the only persons who have any knowledge as to the purpose for which the check in question was given by the defendant, namely, the defendant, his stenographer, and Roberts, all testified that it was given in payment of the note herein sued upon, and for no other purpose. The authority of Roberts, as cashier, to receive the payment of the note, must be conceded. McBoyle v. Union Nat. Bank, 162 Cal. 277, 279, 122 Pac. 458; Morse, Bank & Bkg. 5th ed. § 159, pp. 356, 357; 7 C. J. § 160. His application of the check to his own overdrawn account was a confessedly fraudulent misappropriation of the check, and the only question involved in the case is as to whether the plaintiff or defendant must suffer by reason of the cashier's dishonesty. If we assume that both the plaintiff and defendant were equally innocent of wrong in connection with the transaction, and that the loss resulted by reason of the fraud of the plaintiff's agent in misapplying the proceeds of the check paid to him by the defendant, then, under a familiar principle of the law, the bank, for whom Roberts was acting, would be required to bear the loss, for "where one of two innocent persons must suffer by the fraud or negligence of a third, whichever of the two has accredited him ought to bear the loss." Mundorff v. Wickersham, 63 Pa. 89, 3 Am. Rep. 531, cited in Schultz v. McLean, 93 Cal. 329, 356, 28 Pac. 1053. Still, assuming equal innocence of both parties hereto, the loss resulted from the fact that the plaintiff had in its employment in a position of trust and confidence a dishonest employee, who dishonestly utilized his position of trust and confidence to appropriate $3,000 paid to him as such agent for and on behalf of the principal. Where the agent of a depositor of a bank utilized his position of trust and confidence to fraudulently raise certain checks intrusted to him, and thereby secured from the bank larger sums than called for by the checks, it was held that, although such conduct amounted to forgery, and the bank would ordinarily be responsible to the depositor for payment of such forged checks, nevertheless, by reason of the fact that the crime was committed by the depositor's agent, the depositor, and not the bank, should bear the loss, upon the theory that the principal was liable "for the fraud, torts, or other wrongful acts committed by such agent in and as part of such business." Otis Elevator Co. v. First Nat. Bank, 163 Cal. 31, 39, 41 L.R.A. (N.S.) 529, 124 Pac. 704, 707. Similar reasoning would require us to hold the bank liable for the misconduct of its cashier, Roberts.

Plaintiff, however, contends that both parties are not equally innocent in the transaction; that the defendant, by making the check payable to the cashier, and by acceding to the unusual demand of the cashier, either had notice of the cashier's fraud, or thus put it within his power to commit the wrong, and that therefore the defendant must suffer the loss. In view of the law that the cashier, by virtue of his office, had authority to collect the note, does the fact that he asked for and received a check payable to himself in payment so far inculcate the defendant in the wrongdoing of the cashier as to change the rule? It is undoubtedly true that the form of the check received by Roberts may have enabled him to deposit the same in his own name in the bank without arousing suspicion, which might have resulted from the deposit by Roberts to his own account of a check payable to the plaintiff. But this would have been equally true in case the payment had been made by money, or by the transfer of negotiable paper by indorsement in blank or, in short, by any form of payment other than by negotiable paper payable to the order of the plaintiff. It cannot be said, therefore, that the form of the payment facilitated the fraud of the cashier, but rather that the payment by a check drawn to the order of the bank might have made it less easy to effectuate the fraud. Even if the check had been payable to the order of the plaintiff, the cashier, by virtue of his agency, would have had authority to indorse the same and thus gain the possession of the proceeds thereof. Dyer v. Sebrell, 135 Cal. 597, 67 Pac. 1036; McBoyle v. Union Nat. Bank, supra. Where, as here, the duly authorized agent of the plaintiff bank was demanding payment, and such payment was made by a negotiable instrument, the proceeds of which were subsequently secured by the agent, the form of the payment is immaterial. Nor was the fact that the agent requested the payment by check to his own order of any significance, for the reason that he made such request in his capacity as agent for the plaintiff, and such request was, in effect, the request of the plaintiff. The defendant was not bound to view with suspicion the conduct of plaintiff's agent.

It is next contended that the facts and circumstances surrounding the payment were such as to put the defendant upon inquiry; in other words, to cause the defendant to suspect the intended fraud of the cashier. It being conceded that the demand for payment of a note twenty-four hours after its execution, at the office of the defendant in San Francisco, instead of at the bank, by the cashier personally coming to the office, was unusual, and not in the ordinary course of business, the character of the demand was such as might justly allay all suspicion of the defendant. The defendant knew that the Salt Company had borrowed up to its limit from the bank, and that the $3,000 represented by the promissory note had been secured by him while an officer of the Salt Company. Defendant knew that the plaintiff bank was supervised by the bank examiner, and therefore that the demand of the bank for payment was not, under the circumstances, unreasonable. Bearing in mind that Roberts came to the defendant for the purpose of demanding payment by the defendant of an obligation owed by defendant to plaintiff for reasons peculiarly applicable to the business of the plaintiff, there was apparently nothing in the transaction to put defendant upon notice that Roberts was trying to defraud either defendant or the bank. The fact that the statements were untrue, and were made for the purpose of allaying the suspicion of the defendant concerning the unusual demand, was not known to the defendant. Defendant had a right to rely upon the truth of these representations in determining his course of conduct, and such representations must be deemed to have been made by the plaintiff. As the question involved is the fact of payment, the representations are wholly immaterial, except as they tended to allay the suspicion which might be aroused in the defendant by reason of the demand for payment and a request that the check be made to the order of the cashier. Upon the issue of payment it is true that there was a conflict of the testimony, arising not only from the fact that the plaintiff had possession of the note, but also because of the fact that the plaintiff was justified in relying upon certain circumstances brought out in the testimony of the defendant concerning the delay of the defendant in notifying the bank that the note had been paid, thus tending, together with other things, to discredit in some measure the testimony of the defendant. If the issue of payment had been submitted to the jury under proper instruction and evidence, the finding of the jury would be binding on this court. But in the light of the foregoing discussion some of the instructions must be held erroneous. For instance, at the request of the plaintiff the court gave the following instruction: "(2) The court instructs you that the presumption of law is that money paid by one person to another was due the latter, and therefore in this action, if you believe from the evidence that the Leslie Salt Refining Company issued its check, payable to W. M. Roberts, and delivered or sent said check to said Roberts, then the presumption of law is that said Leslie Salt Refining Company did so because it wished to make the check payable to said Roberts."

The jury were thereby instructed that under the circumstances and proof in the case, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, they were entitled to believe that the check given to Roberts was in payment of an obligation due from the Salt Company to Roberts. The real question in issue was whether or not the check was given to the plaintiff by the delivery of the same to its cashier, or whether it was given to Roberts personally for some other purpose. Under these circumstances the instruction of the court, based upon the form of the check, was an erroneous application of the presumption

"that money paid by one to another was due to the latter" (Code Civ. Proc. § 1968, subd. 7), for the very question involved was: To whom was the money paid?

At the request of the plaintiff the court instructed the jury as follows: "(7) The court instructs you that if you believe from the evidence in this case that W. M. Roberts went to the office of the Leslie Salt Refining Company in San Francisco, and there made a demand for the payment of the note here in question, and directed that any check drawn for the purpose of payment thereof be made payable to him, said W. M. Roberts, and that no other check for the payment of any note to said bank by the defendant, or by said Leslie Salt Refining Company, had been made payable to said W. M. Roberts, but had been made payable to the plaintiff, then you are further instructed that the drawing of the check here in favor of W. M. Roberts was not in the ordinary course of business between the defendant and the Salt Company and the bank, and that therefore the direction to have said check made payable to said W. M. Roberts was sufficient notice to put the defendant on inquiry as to why said check should be made payable to said Roberts instead of to the plaintiff bank."

This instruction was erroneous, for the reason that it was an instruction <sup>—instruction on facts.</sup> upon a question of fact; namely, "that the drawing of the check here in favor of W. M. Roberts was not in the ordinary course of business between the defendant and the Salt Company and the bank."

It is true that the evidence showed that the Salt Company usually paid the bank by checks drawn in favor of the bank, but the instance under consideration is the only one in which the defendant paid an obligation of his own. But, however that may be, the ordinary course of business, so far as involved in this case, was the payment to the cashier of the bank, and not the form of said payment. It was in the ordinary course of business, so far as this case is concerned, for payments to be made to the cashier of the bank. It was also an instruction which, in effect, informed the jury that "the direction to have said check made payable to W. M. Roberts was sufficient notice to put the defendant on inquiry as to why said check should be payable to said Roberts, instead of to the plaintiff bank."

As has been above stated, there was no reason why the check should not be made payable to Roberts. The only legal question properly involved by the form of the check given in payment was whether or not the payment was made to Roberts as cashier of the bank, or to him in his personal capacity and for his personal benefit. This instruction is particularly objectionable, in view of an instruction given at the request of the defendant, as follows: "A bank's client or customer, dealing with the cashier of the bank permitted by its directors to have complete control of the business relations with its clients and customers, may trust in the integrity of such cashier in transacting its banking business with him, when there is nothing in the known state of the affairs of the bank, or of his relation to it, to excite suspicion that he is using his position to the prejudice of his bank."

Under these instructions, upon the admitted facts, the jury must have understood, as a matter of law, that the defendant was not entitled to rely upon the integrity of the cashier, or, in other words, that defendant could not claim the check to be a payment if the cashier misappropriated it, as it is conceded he did. These instructions were erroneous. The question as to whether the suspicions of the defendant were or should have been aroused was a question of fact for the jury. Other instructions were given, at defendant's request, tending to modify, in some degree, the effect of these instructions; but we cannot say that they cured the basic error of the instruction that defendant's suspicions must necessarily have been aroused by the facts stated in instruction No. 7.

The testimony of the directors of the plaintiff bank was received, over the objection of the defendant, to the effect that they had not authorized the cashier to demand payment of the note in question, and that no examination was made or was to be made by the bank examiner. The effect of this evidence was merely to prove that the statements made by the cashier to the defendant at the time he demanded payment of the note in question were false. The defendant had a right to rely upon the representations of the plaintiff's agent, and the plaintiff could not take advantage of their falsity. It was therefore immaterial whether or not such representations were true. The evidence, being immaterial, might be regarded as harmless, were it not for the fact that in this case the considerations involved are so evenly balanced that it is difficult to say what the effect of such testimony might be upon the mind of the jury. It showed that the bank was being imposed upon by its own agent, and might therefore give the impression to the jury that the bank was to that extent "innocent," while as a matter of law the bank must be deemed to have made such representations. Nor was it proper to show that there was no express authority on the part of Roberts to collect the money. That authority resulted from his official position as cashier, and, in the absence of an express prohibition by the directors, he had authority, as such, to make the collection in question. The evidence should not have been admitted.

The defendant complains of those rulings of the court upon the admissibility of evidence which precluded his proving a transaction by which Roberts sought to reimburse the plaintiff for his wrongdoing. Under proper pleading and offers of proof it would no doubt be permissible for the defendant to show that the plaintiff had received the fruits of the check given by the defendant, if such was the fact. We cannot say, however, that there was error in sustaining the objections to the particular questions that were asked.

Respondent relies upon the rule that where the payee of a promissory note pays an agent who does not produce the note "the payment is at the risk of the maker of the note, and if such person were not, in fact, entitled to receive payment of the note, the maker of the note must bear the loss, for it is his duty to demand the production of the note before he made payment."

The principle, however, has no application here, for the reason that the cashier of a bank has authority to collect notes due to the bank.

In view of the necessity of a new trial it perhaps should be noted that the evidence in this case is not entirely clear as to what became of the credit of $3,000 which the cashier secured to himself by the deposit of the check given by the defendant. If such deposit was used by him to reduce an overdraft, and was not subsequently withdrawn by the cashier for his own purposes, the bank, of course, having received the benefit of the check, could not now collect upon defendant's note, upon the theory that the same had not been paid, for it would in fact have received the benefit of the check in the form of a payment upon the indebtedness of the cashier, and the remedy of the bank would be against the cashier, and not against the defendant in that event.

The judgment is reversed.

ANNOTATION.

Making paper payable to agent as charging drawer with loss due to agent's misappropriation.

The reported case (NATIONAL BANK v. WHITNEY, ante, 298) is authority for the proposition that the mere fact that a check is made payable to an agent does not necessarily charge the drawer with loss to the principal due to such agent's misappropriation of the fund. Here the court applied the rule in the case of a check made payable to the creditor bank's cashier under facts which were declared not to have put the drawer upon guard as to the possibility of misappropriation by the cashier, even though the check was so drawn at the request of that official. It was also held that the fact that the payee was a bank official who had authority to collect debts due the bank rendered inapplicable the general rule that where the maker of paper pays an agent who does not produce such paper, the payment is at the maker's risk.

A similar decision is found in Griffin v. Erskine (1906) 131 Iowa, 444, 109 N. W. 13, 9 Ann. Cas. 1193, where the owner of a bond secured by mortgage sent the papers for collection to a bank which conducted practically all of its business through its president, and the latter received and misappropriated a draft drawn in his favor rather than that of the bank, it having been held that receipt of the draft, which was honored, was a payment to the bank which satisfied the debt, although the payee subsequently misappropriated the proceeds of the draft. This case, also, expressly passed upon the question of the effect of the rule that an agent to collect cannot receive anything but money in payment, by holding that such rule was inapplicable as to banks, at least in the absence of express direction to the contrary, in view of the universal custom of such institutions of using checks and drafts as means of payment. It was also ruled that the debtor was justified in making the draft payable to the bank officer rather than to the bank itself, which could act only through its officers. In the course of the opinion, Ladd, J., among other things, said: "Did the delivery of this draft to the bank constitute payment? The rule universally accepted is that under authority merely to collect, an agent, in the absence of a custom to the contrary, may receive nothing except money in payment. A debtor who owes money, in payment to an agent, must do so in such a manner as to facilitate the agent in transmitting money to his principal. . . . Bills payable are not satisfied by new paper of the same kind unless so agreed. This rule applies to checks and drafts, and, though they are in general use in the transfer of money from one person to another, payment thereby is deemed conditional on the drawee's acceptance and payment. . . . Checks, drafts, and other bills of exchange are the means of transferring the money in adjusting nearly all commercial transactions, and in authorizing an agent, whether a bank or individual, to make collections, it may be assumed, in the absence of instructions to the contrary, that the authority is to be executed in the manner usual and customary in the commercial world. While the agent may not accept anything but the actual cash in satisfaction of the claim, he may receive a check or draft, negotiable and payable on demand, which he has good reason to believe will be honored upon presentation, as a ready and more convenient means of obtaining the money in conditional satisfaction of the debt. Such a payment offers no greater temptations to the agent than payment in cash to which ordinarily it is equivalent. If honored by the drawee, payment relates back to the time of delivery. If not honored, the creditor has parted with nothing by reason of conduct of his agent; for, though the agent may receive such paper as conditional payment, he is not permitted, on its strength, to deliver conveyances, leases, or other valuables at the risk of his principal. . . . In view of the universal custom of using drafts and checks as a means of payment, we think an agent may receive a draft or check as conditional satisfaction of the claim placed in his hands, unless instructed to the contrary, whenever he has good reason to believe that it will be paid upon presentation. In the case at bar the bank was required by Erskine to remit the money to him in North Carolina, and the evidence shows that this was expected to be done by the ordinary bills of exchange. He was charged with knowledge of the general custom in the matter of collecting notes and mortgages, such as those sent to the bank, and must be assumed, in the absence of other instructions, to have intended that the bank should execute the duty imposed upon it in the usual and customary way. This being so, it is not necessary to inquire how the bank disposed of the drafts. It was equivalent to money and could have been used as such by his agent, and was no more likely to be misappropriated by the officers of the bank than had money been paid instead. We are of opinion that, under the circumstances disclosed, the bond and mortgage were satisfied by the delivery and subsequent payment of the draft."

And in Fayetteville Wagon, Wood & Lumber Co. v. Kenefick Constr. Co. (1905) — Ark. —, 88 S. W. 1031, where the agent was directed to collect for certain materials sold by the principal by getting a check and bringing the money if he could cash it, and the agent did get a check and cashed it, but failed to account therefor to the principal, it was held that as the collection was strictly in accordance with the terms of the agency, the payment was good and relieved the purchaser of any further liability. In this case the misappropriation was not intentional, but this fact does not seem to have influenced the decision, which was clearly upon the ground that the payment had been made in strict accordance with the terms of the agency. So, in Scott v. Gilkey (1894) 153 Ill. 168, 39 N. E. 265, where a creditor left certain promissory notes with a private bank for collection and the maker paid the interest thereon by checks drawn in favor of the bank, the proprietors of which absconded without paying the creditor, it was held that the checks constituted a valid payment of the interest. And see Gibson v. Ward (1911) 9 Ga. App. 363, 71 S. E. 506, wherein it was held that delivery to the creditor's agent who was authorized to receive payment of a draft drawn in his favor, which was duly honored so that the agent received the money, effected a payment to the creditor although the agent failed to pay over the money so received.

And in New York a distinction has been made between checks and drafts and notes, mortgages, etc., upon the ground that checks and drafts are usual and ordinary means of transferring money, and that notes, etc., are not so regarded; in consequence of which delivery of a check to an agent authorized to collect money, and payable to him, constitutes payment from the time that the check is cashed, so that conversion by him of the proceeds does not affect the drawer. This was the holding in Potter v. Sager (1918) 184 App. Div. 327, 171 N. Y. Supp. 438, which reversed (1916) 98 Misc. 25, 161 N. Y. Supp. 1088. In the lower court the decision was upon the broad ground that an agent cannot accept payment in anything but money, that a check does not constitute payment until accepted and received; and that where the check is made payable to the agent individually, there is no payment unless the principal actually received the money; but the appellate division in a majority opinion declared that checks, when cashed in due course, were on a par with money as regards payment to an agent, even though the money, because of the agent's default, never reached the principal's hands. In reaching this conclusion, Hubbs, J., said: "Where a person is an agent with authority from his principal to collect principal and interest, the general rule is that a payment by a debtor to such agent, to constitute a good payment, must be made in cash. The reason for this rule is that a payment in any other medium is not as good as cash,—is not the exact equivalent of cash. Thus, it has been held that the giving of a note, mortgage, post-dated check, property, etc., does not constitute a payment, because the acceptance of those things by the agent exceeds his authority and constitutes the exercise of a discretion by the agent not vested in him by his principal. It would seem, however, that this court should take judicial notice of the fact that checks and drafts are usual and ordinary means of transacting business and transferring money in all business transactions; that where an agent is given authority to collect money, the authority granted implies that he shall do so in the usual and ordinary way, and, where a check is given by the debtor, not postdated, and payable at a bank in the same city, the giving of such check payable to the agent constitutes payment from the time that such check is cashed in due course. . . . Such a check, of course, would not constitute payment if not in fact honored on presentation in the ordinary course of business. The agent could not accept such a check in absolute payment and satisfaction. He can, however, receive a check which he has reason to believe will be honored upon presentation as a convenient and customary way of obtaining the money which he is authorized to collect. Such a payment offers no greater temptation to the agent than the payment of the money would offer. If the check is paid to the bank, then the agent has received what he was authorized to receive, and, if not paid when presented, the creditor has lost nothing. The reason for the rule which does not permit a payment to an agent by note, mortgage, etc., does not apply when payment is made by a check which is actually cashed by the bank upon which it was drawn." And in the earlier New York case of Cohen v. O'Connor (1873) 5 Daly (N. Y.) 28, affirmed on opinion below in (1874) 56 N. Y. 613, it was held generally that the delivery to an agent who was sent for the money, of a check payable to the order of the agent, who cashed the same and converted the proceeds, was a good payment to the principal, it having been declared that "the objection that this was not a direct payment of money to the agent and as requested is equally untenable, as if the money had actually been paid" over to and lost by the agent.

On the other hand there is authority to the effect that there is no payment which will relieve a debtor from liability where there is simply an execution and delivery of a check drawn to the individual order of an agent merely authorized to make a collection in money, unless he had authority to receive payment in that manner, notwithstanding the check was cashed by him, provided, of course, that the money did not reach the principal. Thus under the rule that a person who deals with an agent and knows, or is charged with knowledge of, the extent of his authority with respect to receiving payment for his principal, must protect himself by making payment in conformity with the authority of the agent, it has been held that where debts were paid by drafts payable to the order of an agent, misappropriation of the moneys by the agent did not relieve the debtor of liability to the principal, the agent not having been authorized to receive payment by draft drawn in his personal favor. Crowley v. McCambridge (1910) 154 Ill. App. 135.

And there is considerable authority to the effect that where delivery is made to an agent having no authority, either express or implied, to receive payment other than in cash of a note drawn to his order, the execution and delivery of such a paper, the proceeds of which have been misappropriated by the agent, does not extinguish the debt.

Thus, in Baldwin v. Tucker (1901) 112 Ky. 282, 57 L.R.A. 451, 65 S. W. 841, where a person purchased a piano from a traveling agent, and executed a note for the purchase price, drawn payable to the agent, it was held that no title passed where the agent misappropriated the proceeds of the note, since in a transaction like the one under consideration the purchaser was bound to know that there was a limitation upon the agent's authority which would prevent him from taking a note payable to himself for the purchase money, there being nothing in the case showing that in the business of selling pianos by agents it was usual for them to take notes payable to themselves for the purchase money.

So, in Corning v. Strong (1848) 1 Ind. 329, 1 Smith, 197, where creditors issued a written order directing their debtors to pay the debt to their agent and to accept his receipt, it was held that they were not discharged by the execution and delivery of a note drawn to the order of the agent, who transferred the same to third persons for full value in payment of his own debts. The court argued that the order did not authorize the agent to accept a note payable to himself; that an agent with limited powers must, in order to bind his principal, conform strictly to such powers; that the taking of a note in his own name payable at a future date was an attempt to transfer the debt to himself with a postponement of the right to enforce payment; that the creditors were not authorized by the order to consider the agent as agent for the creditors for any other purpose than to receive payment; and that the receipt of a note for a precedent debt is not a payment, in consequence of which an agent sent to collect such a debt has no authority to give a discharge upon receipt of a note. And in McCulloch v. McKee (1851) 16 Pa. 289, it was again ruled that a special agent to collect a debt has no right to take anything but the money, and that the debtor is not released from liability to the principal by giving a note for the amount of the debt, drawn in favor of the agent individually, for without the consent of the principal the agent cannot be substituted as creditor of the debtor.

And in Robinson v. Anderson (1886) 106 Ind. 152, 6 N. E. 12, proceeding upon the theory that one dealing with a special agent is bound at his peril to ascertain the extent of the agent's authority, it was held that where an agent with express authority to sell goods and to take notes therefor, payable to his principal, retained in his possession notes which he should have promptly forwarded to his principal, in whose favor they were drawn, and without the consent of his principal surrendered the same while unmatured to the maker and received notes payable to himself, the principal was not bound by the transaction and could recover on the original notes. The court said: "It could not be implied that he [the agent] was thereby authorized to surrender the note of his principal and receive in payment a note payable to himself. An agent having authority to collect a debt cannot be supposed to have the right to take as payment the note of the debtor payable to himself, thus substituting himself as creditor in the room of his principal. . . . That a debt may be paid by the execution of the negotiable promissory note of the debtor may be conceded, but the execution of such note to a third person, without the consent of the creditor, has no resemblance of payment. As the exchange of securities, and taking, in the stead of those payable to his principal, others payable to himself, was not within the scope of the agent's authority to sell and collect, if he had authority to collect, any exchange, if authorized at all, must have been a special agency, and in that event the appellees were bound to ascertain the extent of his authority in that regard. Failing to do so, they made the exchange at their peril, subject to the ratification of the principal, or of their ability to prove affirmative authority in that respect. Since the act was repudiated by the principals, and no proof was offered tending to show authority, the right of the plaintiffs to collect the note sued on was unaffected by the unauthorized transaction which is put forward in support of the plea of payment."

Again, in Davis v. Severance (1892) 49 Minn. 528, 52 N. W. 140, where a note was intrusted to an attorney for collection, and he settled with the debtors by taking part payment in cash and unauthorizedly taking a new note running to himself for the balance, which renewal note he wrongfully assigned to a third person, it was held that the client could establish the original note as against the maker. And Willis v. Gorrell (1904) 102 Va. 746, 47 S. E. 826, is to the same effect. And in connection with the latter case, see Smith v. Powell (1900) 98 Va. 431, 36 S. E. 522.

And in Holt v. Schneider (1899) 57 Neb. 523, 77 N. W. 1086, applying the rule that generally an agent to collect can take nothing but money, and that where the agent exceeds his authority, the principal is not bound thereby, it was held that where a debtor gave his note to the agent, who applied the proceeds to his personal claim, he was not relieved of liability to the creditor since he was not justified in believing that the agent had authority to accept the paper for the principal.

And in Everts v. Lawther (1897) 165 Ill. 487, 46 N. E. 233, it was held that the unauthorized acceptance by an agent of a note payable to himself in satisfaction of a debt due his principal did not constitute a payment of the original debt, the proceeds of the note never having been paid over to the principal. It was said that the debtor must be considered as having trusted to the good faith of the agent that he would pay the money to his principal rather than to have supposed that his note was an actual payment to the creditor.

In Lochenmeyer v. Fogarty (1884) 112 Ill. 572, where a note made payable to a guardian for the benefit of his ward was left with the guardian's attorney and was paid after the guardian's death had revoked the attorney's authority, by drawing other notes which were made payable to the attorney, who discounted the same and retained the proceeds, it was held that the taking of the renewal notes did not constitute payment of the original debt or relieve the maker from further liability. This was upon the ground that payment of a note to a person who has no authority to receive the money does not extinguish the debt, but the court expressly recognized the rule that "if the notes had been paid to a person authorized to receive payment, the indebtedness would have been extinguished." In reaching the above conclusion the court argued as follows: "Here, Hammon, the guardian, died, leaving the notes in the possession of Lynch [his attorney]. It nowhere appears that Hammon, while living, had authorized Lynch to collect; but if he had, that authority was revoked by his death, and Lynch could not then collect or convert the notes to his own private use. He had authority merely, after Hammon's death, to hold the notes in his possession until some person authorized should call upon him for them. Appellants are in no position to claim that they paid the notes innocently or in good faith. They knew that the notes were given for land that belonged to the minor. They also knew that the notes were payable to the guardian, that he was dead, and that the money which the notes represented was trust funds, and knowing these facts, they had no right to take up the notes from Lynch by giving others payable to his order, nor can they claim any rights by virtue of such a transaction. It may be a hardship that these parties are required to pay their notes a second time; but who is to blame? They knew, or by the exercise of the least precaution might have known, when they obtained the notes of Lynch, that he had no authority to surrender them; and if they saw proper to deal with him, they acted at their own peril."

Conversely, the debtor can make a note payable to the agent where such agent has authority, either express or implied, to receive payment in that manner. For instance, in Galbraith v. Weber (1910) 58 Wash. 132, 28 L.R.A. (N.S.) 341, 107 Pac. 1050, the court recognized the general rule that where an agent has authority to sell for cash only, he cannot take notes payable to himself, and that where he has authority to sell on credit, he must take the credit in the name of the principal, but held that, in the case under consideration, the facts were such as to warrant a finding that the agent had implied authority to take a purchase money note payable to himself so that there was no independent liability of the maker over to the principal. And see Schleicher v. Armstrong (1895) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 32 S. W. 327.

And, of course, an undisclosed principal cannot complain of the fact that the agent took promissory notes made to the agent as an individual. A case illustrative of this situation is Gardner v. Wiley (1905) 46 Or. 96, 79 Pac. 341.

In connection with the foregoing cases which involved the giving of notes to the collecting agents, it should be noted that no case in addition to Potter v. Sager (1918) 184 App. Div. 327, 171 N. Y. Supp. 438, which is set out and quoted supra, has been discovered wherein a distinction between notes and checks has been expressly made in connection with the specific subject under annotation herein. However, the facts in many of the cases are such that the drawing of the distinction advanced in the Potter Case would eliminate much of the apparent conflict among the authorities.

(— Iowa, —, 174 N. W. 236.)

Checks — for gambling debt — effect of Negotiable Instruments Act.

1. The Negotiable Instruments Law did not repeal an existing statutory provision making void checks given for a gambling debt.

[See note on this question beginning on page 314.]

Evidence — burden of proof — good-faith holder of paper given for gambling debt.

2. One seeking to recover on checks given for a gambling debt has the burden of showing that he is a good-faith holder by a preponderance of credible evidence.

[See 12 R. C. L. 758.]

Checks — for gambling debt — bona fide holder — establishment of rights.

3. An attorney attempting to recover on checks given for a gambling debt does not establish his bona fides as matter of law by evidence that he received them for services rendered the payee in avoiding extradition on a charge of murder at a time when he was under arrest for violation of a local ordinance against vagrancy.

[See 3 R. C. L. 1041.]

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the District Court for Sioux County (Bradley, J.) in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover the amount of certain bank checks drawn by defendant on a bank, and made payable to a certain person whose name appears to be indorsed thereon. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Van Oosterhout & Kolyn, for appellant:

Statutes invalidating contracts connected with gambling transactions, and extending such invalidity to the contract in hands of bona fide holders for value, are inconsistent with the provisions of the Negotiable Instruments Law, and in so far are by implication repealed by the enactment of the same.

Wirt v. Stubblefield, 17 App. D. C. 283.

Defendant, having himself issued and put the checks in circulation, is estopped to assert their invalidity as having arisen in connection with gambling transactions.

Henderson v. Anderson, 3 How. 73, 11 L. ed. 499; Chemical Nat. Bank v. Kellogg, 183 N. Y. 92, 2 L.R.A. (N.S.) 299, 111 Am. St. Rep. 717, 75 N. E. 1103, 5 Ann. Cas. 158; Manning v. Manning, 8 Ala. 138; Fosdick v. Myers, 81 Ill. App. 544; Bodkins v. Taylor, 14 Ohio, 489; Treon v. Brown, 14 Ohio, 482; Gowen v. Shute, 4 Baxt. 57; Higginbotham v. McGready, 183 Mo. 96, 105 Am. St. Rep. 461, 81 S. W. 883; Sabine v. Paine, 166 App. Div. 9, 151 N. Y. Supp. 735.

The party to a negotiable paper cannot be a witness to invalidate it by showing that it was founded upon an illegal consideration.

Treon v. Brown, 14 Ohio, 482.

Mr. C. E. Gantt, for appellee:

The checks are void in the hands of an innocent purchaser before maturity.

Traders Bank v. Alsop, 64 Iowa, 97, 19 N. W. 863; Alexander v. Hazelrigg, 123 Ky. 677, 97 S. W. 353; Perry Sav. Bank v. Fitzgerald, 167 Iowa, 446, 149 N. W. 497.

Section 4965 of the Iowa Code, declaring instruments given in payment of gambling losses void, is not repealed by implication by the enactment of the Negotiable Instruments Law.

Alexander v. Hazelrigg, 123 Ky. 677, 97 N. W. 353; Perry Sav. Bank v. Fitzgerald, 167 Iowa, 446, 149 N. W. 497; Twentieth Street Bank v. Jacobs, 74 W. Va. 525, 82 S. E. 320, Ann. Cas. 1917D, 695; 8 C. J. 768, § 1033; Sabine v. Paine, 223 N. Y. 401, 5 A.L.R. 1444, 119 N. E. 849; Henry v. State Bank, 131 Iowa, 97, 107 N. W. 1034; Eskridge v. Thomas, 79 W. Va. 322, L.R.A. 1918C, 769, 91 S. E. 7.

Unless the defendant, by other acts than merely issuing the checks, assured plaintiff of their validity, he would not be estopped from setting up the defense that the checks were void.

First State Bank v. Williams, 143 Iowa, 177, 23 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1234, 136 Am. St. Rep. 759, 121 N. W. 702; Wingert v. Snouffer, 134 Iowa, 97, 108 N. W. 1035; 16 Cyc. 752.

Defendant is a competent witness to testify as to the consideration given for the checks in suit.

Dysart v. Furrow, 90 Iowa, 59, 57 N. W. 644; Slattery v. Slattery, 120 Iowa, 717, 95 N. W. 201; Davis v. Hall, 128 Iowa, 647, 105 N. W. 122; Chew v. Holt, 111 Iowa, 362, 82 N. W. 901.

Plaintiff could not be considered a bona fide purchaser unless the consideration for the transfer of said checks was paid before notice of such invalidity.

Walters v. Rock, 18 N. D. 45, 115 N. W. 511.

The evidence fails to show good faith on the part of the plaintiff in the acquirement of the checks in suit.

Lundean v. Hamilton, — Iowa, —, 169 N. W. 208; Iowa Nat. Bank v. Carter, 144 Iowa, 715, 123 N. W. 237.

Weaver, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The checks sued upon are two in number, one for $150, and another for $250, both drawn by the defendant, Dick Swift, upon the First National Bank of Hawarden, and made payable to the order of John Wilson,—a name which appears to be indorsed thereon. Plaintiff, claiming to be a good-faith holder for value, alleges that the checks have been dishonored and asks judgment against the maker.

The defendant admits making the checks and delivering them to one Edwards, who negotiated them to plaintiff, and pleads in defense that they were made and delivered in payment of a gambling debt contracted in a game of craps with said Edwards. The issues were tried to the court, a jury being waived. Judgment for defendant.

The plaintiff is a practising lawyer of experience, residing at Hawarden. Living in the same town is the defendant, Swift, a retired farmer of convivial habits, socially inclined, and (until his experience hereinafter referred to) profoundly confident of his ability to beat a professional gambler at his own game. Edwards is a traveling fakir who follows up county fairs and other public assemblies where gather the sheep for his shearing; while "Wilson," if there be any such individual anywhere, is not shown to have any definite location except in jail in Minnesota on a charge of murder.

Shortly before the date of these checks, Edwards drifted into Hawarden and, as was quite natural, soon came into contact with Swift. The powerful attraction of similar tastes led them to seek a convenient room where they spent most of Sunday night together. Swift is candid enough to say: "I can't say we were both perfectly sober. I don't think we was too sober, or that we was very drunk."

Edwards furnished the dice which defendant swears he himself carried away at the close of the game (and, indeed, it seems that the dice were all that was left to him when the game was over), when examination revealed that they were "dirty," "loaded," or "marked" to make the game a sure thing for their owner. Being asked by his counsel to explain or describe the game, he proceeded, with apparent surprise at the professed ignorance of his counsel, to elucidate the mystery and science of it, in the following luminous manner:

It is what is called a "crap game." You play this game with dice.

Q. How many?

A. Two.

Q. You shake these dice from a box?

A. No, you have them in your hand and throw them that way (indicating). There is no limit to the number that can play the game.

Q. How does the game go? How is the winner and loser determined?

A. You don't understand the game?

Q. I don't understand the game at all. That is why I am asking you so particularly.

A. Well, it is seven come eleven when they first come out, see, and if you don't make it, see, if you make a six you lose, see.

Q. Well, you take turns about throwing the dice?

A. Yes, there is the dice, see, and I lose if I don't get my seven. You have as many throws as you want until you make that seven, if they first come that way. You can bet all the way from 2 cents to $1,000 if you want to. No, we didn't have the money on the table. We just started a game—I had a little silver at first, but not much, but I lost that, and we kept on playing, see, and when we got through I gave him the checks, see. We were playing for ten and twenty, there wasn't any limit any more. Ten and twenty dollars a throw.

During the night's session, the participants had two reckonings, at the first of which the account was settled by the defendant's check of $150, and at the second the other check was made and delivered. For reasons perhaps not hard to divine, Edwards took the precaution to have both checks made payable to "Wilson." Swift made his way home on Monday morning and took early opportunity to go to the bank and stop payment of the paper, being led thereto apparently not so much because of his losses as by indignation at the discovery that Edwards had abused his confidence by cheating him with "dirty" dice.

The truth of defendant's story as to the origin and consideration of the checks is apparently conceded by the plaintiff; or, to say the least, there is no attempt made to deny or discredit defendant's testimony in this respect.

Edwards, apparently finding Hawarden a fertile field for the exercise of his special talent, remained there through the week without presenting the checks for payment. On September 26th he was arrested as a vagrant indulging in games of chance and brought before the mayor for hearing. Among the entries in the mayor's docket in that proceeding are the following:

"And now, on this 26th day of September, 1915, the defendant being brought into court, he was arraigned, says his right name is C. E. Edwards. Defendant was advised of right to counsel and time to prepare for trial. Defendant asks that the trial be set for the following day and refuses bonds.

"And now, on the 27th day of September, 1915, at 3 o'clock, P. M., the case came on for hearing. Plaintiff appears by himself and his attorney, C. A. Plank, and pleads guilty to the charge as set forth in the information. Defendant by himself and his attorney pleads bankruptcy and agrees that the fine and penalty to be assessed shall stand in full force against the defendant should he return to Hawarden. It is therefore ordered that the defendant be released and that he according to agreement leave

Hawarden at once and the fine and penalty assessed shall stand remitted so long as he returns not to the city, but in full force and effect should he return,

"After hearing the plea of the defendant, the evidence offered, and the arguments in the case, the court finds the defendant guilty upon his own plea entered by his attorney C. A. Plank, and no sufficient cause to the contrary being shown, it is ordered, adjudged, and determined that defendant pay a fine of $25, and the costs of this action, taxed at $6.35, or in lieu of the above fine, that he be imprisoned in the county jail for a period of thirty days."

Observing the dates disclosed by the mayor's record, it is interesting to find that plaintiff does not claim to have obtained the checks until September 28th,—the morning after the sentence of banishment was imposed upon his client by the mayor.

It is but fair to plaintiff to say that he denies having appeared for Edwards in the mayor's court on that day; but, on cross-examination, his denial seems to be as to the correctness of the date rather than of the fact of his appearance.

The story of plaintiff's receipt of the checks is too long and too intricate to permit its entire inclusion here, but it is, in effect, that on the very afternoon of September 27th, when the mayor's record shows the trial of Edwards to have taken place, a pretended detective from Minnesota appeared in Hawarden and arrested Edwards on a murder charge and proposed to hale him across the state line. According to plaintiff, Edwards then appealed for legal aid and advice to plaintiff, who immediately took up the matter, and for the rest of that day and the following day he wrestled with the case very diligently and succeeded in so demonstrating the innocence of his client that the invading hosts from Minnesota abandoned the pursuit, and, folding their tents like Arabs, stole away to their native wilds; while Edwards disappeared in the setting sun, or elsewhere, having transferred the two checks to plaintiff as his well-earned fee for professional services.

I. If it were a vital question in the case whether plaintiff can claim any standing as an innocent holder of the paper without notice of any defense thereto, it would be a sufficient answer upon this appeal to say that, accepting his own story as literally true, our respect for his intelligence would compel a negative answer to this inquiry. It appears beyond reasonable doubt that Edwards's title to the checks was defective in the sense of that term as used in our statute (Code* Supp. 1913, § 3060a55), and the burden is thus cast upon plaintiff in any event to establish his claim to be a good-faith holder by a preponderance of credible evidence.

We have too often said that in such cases, if the fair tendency of the facts indicates bad faith of the holder, the question is one of fact for the jury, and not one of law for the court. It would be little less than ridiculous to hold, under the admitted and well-proved facts in this case, that plaintiff's claim to be a good-faith holder has been established as a matter of law.

McNight v. Parsons, 136 Iowa, 390, 22 L.R.A. (N.S.) 718, 125 Am. St. Rep. 265, 113 N. W. 858, 15 Ann. Cas. 655; Keegan v. Rock, 128 Iowa, 39, 102 N. W. 805; City Nat. Bank v. Jordan, 139 Iowa, 499, 117 N. W. 758; O'Conner v. Kleiman, 143 Iowa, 435, 121 N. W. 1088; Arnd v. Aylesworth, 145 Iowa, 185, 29 L.R.A. (N.S.) 638, 123 N. W. 1000.

II. But an insuperable objection to plaintiff's right of recovery is found in the established fact that the checks were given for a gambling debt, and under our statute they are absolutely void even in the hands of a professed innocent holder. Code,

The case of Kushner v. Abbott, 156 Iowa, 598, 137 N. W. 913, has sometimes been cited as holding that the Negotiable Instruments Law has had the effect to repeal or modify Code, § 4965, and the syllabus or headnote to that case does not reflect the real point decided in the opinion. Though the question as to the effect of the later statute is there mentioned, the court expressly says it is not presented by the record, nor is its decision attempted.

Our attention is called to a case cited from the court of District of Columbia, and possibly others, which tend in some respects to uphold the plaintiff's contention; but we are thoroughly persuaded that in enacting our Negotiable Instruments Law the legislature did not intend thereby to repeal or modify the statute which places a ban on all gambling contracts, and we are not willing to hold that it has any such destructive effect by implication.

The law which throws its shield around commercial paper is too often made to do duty as a city of refuge for unscrupulous persons in the perpetration of frauds and unlawful purposes generally, and courts will hesitate about swinging the door any wider for their shelter until compelled so to do by explicit legislative command.

III. Plaintiff claims that defendant had estopped himself to rely on his defense because of his negligence.

The objection so raised is not well taken. Defendant did stop payment with reasonable promptness, and plaintiff's evidence is insufficient to sustain a finding that he was in any manner deceived or misled to his injury by any act of the defendant. The judgment below is too clearly right to call for further discussion, and it is therefore affirmed.

ANNOTATION.

Effect of Negotiable Instruments Act on statute invalidating instrument given for gambling consideration.

Generally.

The majority of the cases which have passed directly on the question hold that a statute invalidating negotiable instruments given for a gambling consideration is not repealed by the adoption of the Uniform Negotiable Instruments Act, which contains a provision to the effect that a holder in due course holds the instrument free from any defect of title of prior parties and free from defenses available to prior parties among themselves. Alexander v. Hazelrigg (1906) 123 Ky. 677, 97 S. W. 353; Martin v. Hess (1914) 23 Pa. Dist. R. 195; Twentieth Street Bank v. Jacobs (1914) 74 W. Va. 525, 82 S. E. 320, Ann. Cas. 1917D, 695. And see the reported case (PLANK v. SWIFT, ante, 309). Compare Wirt v. Stubblefield (1900) 17 App. D. C. 283.

The Negotiable Instruments Act was adopted in Kentucky in 1904. At the time of its enactment there was in force a statute which declared all gaming contracts to be void. The case of Alexander v. Hazelrigg (Ky.) supra, was the first to pass on the effect of the Negotiable Instruments Act on the earlier statute. In that case it appeared that the plaintiff was a bona fide holder of a negotiable instrument which had been executed for a gambling consideration. It was held that the Negotiable Instruments Law in no way modified or repealed the statute invalidating such instruments. The court said: "It has been the policy of this state to suppress gaming, and the statutes making gaming contracts void are founded upon what the legislature has for many years deemed to be sound public policy. It is inconceivable that the general assembly in the passage of the Act of 1904, for the protection of innocent holders of negotiable instruments, intended to, or did, repeal § 1955 of Kentucky Statutes, which declares all gaming contracts void. In our opinion the dis-appointment now and then of an innocent holder of a negotiable instrument would not be as hurtful and injurious to the best interests of the state as the removal of the ban from gaming contracts." In the subsequent case of Holzbog v. Bakrow (1913) 156 Ky. 161, 50 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1023, 160 S. W. 792, it was held that a note given for a gambling consideration was not enforceable by a bona fide purchaser unless the maker was estopped to assert the defense, but the Negotiable Instruments Act was not referred to.

In Pennsylvania, in Martin v. Hess (1914) 23 Pa. Dist. R. 195, the question was raised as to the effect of the Negotiable Instruments Act (Act of May 16, 1901, P. L. 194), on the Act of April 22, 1794, providing that "every contract, note, bill, bond, judgment, mortgage or other security or conveyance whatsoever, given, granted, drawn or entered into for security or satisfaction of the same, or any part thereof, shall be utterly void and of none effect." In that case it appeared that the plaintiff was a bona fide purchaser of a promissory note given for a gambling consideration. The sections of the Negotiable Instruments Act relied on by the plaintiff were as follows: "The title of a person who negotiates an instrument is defective, within the meaning of this act, when he obtained the instrument or any signature thereto by fraud, duress or force, and fear or other unlawful means, or for an illegal consideration, or when he negotiates it in breach of faith or under such circumstances as amount to a fraud." § 55. "A holder in due course holds the instrument free from any defect of title of prior parties, and free from defenses available to prior parties among themselves, and may enforce payment of the instrument for the full amount thereof against all parties liable thereon." § 57. The court said: "The latter act does not expressly repeal or refer to the Act of April 22, 1794, 3 Smith's Laws, 177, but § 197 thereof reads: 'All acts or parts of acts inconsistent herewith be and the same are hereby repealed.' The public policy of this state is expressed in the Act of April 22, 1794, 3 Smith's Laws, 177, and the decisions of the courts thereunder have been that contracts and their obligations based upon gaming transactions are null and void ab initio. . . . Did the legislature, in adopting the Negotiable Instruments Act of 1901, intend by implication to sweep away all existing legislation in Pennsylvania on the subject of making void gaming contracts and the notes or securities given in payment thereof? 'Repeals by implication are not favored, and will not be indulged unless it is manifest that the legislature so intended. . . .' It is manifest that the object and purpose of the Act of 1794 is to place the ban of the law on gaming and to make void gaming contracts, notes, checks, and securities given in satisfaction of payment thereof; and it is equally clear that the object and purpose of the Act of May 16, 1901, P. L. 194, is to regulate the issuance of, and the rights of parties to, and the holders of, negotiable instruments, or what is more generally known as commercial paper. The whole scope of the latter act refers to dealings with commercial paper, so as to protect innocent purchasers of such against mere defenses available as between the original parties. However, this act applies only to paper that might have been obligatory between the parties,—that which it was legally possible for the parties to make. Where the parties were never bound because the law made the note void, as being contrary to public policy as expressed in the statutes, the Nego-

table Instruments Act does not have any application. That this act was not intended to inject life into a written instrument that by law was null and void ab initio is apparent from the use of the word 'liable' in § 57 of this act, viz.: 'A holder in due course holds the instrument free from any defect of title of prior parties, and free from defenses available to prior parties among themselves, and may enforce payment of the instrument for the full amount thereof against all parties liable thereon.' The liability is defined to be the state of one who is bound in law and justice to do something which may be enforced by action: Bouvier, p. 206. The maker of a note given in payment of a gambling transaction is not liable on such instrument, as by law such instrument is null and void and of no effect. It is questionable whether such a note ever becomes a negotiable instrument. The construction of the Act of May 16, 1901, P. L. 194, sought for by the plaintiff, would likewise repeal existing laws for the protection of infants, married women, and insane or feeble-minded persons; and it is evident that such was not the intention of the legislature. Our conclusion is that the two acts of the legislature here considered are not inconsistent and irreconcilable, as the Act of May 16, 1901, P. L. 194, has application only to such instruments that were obligatory upon the original party or parties thereto."

The supreme court of West Virginia, in the case of Twentieth Street Bank v. Jacobs (1914) 74 W. Va. 525, 82 S. E. 320, Ann. Cas. 1917D, 695, expressly ruled on the effect of the Negotiable Instruments Act on an earlier act declaring all gambling contracts to be void. In that case it was held that the Negotiable Instruments Law did not modify or repeal the statute. The court said: "The legislature was dealing, at the time of the passage of the act and in the passage thereof, with the matter of negotiability of paper which the law allowed men to put on the market and the courts to enforce. It was not then considering the subject of gaming, to which it had previously given its careful attention, nor acting upon it. The act does not mention it, nor did any provision thereof suggest it to the legislative mind. Any presumption that any member of the legislature, while considering or acting upon the bill, had the slightest suggestion or intimation from any of its terms, that it would, in any sense or to any degree, legalize gambling debts, would be a most violent one. Nobody in reading the act, without having had the subject of gaming debts fixed in his mind, at the time, by some means other than its terms, would likely discover the alleged opening for the use of paper expressly declared by law to be absolutely void in the hands of any and all persons, and appreciate at the same time the far-reaching effect of it. The partial legalization contended for would virtually destroy the previous statute, for every paper negotiable in form, taken for money lost or bet in gambling, would be made valid by the mere indorsement and delivery thereof to some person ignorant of the character of the consideration. Of course, the legislature never saw nor intended any such result." The court followed the decision of the Kentucky court in Alexander v. Hazelrigg (1906) 123 Ky. 677, 97 S. W. 353, supra, and declined to follow the holding of the District of Columbia court in Wirt v. Stubblefield (1900) 17 App. D. C. 283, infra.

In the reported case (PLANK v. SWIFT, ante, 309) it is held that the Negotiable Instruments Act of 1902 neither modifies nor repeals that section of the Iowa Code which provides that "all promises, agreements, notes, bills, bonds or other contracts, mortgages or other securities, when the whole or any part of the consideration thereof is for money or other valuable thing won or lost, laid, staked or bet, at or upon any game of any kind or any wager, are absolutely void and of no effect." In Kushner v. Abbott (1912) 156 Iowa, 598, 137 N. W. 913, referred to in the reported case (PLANK v. SWIFT) as having sometimes been cited as holding that the Negotiable Instruments Act modified the statute declaring void obligations given for a gambling consideration, the court expressly said that it was not "necessary to determine . . . whether the adoption of the Negotiable Instruments Law has modified our prior statute relating to gambling transactions so as to render valid in the hands of an innocent holder a promissory note or other negotiable instruments executed in connection with or in pursuance of a gambling transaction."

In Wirt v. Stubblefield (1900) 17 App. D. C. 283, it appeared that the plaintiff was a bona fide purchaser of a promissory note which had been executed for a gambling consideration. It was held that the Negotiable Instruments Act, made applicable by Congress to the District of Columbia in 1899, repealed as to bona fide holders the statute invalidating contracts based on a gambling consideration. The court said: "It is difficult to conceive, if we bear in mind the object and policy intended to be promoted by, as well as the entire scope and express provisions of, the 'Negotiable Instruments Law,' that the framers of that act ever intended to save and preserve unrepealed, as part of the law governing negotiable instruments, the old English Statutes of 16 Car. II. and 9 Anne, against gaming. On the contrary, it was most clearly among the objects and purposes of that act, to get rid of all such impediments and hindrances to the circulation of negotiable instruments as had been created by those old statutes, and to embody the entire law upon the subject, as far as practicable, into one well digested and consistent act. . . . It is quite clear that the act of Congress was intended to cover the whole subject of negotiable instruments as far as it could be done by statute; and therefore to exclude the operation and effect of former statutes like those of Charles and Anne. . . . We are clearly of opinion that the British Statutes of 16 Car. II. chap. 8, and 9 Anne, chap. 14, against gaming, so far as they might or would, if in force, affect the validity of the negotiable instruments embraced by the act of Congress, are inconsistent with the provisions of the latter act, and they are, therefore, to the extent that they are so inconsistent or repugnant to the act of Congress, repealed, and no longer, as to negotiable instruments, in force in this District."

Decisions in Alabama, Colorado, Nevada, and Tennessee.

In at least four jurisdictions since the adoption therein of the Negotiable Instruments Act decisions have been rendered with reference to the rights of a bona fide holder of an instrument given for a gambling consideration under a statute invalidating instruments so given. In none of these cases, however, was the effect of the Negotiable Instruments Act discussed by the court. Thus, in the Alabama case of Birmingham Trust & Sav. Co. v. Curry (1909) 160 Ala. 370, 135 Am. St. Rep. 102, 49 So. 319, the court, reversing on another ground, laid down the rule, for the guidance of the trial court, that a negotiable instrument given for a gambling consideration, declared void by § 2163 of the Code of 1896, was void not only as to the parties, but also as to innocent purchasers for value, the Negotiable Instruments Act, adopted some two years previously, not being mentioned.

The Colorado decisions have not, in express language, dealt with the effect of the Negotiable Instruments Act on § 850 of the General Statutes, which provides as follows: "All contracts, promises, agreements, conveyances, securities and notes made, given, granted, executed, drawn or entered into, where the whole or any part of the consideration thereof shall be for money or property won by gaming or money or property loaned for the purpose of gaming, 'shall be utterly void and of no effect.'" In Ayer v. Younker (1897) 10 Colo. App. 27, 50 Pac. 218, it appeared that the plaintiff was the bona fide holder of a negotiable note given for a gambling consideration. Without considering the Negotiable Instruments Act, it was held that no recovery could be had since the note was void in its inception. Referring to the act invalidating instruments resting on a gaming consideration, the court said: "The language employed is open to no other construction. The protection which the law extends to an innocent holder, who, for value, in the usual course of trade, has received negotiable paper, is of no avail when the statute in terms or by unavoidable implication has pronounced the instrument absolutely void. Stricken with nullity at its birth, it can thereafter gain no validity." So, in the subsequent case of Western Nat. Bank v. State Bank (1902) 18 Colo. App. 128, 70 Pac. 439, it was held that the indorsement and transfer of a certificate of deposit for a gambling consideration was absolutely void even as against an innocent purchaser. However, in the case of Sullivan v. German Nat. Bank (1902) 18 Colo. App. 99, 70 Pac. 162, wherein it appeared that a bank certificate of deposit was indorsed in Texas in payment of a gambling debt contracted in that state, and it further appeared that the transaction was legal in Texas, the court applied the lex loci contractus and permitted the bona fide purchaser to recover.

The certificate of deposit involved in the Nevada case of Burke v. Buck (1909) 31 Nev. 74, 22 L.R.A.(N.S.) 627, 99 Pac. 1078, 21 Ann. Cas. 625, was transferred for a gambling consideration in the same year (1907) that the Negotiable Instruments Act was adopted. Nothing appears in the case to show whether the cause of action arose prior or subsequent to its passage. It was held, without mention of the Negotiable Instruments Act, that the transferee of the certificate could not recover as against the indorser.

Apparently the only case which has arisen in Tennessee involving a negotiable instrument given for a gambling consideration is Snoddy v. American Nat. Bank (1890) 88 Tenn. 573, 7 L.R.A. 705, 17 Am. St. Rep. 918, 13 S. W. 127, wherein it was held that a bona fide holder could not recover on a note given in connection with a deal in futures, which, under the Tennessee statute, was invalid as a wagering contract. The court made no mention of the Negotiable Instruments Act which was adopted in 1889. A. S. M.

Insurance — intentional injuries — mistaken identity.

1. A provision contained in an accident insurance policy, which excepts from operation of the policy "injuries intentionally inflicted upon the insured by any other person," contemplates injuries intended against the insured, and not injuries intended against another, and such exception will not relieve the insurer from liability for an injury to the insured inflicted by another person, where the other person, intending to injure someone other than the insured, mistook the insured for the person to be injured, and intentionally inflicted upon him the bodily injury while the insured was not aware of the intent to injure him and had done nothing to bring about the injury.

Bailey, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This action was brought in the district court of Wagoner county, by the defendant in error as plaintiff, against plaintiff in error as defendant, to recover on a policy of accident insurance, issued by plaintiff in error, to one Charles Nave, and in which policy defendant in error, Laura Hymes, was named as beneficiary. The cause was tried to a jury, resulting in a verdict in favor of defendant in error for the principal sum named in the policy, and from judgment rendered thereon plaintiff in error appeals. We will refer to the parties hereafter as they stood in the trial court.

The evidence in the case disclosed these facts: The insured, a negro, was attending a negro dance at the time he met his death. One Pompey Drew, another negro, was also there. During the course of the evening Nave and Drew were drinking, and that during the festivities one Spencer Luckey was held up at the point of a pistol by Drew and $15 was taken from Spencer by Drew. The evidence further discloses that Drew and Nave were friends and upon friendly terms and relations. Just after the holdup of Spencer, Nave appeared in the yard near Drew, inquiring: "Where is P. D.? He ain't no bad son of a bitch." Immediately thereafter, Drew fired upon Nave, inflicting a mortal wound, from which he died a few days later. Other evidence will be noted as may be necessary hereafter in the opinion.

The policy of insurance, which is purely one of accident and health, contains the provision, that "in the event of death resulting from the following causes, the corporation's liability shall be one month's indemnity, as provided in §§ 2 and 5 of this policy: . . . Injury intentionally inflicted upon the insured by any other person."

It was stipulated between the parties in the trial court that one month's indemnity under this policy is $30, and that defendant had tendered this amount to plaintiff in full settlement of its liability, and that such tender was made good at the trial. It is the contention of plaintiff in error that under the facts in the case, and the clause of the policy above quoted, its liability is limited to the one month's indemnity of $30, and that the court should have so instructed the jury.

After introducing the policy sued upon plaintiff introduced the proofs of death furnished by defendant, in which proofs of death there were contained affidavits as to how the insured met his death, and in which affidavits there were contained the following questions and answers:

Ques. Exactly what was the insured doing at the time?

Ans. There was no quarrel between the deceased and guilty party, party who done the shooting was sentenced to life imprisonment.

Ques. Precisely how did the accident happen?

Ans. Pompey Drew held up Spencer Luckey and took $15. Deceased, not knowing what was being done, stepped out the door, and Pompey Drew shot him, without any provocation whatever.

At the end of plaintiff's testimony in chief, defendant interposed a demurrer to the evidence of plaintiff, which demurrer was overruled by the court, and which action of the court is assigned as error; it being the contention of plaintiff in error that these proofs of death established that the deceased was intentionally shot by Pompey Drew, and that therefore plaintiff was not entitled to recover other than one month's indemnity. It is true that proofs of death are prima facie evidence against plaintiff of the facts therein stated, but we do not think such proofs as here offered necessarily show an intention upon the part of Drew to shoot Nave, and, besides, counsel has failed to note that as a part of the plaintiff's evidence in chief, it was testified that at the instant of the shooting Nave said, "O Lord!" and Drew said: "Did I shoot you, Charley? I did not know that was you I shot."

The proofs of loss, though prima facie true against the insured, are not conclusive nor irrebuttable. Reserve Loan L. Ins. Co. v. Isom, — Okla. —, 173 Pac. 841; Hill v. Ætna Ins. Co. 150 N. C. 1, 63 S. E. 124.

Under numerous decisions of this court, when a demurrer to the evidence is interposed, the court cannot weigh conflicting evidence, but must treat that as withdrawn which is most favorable to the demurrant, and all the facts which the evidence in the slightest degree tends to prove, and all reasonable inferences or conclusions which may be logically and reasonably drawn from the evidence, are admitted. Rawlings v. Ufer, — Okla. —, 161 Pac. 183; Bean v. Rumrill, — Okla. —, 172 Pac. 453. We do not think the court committed any error in overruling defendant's demurrer to the evidence.

It is next assigned as error that the court erred in giving the following instruction: "The jury are further instructed that the intent on the part of the said Pompey Drew, with which he inflicted the injuries upon the said Charles Nave from which said injuries the said Charles Nave died, is to be gathered from all the facts and circumstances proved in the case and the facts and circumstances surrounding the killing at the time. And in this case if you should believe that the said Pompey Drew shot at the said Charles Nave believing at the time that the said Charles Nave was some other person, and that the said Pompey Drew would not have shot and killed the said Charles Nave had he known that the person at whom he was shooting was Charles Nave, then in that event you are instructed that the injuries inflicted upon the said Charles Nave would not be intentional within the meaning of the policy, and in the event of such finding your verdict should be for the plaintiff."

This instruction presents for the consideration of the court the real proposition in this case, viz., whether a recovery is to be permitted under the terms and conditions of the policy as above quoted even under a finding that, at the time Drew shot and killed Nave, he believed Nave to be some person other than Nave. It has been noted that at the time of the shooting Drew and Nave were upon friendly terms and relations; no difficulty had occurred between them. A few moments prior to the shooting, however, Drew had been involved in a difficulty with one Luckey. Numerous parties appear to have attended the dance. Some of these, including Drew, were outside of the house, and in the darkness of the night, a few moments after the difficulty between Drew and Luckey, in Luckey's absence, Nave appeared. The shooting immediately occurred, followed by the exclamation, "O Lord!" with Drew stating: "Did I shoot you, Charley? I did not know that was you I shot." Under such state of the record, the question of intent was a question of fact for the jury, unless it is to be held that, under the provisions of the policy quoted, such intention is not to be governed or controlled or liability be affected by reason of the identity of the person injured.

It is apparent that the trial court submitted the case to the jury upon the theory that if, at the time Drew shot and killed Nave, he shot under the mistaken apprehension that Nave was someone else, and that he would not have shot Nave had he known who he was, such facts did not bring the injury within the terms of the exception clause quoted. It may be noted here that the burden of proof was upon the defendant, after proof of death by accidental means, to prove the injury within the terms of the exceptions noted. Union Acci. Co. v. Willis, 44 Okla. 578, L.R.A.1915D, 358, 145 Pac. 812. And it may also be observed that the injury is accidental within the meaning of an insurance policy, insuring against external, violent, and accidental means, although it is inflicted intentionally and maliciously, if unprovoked, unforeseen, and unintentional on the part of the insured. Ibid. Maloney v. Maryland Casualty Co. 113 Ark. 174, 167 S. W. 845; Newsome v. Travelers Ins. Co. 143 Ga. 785, 85 S. E. 1035; Travelers Protective Asso. v. Fawcett, 56 Ind. App. 111, 104 N. E. 991. It has become settled law that where a stipulation or exception in a policy of insurance is capable of two meanings, or is ambiguous or uncertain, that meaning and interpretation is to be adopted which is the most favorable to the assured. Shawnee L. Ins. Co. v. Watkins, 53 Okla. 188, 156 Pac. 181; Friend v. Southern States L. Ins. Co. 58 Okla. 448, L.R.A.1917B, 208, 160 Pac. 457.

The finding of the jury, under the instruction above quoted, was necessarily a finding that at the time Drew shot and killed Nave it was not within his knowledge that he was shooting at Nave. In a leading case (Utter v. Travelers' Ins. Co. 65 Mich. 545, 8 Am. St. Rep. 913, 32 N. W. 812) wherein there was under consideration a policy of insurance containing an exception as follows: "And was not the result of design, either on the part of the deceased or of any other person," it is said: "It seems to me that the design intended by the terms of this policy must be the design that intended the actual result accomplished, and not the design of the act itself, which act resulted in the killing of one contrary to the design of the act. If, when Berry fired this shot, he did not know the man he fired at was Utter, and did not intend to kill Utter, it cannot be said that Utter lost his life by the design of Berry."

In Union Acci. Co. v. Willis, supra, while considering a state of facts not similar to the facts in the instant case, the principles announced in Utter v. Travelers' Ins. Co. supra, were quoted with apparent approval, and likewise in Orr v. Travelers' Ins. Co. 120 Ala. 647, 24 So. 997, the rule as announced in Utter v. Travelers' Ins. Co. supra, was approved. See also Hutchcraft v. Travelers' Ins. Co. 87 Ky. 300, 12 Am. St. Rep. 484, 8 S. W. 570. In Travelers' Ins. Co. v. Fawcett, supra, the supreme court of Indiana, in discussing an exception clause reading, "Intentional injuries" inflicted on the assured by some other person," held that such words, "within the meaning of this contract, refer to injuries which the other person actually directed against the insured and intended to inflict upon him." It may be noted the provision considered in Utter v. Travelers' Ins. Co. was "that the said death or personal injury . . . was not the result of design, either on the part of the deceased or of any other person."

And our attention has been called to Continental Casualty Co. v. Cunningham, 188 Ala. 159, L.R.A. 1915A, 538, 66 So. 41, and Strother v. Business Men's Asso. 193 Mo. App. 718, 188 S. W. 314, wherein it is held that the language of the policy considered in the Utter Case, to wit, "the result of design," is of narrower import than "injuries intentionally inflicted," as contained in the policy under consideration. But in Newsome v. Travelers Ins. Co. 143 Ga. 785, 85 S. E. 1035, in considering a policy of insurance wherein there was excepted from operation of the policy "injuries intentionally inflicted upon the insured by any other person," the court, considering the case of Utter v. Travelers' Ins. Co. supra, and the provision of the policy under consideration in that case, held that "the use of the word 'design,' as thus employed, does no render the exception contained in that policy substantially different from that involved in the" case under consideration then before that court, and on a careful consideration of the terms as generally defined, and considering the sense and meaning usually given to them, we think the exception clause, "injury intentionally inflicted upon insured," may, under the rule of construction herein adopted, be fairly held and construed to refer to an injury which was intentionally aimed directly and individually at the insured, and not intended for some other person.

In Newsome v. Travelers Ins. Co. supra, the court said: "A provision contained in an accident insurance policy, . . . which excepts from operation of the policy injuries 'intentionally inflicted upon the insured by any other person,' . . . contemplates injuries intended against the insured, and not injuries intended against another. Accordingly, such exception will not relieve the insurer from liability for an injury to the insured inflicted by another person, where the other person, intending to injure someone other than the insured, mistook the insured for the person intended to be injured and intentionally inflicted upon him a bodily injury, while he was unaware of the intent to injure him, and had done nothing to bring about the injury."

Under the evidence in this case, there being nothing to warrant the conclusion that the deceased, Nave, was aware of any intent to injure him or that he had done anything to bring about such injury, the evidence further justifying the conclusion on the part of the jury that at the time insured was shot and killed the assailant did not believe that he was assaulting the insured, or had intended to assault insured, the court did not err in giving the instruction quoted.

In view of the conclusion we have reached, it is not necessary to consider other assignments of error, and, for the reasons herein given, the judgment of the trial court is affirmed.

ANNOTATION.

Insurance: applicability of provisions as to injuries intentionally inflicted where insured is injured because of mistake of identity.

Provisions of accident policies excluding or limiting liability in case of injuries intentionally inflicted upon the insured are generally held inapplicable where the insured is injured or killed by one who mistakes him for another person. Newsome v. Travelers Ins. Co. (1915) 143 Ga. 785, 85 S. E. 1035; Travelers Protective Asso. v. Fawcett (1914) 56 Ind. App. 111, 104 N. E. 991; Hutchcraft v. Travelers' Ins. Co. (1888) 87 Ky. 300, 12 Am. St.

Rep. 484, 8 S. W. 570; GENERAL ACCL. FIRE & LIFE ASSUR. CORP. v. HYMES (reported herewith) ante, 318.

It will be observed that in the reported case (GENERAL ACCL. FIRE & LIFE ASSUR. CORP. v. HYMES) the provision of the policy limiting liability for "injury intentionally inflicted upon the insured by any other person" was held to refer to an injury which was intentionally aimed individually at the insured, and not intended for some other person, and was therefore held not to reduce the liability where the insured was shot by one who believed him to be another person.

And in Newsome v. Travelers Ins. Co. (Ga.) supra, a provision of an accident policy excepting injuries "intentionally inflicted upon the insured by any other person" was held to contemplate only injuries intended against the insured, and not to relieve the insurer from liability for an injury to the insured by another who mistook him for the one intended to be injured, it appearing that the insured was unaware of the intent to injure him and had done nothing to bring about the injury.

And in Travelers Protective Asso. v. Fawcett (1914) 56 Ind. App. 111, 104 N. E. 991, where the insured, a bank cashier, while in a group of four men in front of the vault in the bank, was shot by one who was attempting to rob the bank, the evidence was held to support a finding that there was no specific intent to injure the insured, and it was held that the insurer was not relieved from liability by a provision of the policy excluding liability on account of injuries intentionally inflicted on the insured by any other person. The court said: "The evidence shows without dispute that Hoal (the robber) discharged several shots from revolvers into a group of four men huddled together in front of the vault in the bank. There is a general presumption that a person intends the usual and ordinary consequences of his act. Appellant, relying upon this presumption, asserts that the usual and ordinary consequences of such an act would be to kill or injure some one or more of them, and that, as there is no evidence whatsoever tending to overcome such presumption, it must prevail and be sufficient to establish the fact that Thomas Hoal intentionally killed the assured. If the question involved were one affecting the rights of Thomas Hoal either in a civil or criminal action, the presumption stated would obtain against him in all its strictness. In such a case if it appeared that the injury inflicted was the result of an act which was reasonably calculated to produce injury to some one of a number of persons, a general intention to injure some person will be presumed. Such presumption includes all persons who were liable to be harmed by such act and therefore includes the person who actually receives the injury. In such a case it is presumed as against the party inflicting the injury that he intended to injure the person who was actually harmed, regardless of whether he had any actual specific intention to injure such person rather than another, and notwithstanding that he really may have intended his act to harm someone else. In this case the rights of the person who inflicted the injury are not involved. The question arises under a contract by which it was stipulated that the association should not be liable on account of injuries intentionally inflicted on the assured by any other person. 'Intentional injuries' inflicted on the assured by some other person, within the meaning of this contract, refer to injuries which the other person actually directed against the insured and intended to inflict upon him. The parties contracted with reference to the actual intention of the person inflicting the injury, rather than such an intention as the law presumes against a wrongdoer. In cases where rights of parties claiming under such a contract are involved, and where it becomes necessary to prove an actual intent to injure a particular person, the presumption that a person intends the ordinary and usual consequences of his act cannot be given so wide a scope as it is given in cases which affect the rights of the party who causes an injury. In such a case if an act is shown which would naturally and reasonably result in injury to some one of several persons, it may be presumed that the author of the act intended to injure someone, but it cannot be presumed as against anyone except the author of the act that he intended the injury for the particular person who received it."

In Hutchcraft v. Travelers' Ins. Co. (1888) 87 Ky. 300, 12 Am. St. Rep. 484, 8 S. W. 570, where the insured was waylaid and killed for the purpose of robbery, a provision of the policy that no claim should be made when death was caused "by intentional injuries inflicted by the insured or any other person" was held applicable and to prevent a recovery, but the court said: "We think, however, that said clause was intended to apply to such injuries by other persons as are intentionally directed against the insured, and not to such injuries as the insured may receive at the hands of third persons who are attempting to do mischief generally; or who are attempting to injure any particular individual, other than the insured, or class of individuals, or any kind of property, for in such cases it cannot be said that the injuring was intentionally aimed directly and individually at the insured."

The provision involved in Utter v. Travelers' Ins. Co. (1887) 65 Mich. 545, 8 Am. St. Rep. 913, 32 N. W. 812, is somewhat different from the usual clauses found in accident policies, it being as follows: "This insurance shall not be held to extend to . . . death or personal injury unless the claimant . . . shall establish by direct and positive proof that the said death or personal injury . . . was not the result of design, either on the part of the insured or of any other person." In this case the insured was shot by a sheriff, but, the evidence being conflicting as to whether he knew who the insured was when he shot, it was held that the case should have been submitted to the jury, that the "design" mentioned in the provision was a design to kill the insured, and that if at the time the sheriff fired he did not know that he was shooting at the insured, a recovery was not barred by the provision quoted.

A result not in accord with the preceding cases was reached in Continental Casualty Co. v. Cunningham (1914) 188 Ala. 159, L.R.A.1915A, 538, 66 So. 41, where the insured, a police officer, was shot by one whom he was pursuing, it being held that, although he was shot under the mistaken belief that he was another, this did not prevent the shooting from being intentional within the meaning of a provision of the policy limiting liability "where the injury causing the loss results wholly or in part . . . from the intentional act of the insured or any other person." The court said: "In a number of charges given at the instance of plaintiff, and also in his oral charge, the trial judge instructed the jury in effect that the killing of Cunningham, the insured, by McGuffin, was not intentional unless McGuffin shot and killed him knowing him to be John L. Cunningham; and also that, if McGuffin shot him believing him to be some other person, the restrictive provision of the policy was not applicable, and plaintiff was entitled to recover the full amount of the insurance. We are indebted to the briefs of counsel for a full and helpful discussion of this theory of the case. Upon very thorough consideration we are entirely convinced of its unsoundness. We find no warrant in the language of the policy for such a narrow and exacting construction of the phrase 'intentional act.' We think it is wholly immaterial whether or not Cunningham was known to McGuffin, or whether, knowing him, McGuffin mistook him for someone else whom he intended to shoot. If in fact, having the requisite mental capacity, he intended to shoot the human being who accosted him and threatened to obstruct his flight, his act was an intentional act, and the killing was an intentional result, no matter what he may have supposed was the name or personal identity of his victim. Such a shooting is in no sense accidental so far as the assailant is concerned, and it falls within the restrictive language and purpose of the contract." The decision in Utter v. Travelers' Ins. Co. (Mich.) supra, was distinguished on the ground that the provisions of the policies were different, but the court stated that if not so distinguishable they would be constrained to regard the Utter Case as unsound. J. T. W.

MOTION by plaintiff to quash a writ of habeas corpus to secure petitioner's release from custody to which he had been committed under a writ of ne exeat issued by the Circuit Court for Milwaukee County in a divorce action. Motion granted.

Statement by Rosenberry, J.:

August 27, 1919, the plaintiff began an action for divorce against the defendant. On the 8th day of September the defendant was ordered to pay the plaintiff $8 a week temporary alimony, and $25 attorney's fees. On the 11th day of September, upon the verified complaint and affidavit of the plaintiff, a writ of ne exeat was issued, and on the 12th day of September the sheriff took the defendant into custody under the writ. On the 16th day of September the defendant served his verified answer, denying the allegations of the plaintiff's complaint, and by order of the court the plaintiff was required to show cause why the writ of ne exeat should not be vacated. On the 18th day of September the trial court denied defendant's motion to vacate the writ. In the affidavit upon which the writ was partly based, it is alleged that before the order for alimony could be served the defendant withdrew from the banks all of the moneys on deposit belonging to the parties, $3,100, which sum represented their joint savings. It is further alleged that the defendant attempted to remove the money beyond the jurisdiction of the court, and that he told the plaintiff and other persons that he would go to Europe and take the money with him. The defendant remained in the custody of the sheriff, not having given bail.

The defendant applied to this court for a writ of habeas corpus, and on the 7th day of October the sheriff made his return, setting forth the writ ne exeat, from which it appears that the defendant was required to give bail in the sum of $1,500, with sufficient sureties. The plaintiff moved to quash the writ.

Messrs. L. A. Zavitowski and George A. Bowman for Helen Grbic, contra.

Messrs. Arthur R. Barry and Benjamin T. Schick for relator.

Rosenberry, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The question raised by the motion to quash the writ is whether or not the circuit court of Milwaukee county had jurisdiction, upon the facts and circumstances shown by the affidavit and verified complaint of the plaintiff, to issue a writ of ne exeat. The statutory provisions relating to the writ of ne exeat are found in §§ 2784-2786. While § 2785 provides that no writ of ne exeat shall be granted unless it satisfactorily appears to the court or the judge by the affidavit of the plaintiff or some indifferent witness that sufficient grounds exist therefor, the grounds upon which the writ may issue are not specified. As said in Davidor v. Rosenberg, 130 Wis. 22, 118 Am. St. Rep. 986, 109 N. W. 925, resort must be had to the common law to ascertain the function of the writ, as well as the grounds upon which it may issue. The nature of the writ and the grounds upon which it may issue are discussed in Davidor v. Rosenberg, and the cases there cited; no reference being made to actions for divorce. "It is an undoubted general principle of the law of divorce in this country that the courts, either of law or equity, possess no powers except such as are conferred by statute; and that, to justify any act or proceeding in a case of divorce, whether it be such as pertains to the ground or cause of action itself, to the process, pleadings, or practice in it, or to the mode of enforcing the judgment or decree, authority therefor must be found in the statute, and cannot be looked for elsewhere, or otherwise asserted or exercised." Barker v. Dayton, 28 Wis. 367.

Section 2348, Wis. Stat., provides: "The circuit court has jurisdiction of all actions to affirm or to annul a marriage, or for a divorce from the bond of matrimony, or from bed and board, and authority to do all acts and things necessary and proper in such actions and to carry its orders and judgments into execution as hereinafter prescribed. All such actions shall be commenced and conducted and the orders and judgments therein enforced according to the provisions of these statutes in respect to actions in courts of record, as far as applicable, except as provided in this chapter."

In Damon v. Damon, decided the same term as Barker v. Dayton, it was held that a third party might be joined with the husband in an action for divorce, where the third party had accepted a conveyance of the husband's property in an attempt to defraud the wife. The court says: "It is urged that the power of the court in these divorce cases is limited; that it cannot exercise full equity powers, but only such as are conferred by the statute; and, inasmuch as the statute does not expressly provide that third parties may be made defendants in divorce suits, that therefore no person can be made a defendant in those actions other than a party to the marriage contract. We do not so understand the statute. We think that when the court is empowered to award alimony to the wife out of the husband's estate; to adjudge to her property, or the value of it, that came to her husband by reason of their marriage; to sequester his personal estate, and the rents and profits of his real estate, to enforce compliance with its judgment; and to divide and distribute the whole estate between the parties,—that the power to bring before it as a party defendant in the same action any person who is attempting fraudulently to keep the estate, over which the court has such absolute control, away from the jurisdiction of the court and out of the reach of its judgment, must necessarily follow." Damon v. Damon, 28 Wis. 510.

See Griffin v. Griffin, 47 N. Y. 134; Perry v. Perry, 2 Paige, 501.

Under the power conferred upon the circuit court to enforce its judgments, as in other cases, it was held in Barker v. Dayton, supra, that the plaintiff could maintain a supplementary proceeding, it being a proceeding in the same action, although a substitute for a creditors' bill under the old practice.

While recognizing the difficulties, in that it was impossible to name a specific sum as being due, and the right to alimony being uncertain, Chancellor Kent allowed the writ in a divorce action where the defendant husband threatened to remove his property from the jurisdiction of the court. Denton v. Denton, 1 Johns. Ch. 364, second appeal, 441. See also Yule v. Yule, 10 N. J. Eq. 138; Prather v. Prather, 4 S. C. Eq. (4 Desauss.) 33, 118 Am. St. Rep. 993, note. We think the authority is conferred upon the circuit court by § 2348 to do all acts and things necessary and proper in such actions, and issue such writs as may be issued in respect to other actions for the purpose of making its orders and judgments effective, and that the court had jurisdiction, therefore, to allow the writ in this case.

—power of court to grant in divorce proceeding.

The reasoning of the court in Damon v. Damon applies fully to the facts in this case. If it were held that the court had no jurisdiction to issue the writ under the facts in this case, its judgment, when rendered, excepting so far as it affected the status of the parties, would be ineffective, and the plaintiff without remedy.

Motion to quash granted, and petitioner is remanded to the custody of the sheriff of Milwaukee county. Petitioner to pay the clerk's fees.

ANNOTATION.

Power to issue writ of ne exeat to prevent decree for alimony from becoming ineffective.

I. Introductory, 327.

II. View that writ will issue before alimony decreed, 327.

I. Introductory.

Ne exeat is a writ in common use in equity, and issues to restrain a person from going beyond the confines of the country, or more especially from going beyond the limits of the jurisdiction of the court, until he has satisfied the plaintiff's claim or has given bond for the satisfaction of the decree of the court. In many of the American commonwealths the writ of ne exeat, seeming to be repugnant to American institutions, has been abolished by statute, either expressly or by implication, though in a few jurisdictions it is still in force and recognized by statutory enactment. 19 R. C. L. 1340, 1342. While it may be stated as a general rule that the writ of ne exeat will not be granted except in cases of equitable debts or claims (2 Story, Eq. Jur. 801), it is a well-recognized exception to the rule that the writ will issue to prevent a decree for alimony from becoming ineffective. See the cases cited infra throughout the note.

II. View that writ will issue before alimony decreed.

In a number of American jurisdictions the rule seems to be that where the facts warrant it, a writ of ne exeat will issue from a court of equity in a matrimonial action, even before a decree fixing the amount of alimony to be paid has been rendered.

In Yule v. Yule (1854) 10 N. J. Eq. 138, a bill filed for alimony only, a writ of ne exeat was prayed. The court followed the rule laid down in Denton v. Denton (1815) 1 Johns. Ch. (N. Y.) 364, and held that the writ was properly issued before a decree of alimony was entered, but it was also held that the affidavit should show that the defendant contended going abroad and that it must be positive as to this point, or as to his threats or declarations to that effect, or as to facts evincing it, or circumstances amounting to it.

In Bronk v. State (1901) 43 Fla. 461, 99 Am. St. Rep. 119, 31 So. 248, it appeared that the petitioner was held in custody under a writ of ne exeat issued in an action for divorce, wherein no decree for alimony had been awarded. A writ of habeas corpus was sought on the ground that the writ was in excess of the jurisdiction of the court and void. It was held that the writ was properly issued, the court saying: "The power in our courts of equity to issue ne exeat in proper cases is expressly recognized by statute, and the matter of issuing such writs is to some extent regulated by §§ 1473-1476, Revised Statutes. By § 1473 it is provided that no writ of ne exeat shall be granted until a bill sworn or supported by affidavit is filed praying such writ, except in certain cases not necessary to mention. It is further provided by that section that the writ may issue in any case where the issue shall seem to the chancellor just. We are of opinion that under our system the writ ne exeat may now be issued by our equity courts in suits for maintenance, before a decree fixing an amount to be paid is rendered, in all cases where it seems to the chancellor just to issue it and a necessity therefor exists."

In Prather v. Prather (1809) 4 S. C. Eq. (4 Desauss.) 33, pending a suit for separate maintenance, a writ of ne exeat was issued to prevent the defendant husband from leaving the state. On appeal the chancellor refused to discharge the writ under the circumstances of the case, saying: "Upon the whole, I think the weight of authority is against the writ in such cases; and if the application were now making to me de novo for the writ, I have doubts if I should feel myself authorized to grant it. But the order has been made by proper authority, and the application is to rescind it; which application is made by a man who admits by his demurrer that he has used his wife cruelly without cause, and turned her out of doors without provision, and has taken home to his house a worthless woman, who usurps the place of the legitimate wife, and abuses her children; and that he threatens the life of his wife, and is about to remove himself and property into foreign parts. Under these circumstances I will not sanction the defendant's evasion of justice, by rescinding the order for the ne exeat."

In McGee v. McGee (1850) 8 Ga. 295, 52 Am. Dec. 407, the plaintiff, pending a suit for a divorce, filed a bill alleging that the defendant had threatened to leave the jurisdiction, and praying that a writ of ne exeat be issued. It appeared that in 1813 a statute was enacted reciting in the preamble that "great evils have existed, and do yet exist, in this state, in consequence of the law of England, regulating writs of ne exeat, not having provided for cases where the demand set forth by the complainant is not due," and providing that "the judges of the superior courts shall be, and they are thereby authorized, to grant writs of ne exeat, as well in cases where the debt or demand is not due, but exists fairly and bona fide in expectancy, at the time of making application, as in cases where the demand is due." It was held that the writ was properly issued on the affidavit of the plaintiff in the case at bar, the court saying: "The bill charges that the defendant has property in possession of the value of $4,000, and that there are no children; and the complainant not only makes a case in her bill which shows that she is entitled to suitable provision for her maintenance, but her affidavit states expressly that she considers herself entitled to adequate support out of her husband's property. Here, then, in contemplation of the Statute of 1813, is 'a bona fide demand, existing in expectancy,' and comes both within the spirit and letter of the act. We feel the less hesitancy in coming to this conclusion, not only because it is essential to the ends of justice, but it is warranted by the universal practice which has obtained throughout the state, under this act." In Lamar v. Lamar (1905) 123 Ga. 827, 107 Am. St. Rep. 169, 51 S. E. 763, 3 Ann. Cas. 294, it was held that the omission to incorporate the provisions of the Statute of 1813 into a subsequent codification of the Georgia statutes did not have the effect of restoring the English rule that the claim must be reduced to judgment before the writ can issue. See also Crapps v. Crapps (1918) 148 Ga. 510, 97 S. E. 680.

Where, however, the court has no jurisdiction over the subject-matter of the suit in which the claim for separate maintenance or alimony is made, or to render a personal judgment against the defendant on such claim, a writ of ne exeat issued for the protection of the demand is without warrant of law, and will be discharged on application being made for such relief. Anshutz v. Anshutz (1863) 16 N. J. Eq. 162; Elmendorf v. Elmendorf (1899) 58 N. J. Eq. 113; Dithmar v. Dithmar (1905) 68 N. J. Eq. 533, 59 Atl. 644; see also Bylandt v. Bylandt (1846) 6 N. J. Eq. 28; Kirrigan v. Kirrigan (1862) 15 N. J. Eq. 147.

Thus, in Dithmar v. Dithmar (1905) 68 N. J. Eq. 533, 59 Atl. 644, supra, where it appeared that both of the parties were nonresidents, it was held that a writ of ne exeat was improperly granted, as the court did not have jurisdiction of the subject-matter and there was no equitable demand on which the writ could be based.

So, in Elmendorf v. Elmendorf (1899) 58 N. J. Eq. 113, supra, it appeared that the plaintiff had obtained a divorce from the defendant in New Jersey, but the defendant was not served personally within the state or did not appear. An award of alimony was made and a proceeding was brought to obtain a writ of ne exeat. The court held that the defendant, not having been served within the state, and not appearing, the decree for alimony fixed personal liability without due process of law, and was therefore void under the Federal Constitution, and that, as the decree for alimony was void, the court had no power to issue the writ of ne exeat.

In Anshutz v. Anshutz (1863) 16 N. J. Eq. 162, wherein a bill was filed by a wife against her husband for alimony, for the support and maintenance of herself and her children, a writ of ne exeat was issued against her husband. It appeared that the statute conferred original jurisdiction on the court in matters of alimony only where the husband, without any justifiable cause, abandoned his wife and neglected to maintain and provide for her. The court held that the writ was not properly issued, saying: "It is urged that although no abandonment or separation has actually taken place, yet where the facts and circumstances show that there is a well-grounded apprehension that the husband is about to abandon his wife, to dispose of his property, and to remove beyond the jurisdiction of the state, the court will interfere to prevent it. The bill is manifestly framed with a view to relief in this form, and it was mainly upon this ground that the writs of ne exeat and injunction were issued. But, upon reflection, I do not perceive upon what principle this exercise of the power of the court can be sustained. The court has no power to compel the parties to live together or to restrain a separation. The wife has no right to the interference of the court for her maintenance until the abandonment or separation has taken place. The writs were not issued to protect any subsisting right or interest of the wife, but on the mere ground of apprehension on the part of the wife that a right might thereafter be created which would entitle her to protection."

In Bylandt v. Bylandt (1846) 6 N. J. Eq. 28, the plaintiff in a suit for divorce alleged in her petition that her husband intended to leave the state and prayed that a writ of ne exeat be issued. Annexed to the petition was an affidavit by one Romein, showing the intention of the husband to leave the state. The court, in holding that the writ could not be granted, said: "It would be irregular to grant the ne exeat under these circumstances. There was no cause or proceeding in court respecting the subject of the affidavit made by Romein when it was made. . . . The proper course is to file the bill or petition for divorce, and after that to file a petition for the ne exeat, supported by the necessary affidavit, sworn subsequently to the filing of the bill."

In Kirrigan v. Kirrigan (1862) 15 N. J. Eq. 146, an action for a divorce, the chancellor found that the proceedings had not been instituted by the complainant in good faith, but for the mere purpose of recovering money from the defendant or of compelling him to support her, and that the parties had already been divorced by the decree of a judicial tribunal, obtained by the husband in Indiana. It was held that a writ of ne exeat previously sued out should be quashed.

It seems that the affidavit for the writ must state the facts on which is based the belief of the affiant that the defendant is about to depart from the jurisdiction, in order that the court may judge of their sufficiency.

Thus in Robinson v. Robinson (1898) 21 R. I. 81, 41 Atl. 1009, an action by a wife for a divorce, a verified application for a writ of ne exeat was filed, which alleged that the petitioner had good reason to believe that the respondent was about to depart from the state, and would depart from the state before the time for hearing, for the purpose of avoiding any order that the court might make in the premises. It did not state the facts on which the belief of the petitioner was based. Holding the application to be insufficient, the court said: "The practice which has prevailed in this state as to the issuing of writs of ne exeat has not been uniform, and has sometimes been too lax. In some cases the affidavits which have been filed have been wanting in certainty and fullness, and in others writs have been issued even without any affidavit at all. For the purpose of establishing a more correct practice, the writ will not hereafter be granted except upon affidavit verifying the charges contained in the main petition, and containing allegations of facts or circumstances satisfactorily evincing an intention of the respondent to depart from the state to avoid performance of the decree of the court on hearing, or of his threat or declaration of such intention." See to the same effect Yule v. Yule (1854) 10 N. J. Eq. 138.

Where the defendant gives bond to escape imprisonment under the writ, conditioned that he will not go out of the state without leave of the court, no time being fixed after which, without lawful discharge, he is at liberty to depart, his departure without such discharge and without leave of the court, whether before or after a decree for alimony, is a breach of the condition. Marselis v. People (1902) 18 Colo. App. 258, 71 Pac. 429.

III. View that writ will not issue before alimony decreed.

In a few American jurisdictions and in England, the rule is that the writ will not issue until the right to alimony has been established, and the amount fixed by judicial decree. Bayly v. Bayly (1847) 2 Md. Ch. 326; Drolet v. Drolet (1884) How. N. P. (Mich.)

In Bayly v. Bayly (1847) 2 Md. Ch. 326, the plaintiff in an action for separation and for alimony prayed a writ of ne exeat. The writ was granted and on a motion to discharge the writ the court said: "In the case now under consideration, no decree for alimony has been passed, and, indeed, the title to any such decree is strongly contested by the answer in averments and statements responsive to the allegations of the bill. There is moreover, a wide difference between the statements in the bill and answer with reference to the value of the defendant's estate, the bill alleging him to be worth $15,000, whilst in his answer, he says he is not worth $500.

. . . This is a case, then, in which the writ issued upon the ex parte application of the wife, verified alone by her affidavit, before a decree had passed establishing her right to alimony, and in which her right is disputed by strong statements in the answer imputing gross misconduct to her. The allegation of an intention to remove from the state is positively denied by the defendant, and the question now is whether, according to the case as presented by bill and answer, the writ shall, or shall not, be discharged. . . . In this case the chancellor considers it proper, in view of the positive denial in the answer of the intention to leave the state imputed to the defendant by the bill, and of the other defenses taken in the answer, to grant the motion, and will pass an order accordingly."

In Bailey v. Cadwell (1883) 51 Mich. 217, 16 N. W. 381, it was held that the courts of equity in Michigan had only "the powers and jurisdictions of the court of chancery in England, with the exceptions, additions, and limitations created and imposed by the Constitution and laws" of the state; that no additions to their jurisdiction to issue writs of ne exeat had been thus declared; and that therefore there was no power to issue the writ before the rendition of a decree for alimony, since in the English courts the jurisdiction had been limited to cases where the default of the defendant was capable of direct measurement, and clearly made out, and where no other remedy was attainable. So, in Drolet v. Drolet (1884) How. N. P. (Mich.) 14, the court said: "In general the writ will not be granted unless in case of equitable debts and claims. The debt must exist at the time, or be so far matured that present payment can rightfully be demanded. . . . The English courts hold that the writ will not be allowed in cases of permanent alimony decreed except for arrears due and unpaid. . . . And it seems the writ will not be granted in cases of temporary alimony. . . . I am therefore of the opinion that a writ of ne exeat is not authorized in this state in cases of temporary alimony."

In England, the law governing the issuance of a writ of ne exeat in alimony cases was settled at an early date. The chancery courts granted the writ where the facts warranted it, in favor of a wife who had obtained a sentence for alimony against her husband in the ecclesiastical court. Read v. Read (1668) 1 Ch. Cas. 115, 22 Eng. Reprint, 720, 2 Rep. in Ch. 19, 21 Eng. Reprint, 604; Ex parte Whit- Oldham* (1802) 7 Ves. Jr. 410, 32 Eng. Reprint, 166. The ecclesiastical court could not compel the husband to find bail. #### IV. Particular jurisdictions.

In Connecticut there seems to be only one case, and that an early one, involving an application for the writ of ne exeat in support of a demand for alimony. The application was not made until after the decree had been rendered, and was granted by the court. Lyon v. Lyon (1851) 21 Conn. 199, note a.

In New York, though the writ of ne exeat is now abolished by statute (Code Civ. Proc. § 548), an order for arrest of the defendant in a suit for separation or divorce is authorized under circumstances which would have formerly warranted the issuance of the writ, by § 550 of the Code, which provides that "a defendant may also be arrested in an action wherein the judgment demanded requires the performance of an act the neglect or refusal to perform which would be punishable by the court as a contempt, where the defendant is not a resident of the state, or, being a resident, is about to depart therefrom, by reason of which nonresidence or departure there is danger that a judgment or an order requiring the performance of the act will be rendered ineffectual." See Boucicault v. Boucicault (1880) 21 Hun (N. Y.) 431, 59 How. Pr. 131; Gardiner v. Gardiner (1877) 3 Abb. N. C. (N. Y.) 1; Taber v. Taber (1891) 28 Jones & S. 65, 21 N. Y. Civ. Proc. Rep. 340. See also Collins v. Collins (1880) 80 N. Y. 24.

Before the enactment of the statute abolishing the writ, Chancellor Kent had held in the leading case of Denton v. Denton (1815) 1 Johns. Ch. (N. Y.) 364, that the writ might be granted prior to the rendition of a decree for alimony, saying: "The great difficulty in these applications, when a suit is pending for alimony, is, that the right to alimony, and the amount of it, is uncertain; and there is no certain sum for which to mark the writ. This court has always expressed an inclination to interfere in favor of the wife, if that difficulty could be surmounted.

It does not appear to me that the difficulty of fixing on a sum is absolutely insurmountable. Courts of law always surmount it, when the writ is marked for bail in actions founded on torts. The amount of alimony will have a material reference to the rank of the parties, and the property of the husband. The case will always be governed by a sound discretion, arising out of its special circumstances; and the court will take care that the writ be not used for oppression or extortion. Under this limitation, the process in cases like this, when the intended departure of the husband is clearly made out, appears to me to be essential to justice." The rule laid down in Denton v. Denton was followed in several other New York decisions. Thus, in Forrest v. Forrest (1850) 10 Barb. (N. Y.) 50, 2 Edm. Sel. Cas. 171, an action for a separation, the plaintiff secured in the lower court a writ of ne exeat to prevent her husband from leaving the state. The appellate court, while concurring in the rule that the writ might be issued before a decree for alimony was granted, held that the facts proven did not sufficiently show that the defendant intended to leave the jurisdiction and that the writ of ne exeat should be discharged. In Bushnell v. Bushnell (1852) 7 How. Pr. (N. Y.) 389, an action for a separation, the plaintiff obtained a writ of ne exeat to prevent the defendant from leaving the state. It was contended that the court did not have the power to issue the writ, as the Code enacted in 1831 provided that "no person shall be arrested in a civil action except as prescribed by this act; but the provision shall not affect the act to abolish imprisonment for debt, and to punish fraudulent debtors, passed April 26th, 1831, or any act amending the same, nor shall it apply to proceedings for contempt." The court, after considering the various sections relating to arrest, said: "In view, therefore, of the fact that the Code has not expressly abolished the writ, nor given anything as a substitute therefor, and deeming the power of awarding such process essential to the exercise of the legitimate powers of a court of equity, and not to be taken away by implication, I am constrained to hold that this court still possesses the authority to retain a suitor by ne exeat." In Hammond v. Hammond (1839) Clarke, Ch.

(N. Y.) 151, it appeared that the plaintiff, on filing a bill for a separation, secured a writ of ne exeat. The defendant moved to dissolve the writ, alleging that he had no intention of leaving the state. It was held that the writ should not be dissolved, as, if the defendant's contentions were true, the writ would not annoy him, and if the writ was dissolved and the defendant should leave the state, the plaintiff would be remediless. In Kirby v. Kirby (1828) 1 Paige (N. Y.) 261, it was held that, in denying a motion to discharge the writ, if it appeared that the writ required bail in too large a sum, the amount would be reduced.

In Washington, in Holcomb v. Holcomb (1908) 49 Wash. 498, 95 Pac. 1091, pending an appeal from a judgment granting the plaintiff a divorce, an application was made to the appellate court for an allowance of alimony pendente lite and for a writ of ne exeat to restrain the defendant from leaving the state without the order of the court. The appellate court decreed that part of the application asking for a writ of ne exeat, saying: "We do not think there is any sufficient showing that the appellant is about, or threatening, to leave the jurisdiction of the court; and in view of the fact that a considerable portion of the property is real estate, which it would be difficult for him to pass title to without the consent of respondent, and having in mind also the stay bond, we do not think that an order or writ of this kind is justified."

In Wisconsin it is held in the reported case (EX PARTE GRBIC, ante, 325) that the court has jurisdiction, under its general statutory powers in divorce cases, to issue a writ of ne exeat, so that its judgment, when rendered, may not be ineffective. The decision, in referring to the rendition of judgment, apparently means a final judgment for alimony, since at the time the writ of ne exeat was issued in that case an order for temporary alimony had actually been made.

JOHN H. BRAND.

(— Del. —, 108 Atl. 277.)

Damages — for wrongful discharge from employment.

1. The measure of damages recoverable by a wrongfully discharged employee is the stipulated salary for such period as he may be entitled to recover damages, less any amount he actually received or might have received by due and reasonable diligence during such period after discharge.

Action — for breach of contract of hiring — single or successive.

2. But one action can be maintained for the wrongful discharge of one employed under seal to render services for a term of years, although provision is made in the contract for termination of the contract only upon the giving of notice for a specified time.

— form — debt — breach of contract for services.

3. An action for debt will not lie to recover damages for wrongful breach of a contract under seal to employ plaintiff's services for a specified term.

ERROR to the Superior Court for New Castle County (Conrad and Heisel, JJ.) to review judgments in favor of plaintiff in actions of debt, brought to recover damages for wrongful breach of a contract under seal to employ his services for a specified term. Reversed.

Statement by Rice, J.:

Actions of debt by John H. Brand against the Ogden-Howard Company, an incorporation, before a justice of the peace. Judgments for the plaintiff. Defendant brings appeals to the superior court (Judges Conrad and Heisel sitting.) Verdicts and judgments for plaintiff. Defendant brings error.

John H. Brand, the plaintiff below and defendant in error, was employed by the Ogden-Howard Company, the defendant below and plaintiff in error, as buyer and manager, under the terms of a written contract under seal, for the period from February 1, 1914, to January 1, 1919, at a salary of $100 a week. The contract provided that the employment might be terminated at any time by either party to the contract giving to the other six months' notice in writing of such intention to terminate, and after the expiration of the six months' notice the agreement should terminate and be void. The contract provided that Brand should devote the whole of his time, attention, and energy to the performance of his duties under the contract during the time of the agreement. On February 27, 1918, the Ogden-Howard Company discharged Brand from its employ as buyer and manager without giving him prior notice in writing, and thereafter Brand performed no services for the company, although ready and willing to do so until April 1st following.

Brand brought the five suits now before this court on a writ of error, together with several other suits, before a justice of the peace against the Ogden-Howard Company for salary subsequent to the date of his discharge and prior to the expiration of the term of notice, each suit being for the sum of $100 salary claimed under the contract for the week mentioned in the particular suit. The judgments before the justice of the peace in favor of Brand were appealed to the superior court, and by the consent of both parties the five suits now in this court and two others were tried together. Judgments were entered in the superior court in favor of Brand for $100 each in the five suits. By a stipulation filed in the supreme court, counsel agreed that the record and briefs filed in the first of the cases on the docket of the supreme court should be considered as having been filed in the remaining four cases on the docket. In the superior court the plaintiff filed a pro narr. in debt. At the trial the defendant introduced evidence to show that Brand did not devote the whole of his time and energy to the performance of his duties as buyer and manager, refused to obey the company's orders, and in other ways neglected and failed to perform his duties.

There are four assignments of error. We will consider only the first, which is as follows:

That the court erred in declining to give binding instructions to the jury to return a verdict for the defendant, on the grounds as prayed for by the defendant below, namely, that the only damages recoverable by a wrongfully discharged employee for the unexpired period of the contract are unliquidated, and not recoverable in an action of debt on contract under seal.

Mr. Charles F. Curley, for plaintiff in error:

An action of debt on a contract under seal will lie only where the sum to be recovered is certain, or capable of being reduced to a certainty by calculation, and will not lie where the quantum of damages is uncertain and in the jury's discretion.

1 Labatt, M. & S. p. 1087; 26 Cyc. 987; Hitchens v. School Dist. 5 Penn. (Del.) 325, 62 Atl. 897.

Rice, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The question presented by the first assignment of error is whether, under a contract of hiring, such as the one before us, an action of debt will lie, where an employee has been wrongfully dismissed during the term of employment, for the recovery of damages for wages after dismissal, nothing being due for wages actually earned.

The plaintiff in error contends that the damages recoverable are not for a sum certain, or capable of being reduced to a certainty by calculation, and therefore an action of debt will not lie.

The defendant in error claims that under the terms of the contract there were two distinct periods of time involved; to wit, the first six months after his discharge without notice as provided in the contract, during which time he was entitled to the sum of $100 per week, as liquidated damages, and second, the period between the expiration of said six months and the end of the term provided in the contract, during which time the damages were unliquidated. The defendant in error contends that the damages were liquidated and the action of debt was the proper action to bring in each of the five cases now before this court, for the reason that they were brought to recover weekly wages due within the period provided in the contract for notice of its termination, and in support of this contention cites Shea v. Kerr, 1 Penn. (Del.) 530, 43 Atl. 843; Love v. Pusey & J. Co. 3 Penn. (Del.) 577, 52 Atl. 542.

The principle of law for which the defendant in error contends is generally known as the "constructive service" doctrine, and he claims that the doctrine has been recognized in this state in Shea v. Kerr. This doctrine has been recognized in some jurisdictions with approval, but by the great weight of authority in this country it has not been approved.

In the case of Shea v. Kerr, supra, the court stated the measure of damages to be "the amount the defendant agreed to pay her as salary for the two weeks," covering the period of notice in the agreement; yet in considering the Shea Case the fact must be taken into consideration that there was no evidence introduced at the trial to show that the plaintiff earned, or by reasonable diligence could have earned, anything during that time. In fact, there was no evidence introduced for the defense, therefore the charge of the court on the law was in conformity with the facts of the case, and we think that this case does not support the contention of the defendant in error.

In the case of Love v. Pusey & J. Co. supra, it was held that an action of debt may be maintained in this state against a stockholder in a Kansas corporation to enforce the individual liability of such stockholder under the constitutional and statutory provisions of the state of Kansas, to an amount equal to the par value of defendant's stock, on account of the unpaid balance of plaintiff's judgment obtained in Kansas against the corporation. We do not consider this case an authority in support of Brand's contention in the case now before us, as the cases are not analogous in any respect.

Other cases in this state, brought by an employee against an employer, to recover damages for wrongful dismissal under a contract of hiring, are: Spahn v. Willman, 1 Penn. (Del.) 125, 39 Atl. 787; Hitchens v. School Dist. 5 Penn. (Del.) 325, 62 Atl. 897; Carroll v. Cohen, 5 Boyce (Del.) 235, 91 Atl. 1001.

In the case of Spahn v. Willman, the defendant at the trial offered evidence to show that the plaintiff had refused work of a similar character offered by a third person during the term of the alleged contract after plaintiff's dismissal. Objection was made to the testimony on the ground that plaintiff, if he had been wrongfully discharged during the term of the contract, was not obliged to look for other work, but could wait until the end of the period covered by the contract and then sue for his wages. The court overruled the objection and admitted the evidence, stating that such evidence went to the measure of damages. In the charge to the jury the court stated the measure of damages to be such amount as the plaintiff would have been entitled to under the terms of the contract, less any amount he may have earned in the time which he would have given to his work if he had continued in the defendant's employ.

In Hitchens v. School Dist. the defense was that the employee had broken the contract, and the employer, therefore, was justified in dismissing the plaintiff. There was no evidence introduced at the trial to show that the plaintiff earned or reasonably might have earned anything during the term of the contract. The court stated the measure of damages to be what the plaintiff would have earned under the contract, and said nothing relative to what he might have earned elsewhere, as there was no evidence on this point.

In the case of Carroll v. Cohen, the court stated the plaintiff's measure of damages to be "the amount of his wages, as contracted for, for the unexpired portion of the term of employment, less the amount he has earned or might, by reasonable effort, have earned in other employment during such unexpired term." It does not appear in the report of the case that the employee earned anything elsewhere, yet from the language employed by the court in stating the measure of damages it is reasonable to assume that such evidence was introduced at the trial.

We think it may reasonably be said that whatever difference there appears to be as to the measure of damages in the Delaware cases is due to the nature of the evidence introduced, or to the lack of evidence at the trial.

The contract now before the court is one of hiring, under seal, under the terms of which the plaintiff was employed and entered the service of the defendant company as buyer and manager of their business. The employment was for a definite period, from the 1st day of February, 1914, to the 1st day of January, 1919, with the right reserved by either party to terminate the agreement upon six months' written notice. There was but one contract between the parties, and the discharge of Brand was a single act constituting but one breach, and damages for such a breach can be recovered in but one action. That the right was reserved to either party to terminate the contract upon notice would not be a sufficient reason for holding that there was a dismissal at the beginning of the period of notice and another dismissal at the end of that period, thereby constituting two distinct and separate breaches of the contract.

In the few states which recognize the "constructive service" doctrine, an employee who has been wrongfully discharged under a contract of employment for a definite term, and who is ready to perform his part of the contract, may possibly recover in damages the exact amount of his wages as stipulated in the agreement, for such time as he holds himself ready and willing to perform his duties under the contract. In these states an action of debt may be the proper action in such cases, because the damages would be for a sum certain.

From our observation with respect to the Delaware cases it will be seen that the "constructive service" doctrine has never been recognized in this state, neither is it approved by the overwhelming weight of authority in this country. In this state and the other jurisdictions where the constructive service doctrine is not recognized, the discharged employee can recover damages only for the breach of the contract, and the measure of damages is uniformly held to be the stipulated salary for such period as he may be entitled to recover damages, less any amount he actually earned or might, by due and reasonable diligence, have earned during such period after discharge. The measure of damages in this state being as stated, the conclusion must be reached that the damages recoverable in such an action are not for a sum certain, or capable of being reduced to a certainty by calculation, such as would admit of the action of debt as a proper or maintainable one.

Damages—for wrongful discharge from employment.

We are therefore of the opinion that the court below was in error in declining to give binding instructions to the jury to return a verdict

Action—form—debt—breach of contract for services.

for the defendant, on the ground that the damages recoverable by a wrongfully discharged employee for the unexpired period of the contract are unliquidated, and not recoverable in an action of debt.

Finding error in the proceedings below, as specified by the first assignment of error, the court directs that the judgments below be reversed and the cases remanded to the court below for further proceedings.

Wrongful discharge of servant—doctrine of "constructive service."

I. Scope and introduction.

The purpose of the present annotation is to treat merely the theory, origin, and development of the doctrine of constructive service as applied to a wrongfully discharged servant, and to determine the present status of that doctrine in the various jurisdictions which have either adopted or rejected it, without going into the more specific questions with respect to its effect upon the form of action, the measure of damages, etc.

Generally speaking, it may be said that the result of a somewhat extended investigation shows that the doctrine of "constructive service" arose in England; that it is now the law in Alabama, Arkansas, Georgia, Massachusetts, Michigan, Mississippi, Montana, Pennsylvania, and South Carolina; that decisions in Colorado and Iowa contain dicta favorable to its application, and that Rhode Island and Wyoming have decisions which possibly might be regarded as favorable; and that the doctrine has been definitely repudiated in the land of its origin, as well as in Alaska, Arizona, California (one qualification), Delaware, Illinois, Indiana, Maryland, Minnesota, Missouri, New Jersey, New York, North Carolina, Ohio, Oklahoma, Oregon, Tennessee, Texas, Vermont, Virginia, and West Virginia, while decisions in Kentucky, Washington, and Wisconsin are seemingly adverse. It is also of interest that, like England, a number of other jurisdictions which now repudiate the doctrine at one time accepted it.

II. Origin and theory of doctrine.

A decision by Lord Ellenborough in the case of Gandall v. Pontigny (1816) 4 Campb. (Eng.) 375, 1 Starkie, 198, is generally credited with the creation of the doctrine of "constructive service." In this case it was held that a servant who was wrongfully discharged before the end of his term could recover the wages for the full term under a count in indebitatus assumpsit for work and labor, the theory of the decision being that, having served a part of the term, and being willing to serve the balance thereof, the servant, in contemplation of law, could be regarded as having served the whole term.

Thus arose in England the so-called "doctrine of constructive service," the essential feature of which is recovery of wages on the ground of readiness and willingness to perform, the theory of the doctrine being that where one is ready and willing to perform his contract, and so holds himself, but is wrongfully prevented from doing so, he should be regarded in law as having actually performed it. To illustrate, it has been said (James v. Allen County (1886) 44 Ohio St. 226, 58 Am. St. Rep. 821, 6 N. E. 246) that the theory of the doctrine of constructive service is that, inasmuch as the employee holds himself ready to do the work, therefore he has done the work; that readiness is, for all purposes, equivalent to performance. And in the Arkansas case of Gardenhire v. Smith (1882) 39 Ark. 280, it was said that readiness to perform and tender of performance are equivalent to performance. And in Cox v. Bearden (1889) 84 Ga. 304, 20 Am. St. Rep. 359, 10 S. E. 627, Bleckley, Ch. J., discussed the recognition and adherence by the Georgia courts to the doctrine of "constructive service" as follows: "The state of our law on the subject seems to be this: that where a servant is wrongfully discharged after rendering a portion of the services contracted for, he can, by waiting until the expiration of the term, bring his action for wages as though he had actually performed his contract. . . . The doctrine of constructive service recognized by Lord Ellenborough in Gandall v. Pontigny (Eng.) supra, still prevails in Georgia." So, in Allen v. Colliery Engineers' Co. (1900) 196 Pa. 512, 46 A. 899, Fell, J., in delivering the opinion of the court, said that "the generally recognized rule is that an employee for a fixed period who has been wrongfully discharged may either treat the contract as existing, and sue for his salary as it becomes due, not on a quantum meruit, but by virtue of the special contract, his readiness to serve being considered as equivalent to actual service, or he may sue for the breach of contract at once, or at the end of the contract period;" but, as is shown infra, and as is commented on by Labatt in his work on Master and Servant, at page 1223, the court was not warranted in referring to this rule as being one which is "generally recognized." It has also been said that the right to recover the full amount of the stipulated wages rests upon the fact that the contract is entire and the services personal. Ramey v. Holcombe (1852) 21 Ala. 567.

It follows from the fact that the doctrine of constructive service is based on the theory that the contract has remained in force and the services contracted for have been constructively performed, that the investigator must keep clearly in mind the essential distinction between such an action founded upon performance and an action for damages caused by a wrongful dismissal, based on the breach of contract; or, as it might be stated, actions for wages as damages and actions for wages as wages. This, of course, is essential to a proper classification of the cases, and is often difficult of determination, especially in cases where the measure of damages is the same under both rules and the courts have not exercised precision in the language used. A case illustrative of this distinction is Trustees v. Shaffer (1872) 63 Ill. 243, where the court rejected the doctrine of constructive service, stated the rule of damages to be that when a servant is hired for a fixed period and is discharged without cause during the term, he may recover for the whole time, deducting any amount obtained for work obtained elsewhere, or which might have been obtained by reasonable effort, and spoke of the nature of the action to be brought as follows: "But the action must be special, and not for work and labor done. The damages result from a breach of the contract, in consequence of the wrongful dismissal. The services have never been performed, and, therefore, indebitatus assumpsit cannot be maintained." And in Olmstead v. Batch (1893) 78 Md. 182, 22 L.R.A. 71, 44 Am. St. Rep. 273, 27 Atl. 501, a much cited case, the court, in rejecting the theory of constructive service and distinguishing between actions for wages as such and actions for wages as damages, said: "But it is insisted the pending suit is not for damages for dismissing the plaintiff, but that it is an action on the contract to recover the plaintiff's salary for the five weeks following the one for which a recovery had been had before the justice of the peace. And the right to recover this salary as salary, and not as damages for a breach of the contract, is based upon the plaintiff's readiness and willingness to perform his work, and not upon his actual performance of it. In other words, he seeks to recover instalments of salary for work which he never performed, and to recover them merely because he was willing to perform it, but was prevented from doing so. As thus presented, under a contract that is indivisible, and which covers a hiring for a whole year, at a salary payable in weekly instalments, it is a claim to recover for constructive services. Had the action been indebitatus assumpsit, it is conceded the doctrine of constructive service would be involved; but as the suit is on an express contract prescribing the amount of each instalment of the compensation, it is urged that the defendants are liable for the stipulated price of the services the plaintiff agreed to perform, but never did perform, and that they are liable because the plaintiff was not permitted to perform them, though ready and willing to do so. In both indebitatus assumpsit and in an action on an express contract to recover wages for services which have not been performed, a recovery is sought for the amount that the plaintiff would have been entitled to recover had the services in fact been rendered; and such recovery is sought, not because the services have been rendered, but because the plaintiff was ready and willing to render them and the defendant prevented him. In both instances, therefore, the readiness of the plaintiff to perform and the refusal of the defendant to allow a performance constitute, when unearned wages are sued for, the ground of the actions, though the forms and the allegations of the pleadings are widely different. That which is sought to be recovered in both cases is the same thing, viz., wages as wages, though in the one case it is under the allegation of work and labor done, which allegation is attempted to be supported by the proof of a readiness and willingness to perform; and in the other it is under an allegation of a refusal to allow that work to be done which the plaintiff had agreed to do, and continues ready and willing to do. Salary as salary, definitely fixed and agreed to, and not a sum of money as unliquidated damages for a broken contract of hiring, is what is sued for under the declaration in the case at bar. It is a suit to recover wages though no services have been rendered at all, and, if maintainable in that form, would preclude the defendants from showing by evidence that the plaintiff could have secured other similar employment during the time covered by the contract; because if wages, distinctively as wages, can be recovered under such conditions, instead of damages for a wrongful discharge or dismissal, they must be recovered as specific, ascertained debts, the amount of which is fixed by the contract, and is in no way subject to abatement by circumstances which would reduce the damages in a suit founded on a refusal by the defendant to allow the plaintiff to perform his part of an indivisible contract of hiring. In other words, if, under such a contract, the plaintiff is entitled to recover wages as wages upon a mere offer to perform, he must be entitled to recover just precisely the wages named in the contract, even though he might have obtained other work of the same kind at the same price during the period for which he claims his wages under the contract. This would be recovering for constructive services. That doctrine has been altogether repudiated both in England and in this country." And see Heim v. Wolf (1850) 1 E. D. Smith (N. Y.) 70.

III. Adoption.

In accordance with the theory of Gandall v. Pontigny (1816) 4 Campb. (Eng.) 375, 1 Starkie, 198, as set out supra, II., later English cases for a time adhered to and applied the doctrine of "constructive service." To this effect are the following cases: Beeston v. Collyer (1827) 4 Bing. 309, 130 Eng. Reprint, 786, 12 J. B. Moore, 552, 5 L. J. C. P. 180, 29 Revised Rep. 576; Collins v. Price (1828) 5 Bing. 132, 130 Eng. Reprint, 1011, 2 Moore & P. 233, 6 L. J. C. P. 244, 30 Revised Rep. 542; Aspdin v. Austin (1844) 5 Q. B. 671, 114 Eng. Reprint, 1402, Dav. & M. 515, 8 Jur. 355, 13 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 155. And see Pagani v. Gandolfi (1826) 2 Car. & P. (Eng.) 370, 31 Revised Rep. 671; Buckingham v. Surrey & H. Canal Co. (1882) 46 L. T.

N. S. (Eng.) 885, 46 J. P. 774; and Lindsay v. Queens Hotel Co. (1918) 35 Times L. R. (Eng.) 101, 63 Sol. Jo. 136, [1918] W. N. 352, 146 L. T. Jo. 60 (set out infra, IV. b).

And this doctrine was also adopted by the Canadian case of Rice v. Boscovity (1874) 23 Lower Can. Jur. 141. (This decision seems to have overlooked the English cases which have repudiated the doctrine.) And see McGuffin v. Cayley (1846) 2 U. C. Q. B. 308. But see the later Canadian cases which are set out infra, IV. b.

So the doctrine of "constructive service," as established by the earlier English cases, seems to have been adopted by the Scotch case of Armstrong v. Bainbridge (1847) 5 Sc. Sess. Cas. 2d series, 1198. But see Cameron v. Fletcher (1872) 10 Sc. Sess. Cas. 3d series, 801, as cited infra, IV. b.

And a considerable number of the states of the Union have squarely adopted and seemingly still adhere to the doctrine of constructive service as established by the earlier English decisions. Jurisdictions which the adjudications show to be in this class are as follows:

Alabama. — Beckwith v. Baldwin (1848) 12 Ala. 720; Ramey v. Holcombe (1852) 21 Ala. 567; Fowler v. Armour (1854) 24 Ala. 194; Strauss v. Meertief (1879) 64 Ala. 299, 38 Am. Rep. 8; Holloway v. Talbot (1881) 70 Ala. 389; Wilkinson v. Black (1885) 80 Ala. 329; Liddell v. Chidester (1887) 84 Ala. 508, 5 Am. St. Rep. 387, 4 So. 426; Hartsell v. Masterson (1902) 132 Ala. 275, 31 So. 616; Marx v. Miller (1901) 134 Ala. 347, 32 So. 765.

Georgia. — Rogers v. Parham (1850) 8 Ga. 190; Britt v. Hays (1857) 21 Ga. 157; Tyler Cotton Press Co. v. Chevalier (1876) 56 Ga. 494; Isaacs v. Davies (1881) 68 Ga. 169; Cox v. Bear-den (1889) 84 Ga. 304, 20 Am. St. Rep. 359, 10 S. E. 627; Beck v. Thompson & T. Spice Co. (1899) 108 Ga. 242, 33

S. E. 894; Moore v. Kelly & J. Co. (1900) 111 Ga. 371, 36 S. E. 802.

Michigan. — Hinchman v. Matheson Motor Car Co. (1908) 151 Mich. 214, 115 N. W. 48.

Mississippi. — Armfield v. Nash (1856) 31 Miss. 361; Williams v. Luckett (1899) 77 Miss. 394, 26 So. 967.

Montana. — Isaacs v. McAndrew (1872) 1 Mont. 437, 9 Mor. Min. Rep. 690.

Pennsylvania. — Kirk v. Hartman (1869) 63 Pa. 97, 11 Mor. Min. Rep. 450; Allen v. Colliery Engineers Co. (1900) 196 Pa. 512, 46 Atl. 899; Heyer v. Cunningham Piano Co. (1898) 6 Pa. Super. Ct. 504. And see Donaldson v. Fuller (1817) 3 Serg. & R. 505; Algeo v. Algeo (1823) 10 Serg. & R. 235; Stewart v. Walker (1850) 14 Pa. 293; King v. Steiren (1862) 44 Pa. 99, 84 Am. Dec. 419; Emery v. Steckel (1889) 126 Pa. 171, 12 Am. St. Rep. 857, 17 Atl. 601; and Clay Commercial Teleph. Co. v. Root (1886) 1 Sadler, 485, 17 W. N. C. 200, 4 Atl. 828.

South Carolina. — Sistare v. People's Supply Co. (1910) 87 S. C. 171, 69 S. E. 152. And see Clancey v. Robertson (1818) 9 S. C. L. (2 Mill, Const.) 404; Cox v. Adams (1818) 10 S. C. L. (1 Nott. & M'C.) 284; Byrd v. Boyd (1827) 15 S. C. L. (4 M'Cord) 246, 19 Am. Dec. 740; Rye v. Stubbs (1834) 19 S. C. L. (1 Hill) 384; Saunders v. Anderson (1834) 20 S. C. L. (2 Hill) 486; Watts v. Todd (1840) 26 S. C. L. (1 McMull.) 26; Craig v. Pride (1843) 29 S. C. L. (2 Speers) 121; Bradshaw v. Branan (1851) 39 S. C. L. (5 Rich.) 465; Union Bank v. Heyward (1881) 15 S. C. 296; and Russell v. Arthur (1882) 17 S. C. 477.

And the doctrine of "constructive service" seems to have been accepted in Colorado and Iowa (see Saxonia Min. & Reduction Co. v. Cook (1884) 7 Colo. 569, 4 Pac. 1111, which contains dicta to this effect; and Weeksman v. Powell (1916) 178 Iowa, 991, 160 N. W. 377, wherein the court in its argument clearly recognized the right of a wrongfully discharged servant to bring an "action on the theory of constructive service"), and possibly in Rhode Island and Wyoming (see Frost v. International Rubber Co. (1915) 37 R. L. 406, 92 Atl. 1022, and Dunn v. Hereford (1875) 1 Wyo. 206).

For decisions in other jurisdictions which have adopted the doctrine of constructive service, but which have later been repudiated, see infra, IV. b.

IV. Repudiation.

a. In general.

The doctrine of constructive service upon which theory suit could be lawfully brought at one time in England and even at present in some of the United States seems to have been overturned as the law of England and mainly so in the states of the Union. For express declarations to the effect that such a repudiation has been made, see the following cases:

Alaska. — Chase v. Alaska Fish & Lumber Co. (1903) 2 Alaska, 82.

Indiana. — Ricks v. Yates (1854) 5 Ind. 115.

So it has been said that the fiction of a "constructive service," which was resorted to in some of the earlier cases whereby a servant discharged without cause was allowed to recover wages, has been discarded in the later decisions and has been disapproved by text-writers. Old Dominion Copper Min. & Smelting Co. v. Andrews (1899) 6 Ariz. 205, 56 Pac. 969; Howard v. Daly (1875) 61 N. Y. 362, 19 Am. Rep. 285. And admitting that there has been and is a conflict of authority, it has been maintained that recent authorities tend to a rejection of the doctrine. See East Tennessee, V. & G. R. Co. v. Staub (1881) 7 Lea (Tenn.) 397. And in Jones v. Dunton (1880) 7 Ill. App. 580, in answering the contention that an employee wrongfully discharged during a term of service is entitled to recover his stipulated wages upon the principle of "constructive service," or, in other words, that he can treat the contract as continuing and sustain an action thereon for services not actually performed, upon an averment of readiness to perform, Wilson, J., summed up the law as follows: "Upon a review of the authorities on this subject, our conclusion is that the better rule and sounder reason is, that an employee wrongfully discharged by his employer cannot wait till the expiration of the term for which he was hired, and then sue for his whole wages on the ground of constructive service; that his remedy in such cases is an action to recover such damages as he has sustained by reason of the breach of the contract of hiring; and that he can recover on the contract for wages only for the period during which he actually served. There are many cases in which the tender of performance is deemed equivalent to a performance, such as agreements for the sale and purchase of lands, where the vendor has tendered a conveyance; also, for goods sold where delivery has been tendered. But there is an obvious distinction between such cases, when, as has been said, the thing agreed to be sold has an independent existence, and the corpus not being perishable or changeable, the title has so far passed that the vendor remains but the trustee in respect to it, and cases of master and servant, where the contract is for personal and individual services. Nor is there any hardship or injustice in rejecting the doctrine of constructive service in a suit upon the contract to recover wages. The servant may have his action for damages for the breach of the contract, and recover full compensation for all losses he has sustained by reason of his wrongful discharge; and just compensation should, after all, be the end aimed at in suits for the breach of contracts. It may be that the measure of damages is an action for the breach of a contract of hire for the wrongful discharge of a servant would, prima facie, be the amount of wages agreed upon; but the determination of that question is not necessary to the decision of the present suit."

In fact the "great weight of authority" now is that a suit for constructive services under such conditions as are presented in the cases under consideration cannot be maintained. Chase v. Alaska Fish & Lumber Co. (1903) 2 Alaska, 82. And in Tennessee it has been said that its courts have rejected the doctrine of constructive service and adopted a rule which is in accord with the majority of the courts of other jurisdictions. Menihan Co. v. Hopkins (1913) 129 Tenn. 24, 164 S. W. 775, Ann. Cas. 1916A, 470. So it has been said that the "weight of authority and sound reasoning" is against the theory of constructive service (Peterson v. Drew (1905) 2 Alaska, 560); that the "great majority of the states, as well as the better considered cases," reject the doctrine (Jameson v. Board of Education (1915) 78 W. Va. 612, L.R.A.1916F, 926, 89 S. E. 255); that in England, and generally in the United States, the current of authority rejects the doctrine and supports the more logical conclusion (Jacksonville v. Allen (1887) 25 Ill. App. 54); and that the rejection of the doctrine "harmonizes with the weight of the more modern and better reasoned cases from other states, and accords with what we regard as the better rule" (Jameson v. Board of Education (W. Va.) supra).

It also has been said that while it formerly was held that where the servant treated the contract as continuing in force after the wrongful discharge, he could recover what was denominated constructive wages for the unexpired part of his term, what then might have been denominated constructive wages is now included under the general head of damages resulting from the master's breach of the contract of hiring. It was so declared in Richardson v. Eagle Mach. Works (1881) 78 Ind. 422, 41 Am. Rep. 584, which decision was quoted with seeming approval in Pennsylvania Co. v. Dolan (1892) 6 Ind. App. 109, 51 Am. St. Rep. 289, 32 N. E. 802.

As shown in the next preceding subdivision (IV. a) the later English decisions repudiate the doctrine of constructive service. See Archard v. Horner (1828) 3 Car. & P. (Eng.) 349; Smith v. Hayward (1837) 7 Ad. & El. 544, 112 Eng. Reprint, 575, 2 Nev. & P. 432, W. W. & D. 635, 7 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 3, 2 Jur. 232 (Archard v. Horner (Eng.) supra, said to have been grounded on better reason than Gandall v. Pontigny (1816) 4 Campb. (Eng.) 375, 1 Starkie, 198); Broxham v. Wagstaffe (1841) 5 Jur. (Eng.) 845, following Smith v. Hayward (Eng.) supra; Fewings v. Tisdal (1847) 11 Jur. (Eng.) 977, 5 Dowl. & L. 196, 17 L. J. Exch. N. S. 18, 1 Exch. 295; Goodman v. Pocock (1850) 15 Q. B. 576, 117 Eng. Reprint, 577, 19 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 410, 14 Jur. 1042; Wood v. Moyes (1852) 1 Week. Rep. (Eng.) 166; Emmens v. Elderton (1853) 4 H. L. Cas. 624, 10 Eng. Reprint, 606, 13 C. B. 495, 138 Eng. Reprint, 1292, 18 Jur. 21, affirming (1848) 6 C. B. 160, 186 Eng. Reprint, 1213, 17 L. J. C. P. N. S. 307 (see especially the opinion of Crompton, J.); Barnsley v. Taylor (1867) 37 L. J. Q. B. N. S. (Eng.) 39. And see Beckham v. Drake (1849) 2 H. L. Cas. 579, 9 Eng. Reprint, 1213, 18 Jur. 921; East Anglian R. Co. v. Lythgoe (1851) 10 C. B. 726, 138 Eng. Reprint, 287,

2 Lowndes, M. & P. 221, 20 L. J. C. P. N. S. 87; and Clossman v. Lacoste (1854) 28 Eng. L. & Eq. Rep. 140, 23 L. T. 91. But compare Buckingham v. Surrey & H. Canal Co. (1882) 46 L. T. N. S. (Eng.) 885, 46 J. P. 774; and Lindsay v. Queens Hotel Co. [1918] W. N. 352, 35 Times L. R. (Eng.) 101, 63 Sol. Jo. 136, 146 L. T. Jo. 60, wherein the action seems to have been for "wages," but in which the court seems to have treated the question from the viewpoint of what "damages" the servant was entitled to because of the wrongful dismissal.

And in Canada it has been declared that the constructive-service theory of Lord Ellenborough in Gandall v. Pontigny (1816) 4 Campb. (Eng.) 375, 1 Starkie, 198, is no longer recognized as law. Hayes v. Harshaw (1913) 30 Ont. L. Rep. 157, 18 D. L. R. 619, 5 Ont. Week. N. 571. And see Gregory v. Williams (1916) 44 N. B. 204, 30 D. L. R. 279; and Malherbe v. Orkin (1918) Rap. Jud. Quebec 54 C. S. 274. But see Rice v. Boscovitz (1874) 23 Lower Can. Jur. 141, and McGuffin v. Cayley (1846) 2 U. C. Q. B. 308, which are cited supra, III.

And in Scotland the doctrine of constructive service seems to have been regarded as doubtful in Cameron v. Fletcher (1872) 10 Sc. Sess. Cas. 3d series, 301. But see the earlier Scotch case of Armstrong v. Bainbridge (1847) 5 Sc. Sess. Cas. 2d series, 1198.

And as stated supra, I., the majority of the American states which have passed upon the question have definitely rejected or repudiated the doctrine of "constructive service." The following jurisdictions may be so classed:

Alaska.—Chase v. Alaska Fish & Lumber Co. (1903) 2 Alaska, 82; Peterson v. Drew (1905) 2 Alaska, 560.

Arizona.—Old Dominion Copper Min. & Smelting Co. v. Andrews (1899) 6 Ariz. 205, 56 Pac. 969; Little Butte Consol. Mines Co. v. Girand (1912) 14 Ariz. 9, 123 Pac. 309.

Connecticut.—Viall v. Lionel Mfg. Co. (1916) 90 Conn. 694, 98 Atl. 329.

Delaware.—OGDEN-HOWARD Co. v. BRAND (reported herewith) ante, 334.

Indiana.—Ricks v. Yates (1854) 5 Ind. 115; Richardson v. Eagle Machine Works (1881) 78 Ind. 422, 41 Am. Rep. 584; Hamilton v. Love (1899) 152 Ind. 641, 71 Am. St. Rep. 384, 53 N. And in California the doctrine of constructive service has been repudiated where there was an actual discharge from future employment, as distinguished from wrongfully preventing an employee from performing services under the contract, it having been held that in the former case the action is not upon the contract for agreed compensation, but that in the latter case such an action may be maintained upon the theory that the contract need not be treated as broken. Stone v. Bancroft (1902) 139 Cal. 82, 70 Pac. 1017, affirmed on rehearing in (1903) 139 Cal. 78, 72 Pac. 717. Also of interest is the decision in this case on a former appeal (1896) 112 Cal. 653, 44 Pac. 1069, wherein the court, in connection with the dictum in Webster v. Wade (1861) 19 Cal. 291, 79 Am. Dec. 218, to the effect that the action of a wrongfully discharged servant is on the contract for the stipulated wages, said that "in later years the true rule has been recognized to be that an action in damages for the breach is the proper remedy in such a case," which, of course, is in effect a repudiation of the "constructive service" doctrine.

And the inference to be drawn from the Kentucky decisions (one exception noted infra) which have touched upon the question seems to indicate a rejection of the theory of constructive service. See Chamberlin v. McCallister (1838) 6 Dana (Ky.) 352, wherein it was said that in the opinion of the court the offer to perform and the wrongful refusal to accept should not be deemed equivalent to actual performance. Whitaker v. Sandifer (1864) 1 Duv. (Ky.) 261 (holding that where an employee is wrongfully discharged before the expiration of his term, an allegation of readiness and an offer to continue his services does not authorize recovery of the entire conventional price for the full term, since "readiness to perform and prevention by the employer are not equivalent to full performance, but only entitle the employee to the actual damages he sustained in his disappointment and loss of equally profitable employment"); Wood v. Morgan (1869) 6 Bush (Ky.) 507 (holding that refusal to permit performance of stipulated services for the full term was not equivalent to performance, so as to entitle the discharged employee to recover the conventional price for full performance, but only to entitle him to such damages as he had actually sustained); and William Tarr Co. v. Kimbrough (1896) 17 Ky. L. Rep. 1284, 34 S. W. 528 (holding the same as Whitaker v. Sandifer and Wood v. Morgan (Ky.) supra). But, as indicated above, the doctrine of constructive service seems to have been recognized in Wheatley v. Covington (1874) 11 Bush (Ky.) 13, the court having included the following obiter statement in its opinion: "If one party to a contract offers to perform his agreement, but is prevented by the other, the offer will be treated as performance, or as excusing performance by the party so offering, and he may recover the whole compensation agreed to be given or the damages sustained in consequence of not being allowed to perform his part."

And in Washington the supreme court seems to have inclined to a rejection of the doctrine of constructive service. See Carneau v. North American Transp. & Trading Co. (1907) 45 Wash. 446, 8 L.R.A. (N.S.) 595, 122 Am. St. Rep. 930, 88 Pac. 834, 13 Ann. Cas. 110.

And the more recent decisions in Wisconsin seemingly have rejected the doctrine of constructive service, and have confined the discharged servant to a remedy by action for damages for the breach of the contract of employment. See Kennedy v. South Shore Lumber Co. (1899) 102 Wis. 284, 78 N. W. 567; Ornstein v. Yahr & L. Drug Co. (1903) 119 Wis. 429, 96 N. W. 826; and Green v. Somers (1916) 163 Wis. 96, 157 N. W. 529. However, Gordon v. Brewster (1858) 7 Wis. 355, has sometimes been cited as supporting the doctrine.

In connection with the statement in Viall v. Lionel Mfg. Co. (1916) 90 Conn. 694, 98 Atl. 329, supra, that "the fiction that, upon breach of contract for salary or wages, an action for constructive service would lie, has never been adopted by us, and its recognition would be at variance with the doctrine of Perry v. Simpson Waterproof Mfg. Co. (1871) 37 Conn. 520, and Grant v. New Departure Mfg. Co. (1912) 85 Conn. 421, 83 Atl. 212," it is of interest that Champion v. Hartshorne (1833) 9 Conn. 564, has often been cited as favorable to the doctrine of constructive service.

Likewise the reported case (OGDEN-HOWARD Co. v. BRAND, ante, 334) disposes of the contention which has been made that the earlier Delaware case of Hitchens v. School Dist. (1905) 5 Penn. (Del.) 325, 62 Atl. 897, implies an acceptance of the doctrine, and is in accord with the argument that the court in Greer v. Arlington Mills Mfg. Co. (1899) 1 Penn. (Del.) 581, 43 Atl. 609, rejected the doctrine.

And Doherty v. Schipper & Block (1911) 250 Ill. 128, 34 L.R.A. (N.S.) 557, 95 N. E. 75, Ann. Cas. 1912B, 364, seems to definitely take Illinois out of the doubtful column and dispose of the decisions in Leyenberger v. Rebanks (1894) 55 Ill. App. 441; Trawick v. Peoria & Ft. C. Street R. Co. (1896) 68 Ill. App. 158; and American Glucose Co. v. Lubitz (1897) 71 Ill. App. 638, which clearly adopted the doctrine, as well as the controversy over Chiles v. Belleville Nail Mill Co. (1873) 68 Ill. 123; School Directors v. Reddick (1875) 77 Ill. 628; and Hamlin, H. & Co. v. Race (1875) 78 Ill. 422, all of which sometimes have been regarded as impliedly evidencing an acceptance thereof.

The Tennessee cases of East Tennessee, V. & G. R. Co. v. Staub (1891) 7 Lea (Tenn.) 397, and Menihan Co. v. Hopkins (1913) 129 Tenn. 24, 164

S. W. 775, Ann. Cas. 1916A, 470, cited supra, in effect overrule the earlier Tennessee cases of Jones v. Jones (1853) 2 Swan (Tenn.) 605, and Children of Israel v. Peres (1866) 2 Coldw. (Tenn.) 620, both of which applied the doctrine of constructive service.

The doctrine of constructive service is neither sound in reason nor just in principle. Little Butte Consol. Mines Co. v. Girand (1912) 14 Ariz. 9, 123 Pac. 309; Howard v. Daly (1875) 61 N. Y. 362, 19 Am. Rep. 285 (see case as quoted infra). And in McMullan v. Dickinson Co. (1895) 60 Minn. 156, 27 L.R.A. 409, 51 Am. St. Rep. 511, 62 N. W. 120, the court argued as follows: "The fiction of constructive service is false and illogical, but the measure of damages given under that fiction is correct and logical. It is simply a case of a wrong reason given for a correct rule. Instead of rejecting the false reason and retaining the correct rule, many courts have rejected both the rule and the reason. In our opinion, this rule of damages should be retained; but the true ground on which it is based is not that of constructive service, but the liability of the master to indemnify the discharged servant, not to pay him wages, and this indemnity accrues by instalments. The original breach is not total, but the failure to pay the successive instalments constitutes successive breaches. Since the days of Lord Ellenborough this class of cases has been in some courts an exception to the rule that there can be but one action for damages for the breach of a contract, and there are strong reasons why it should be an exception. Because the discharged servant may, if he so elects, bring successive actions for the instalments of indemnity as they accrue, it does not follow that he cannot elect to consider the breach total, and bring one action for all his damages, and recover all of the same accruing up to the time of trial." For other statements of similar import, see supra, IV. a.

Perhaps the reason most generally assigned for the rejection of the doctrine of constructive service is that it is wholly irreconcilable with the rule of law that a person discharged from service must not remain idle, but must accept employment elsewhere if offered. Little Butte Consol. Mines Co. v. Girand (1912) 14 Ariz. 9, 123 Pac. 309; Doherty v. Schipper & Block (1911) 250 Ill. 128, 34 L.R.A. (N.S.) 557, 95 N. E. 75, Ann. Cas. 1912B, 364; McMullan v. Dickinson Co. (1895) 60 Minn. 156, 27 L.R.A. 409, 51 Am. St. Rep. 511, 62 N. W. 120; Howard v. Daly (1875) 61 N. Y. 362, 19 Am. Rep. 285; Smith v. Cashie & C. R. & Lumber Co. (1906) 142 N. C. 26, 5 L.R.A. (N.S.) 439, 54 S. E. 788; James v. Allen County (1886) 44 Ohio St. 226, 58 Am. St. Rep. 821, 6 N. E. 246. In Howard v. Daly (1875) 61 N. Y. 362, 19 Am. Rep. 285, supra, the court discussed this reason for rejecting the doctrine of constructive service as follows: "This doctrine is, however, so opposed to principle, so clearly hostile to the great mass of the authorities, and so wholly irreconcilable to that great and beneficent rule of law that a person discharged from service must not remain idle, but must accept employment elsewhere if offered, that we cannot accept it. If a person discharged from service may recover wages, or treat the contract as still subsisting, then he must remain idle in order to be always ready to perform the service. How absurd it would be that one rule of law should call upon him to accept other employment, while another rule required him to remain idle in order that he may recover full wages. The doctrine of 'constructive service' is not only at war with principle, but with the rules of political economy, as it encourages idleness and gives compensation to men who fold their arms and decline service, equal to those who perform with willing hands their stipulated amount of labor. Though the master has committed a wrong, the servant is not for one moment released from the rule that he should labor; and no rule can be sound which gives him full wages while living in voluntary idleness. For these reasons, if the plaintiff was discharged after the time of service commenced, she had an immediate cause of action for damages, which were prima facie a sum equal to the stipulated amount, unless the defendant should give evidence in mitigation of damages." And in Doherty v. Schipper & Block (1911) 250 Ill. 128, 34 L.R.A.(N.S.) 557, 95 N. E. 75, Ann. Cas. 1912B, 364, in arguing that it is the duty of a discharged employee to find and accept employment, and that it cannot be said that while he is in the actual employment of one person he is constructively engaged in the employ of the employer who discharged him, the court said: "We think the doctrine of constructive service . . . where used as a basis of recovery is illogical and unsound. This court has universally held that the proper measure of damages in a case like this is the contract price, less what the employee earned or could have earned. That being so, if the discharged employee can find employment, it is his duty to accept it. How can it then be said that while he is performing service for another person he is constructively engaged in the employ of the employer by whom he was discharged? The result of this doctrine would be that the employee was actually performing service for one person while he was constructively performing service for another. The only true basis upon which an action like this can rest is for damages for breach of contract; and as the breach of contract occurs at the time of the discharge, the cause of action is then complete, and such cause of action cannot be split up, but all the damages must be recovered in one judgment and in the first action." And in McMullen v. Dickinson Co. (1895) 60 Minn. 166, 27 L.R.A. 409, 51 Am. St. Rep. 511, 62 N. W. 120, the doctrine of constructive service was said to be unsound and inconsistent with itself, in that it assumed that the discharged servant had, since his discharge, remained ready, willing, and able to perform the services for which he was hired, while sound principles required him to seek employment elsewhere and thereby mitigate the damages caused by discharge. And the doctrine of constructive service, requiring, as it does, that the discharged servant keep himself in readiness at all times to perform the required service, was, in Smith v. Cashie & C. R. & Lumber Co. (1906) 142 N. C. 26, 5 L.R.A.(N.S.) 439, 54 S. E. 788, declared inconsistent with the rule as to the measure of damages which permits the master to show, in diminution of the servant's recovery, that the latter obtained or could have obtained other employment, inasmuch as, to be always strictly ready he must be always idle. The court also said that the two requirements of the law could not reasonably and logically co-exist, and that for this reason the doctrine of constructive service had been repudiated. So, in James v. Allen County (1886) 44 Ohio St. 226, 58 Am. St. Rep. 821, 6 N. E. 246, the court discussed the doctrine of constructive service as affected by its tendency to cause idleness, as follows: "In order to recover upon the strength of this doctrine, the employee must not only be willing to perform on his part, but must hold himself in readiness to perform. This implies that he will remain idle. Public policy, not to say public morals, forbids the encouragement of an idle class. Being subject to the universal rule that a person injured by the act of another is bound to use ordinary diligence to make the damage as light as may be, the discharged employee must use ordinary care to obtain employment. He may not be required to seek elsewhere, or to engage in a different industry. But he is bound to use ordinary effort to obtain similar employment in the same vicinity; at least, if such employment is offered, he is bound to take advantage of it. It would be a direct encouragement to idleness to hold that he who may have, but refuses, similar service, is entitled to full compensation the same as though he performed full labor. This rule stands squarely across the path of 'constructive service.' For if the workman is bound to accept employment of another employer, how can he continue ready to resume work under his former employer? A learned writer, whose valued paper in support of the doctrine of 'constructive service' is cited by counsel, uses this language: 'The doctrine of constructive service, however, does not permit an employee who has been wrongfully discharged to remain willfully idle during the period for which he had been engaged,'—a most singular conception of the groundwork of the doctrine, it seems to us. Being actually at work for B, how can he be constructively at work for A? Being required to hold himself in readiness to resume his work for A, how can he engage with B? Engaging with B, how can he be ready to resume work with A? 'Constructive service,' as here sought to be applied, never had, as we think, support in principle, and the support derived from authority is at least very considerably impaired."

Another reason assigned for the rejection of the doctrine of constructive service is that the theory upon which it is founded, namely, that when the servant has held himself ready to do the work he has performed it, is that the averments necessary to set out the cause of action are necessarily untrue and incapable of proof. This view was presented in James v. Allen County (1886) 44 Ohio St. 226, 58 Am. St. Rep. 821, 6 N. E. 246; and Derosia v. Ferland (1910) 83 Vt. 372, 28 L.R.A. (N.S.) 577, 138 Am. St. Rep. 1092, 76 Atl. 153; and Emmens v. Elderton (1853) 13 C. B. 495, 138 Eng. Reprint, 1292, 4 H. L. Cas. 624, 10 Eng. Reprint, 606, 18 Jur. 21. In the James Case the court said: "For the purpose of allowing a recovery in some amount his readiness to do and tender of performance may have the effect of performance to the extent of putting the employer in the wrong, but how can it be said, in truth, that he has done the work? That he has performed? The claim is based upon a fiction, an untruth. There is no acceptance of the services; there is no delivery of them; the defendant has not had the benefit of them; he has not had value received, and upon what principle is it that in law he is liable for the agreed price when he has not received the commodity which he agreed to buy, and the other party has not parted with the commodity which he agreed to sell? The doctrine of 'constructive service,' as applied to a case of this character, is one beset with difficulties. It requires a plaintiff to assume that to exist which in fact has no existence. He is demanding wages when he has rendered no service. The doctrine contradicts the very term itself. How can he truthfully aver, as in indebitatus assumpsit, that the defendant is indebted to him for work and labor done?"

It has also been declared that, "to sustain the doctrine of 'constructive service' would be in effect to hold that the contract is one which could be enforced specifically, for if, after discharge, and after the employer had repudiated the contract on his part and laid himself liable to full damages for its breach, the employee could treat the contract as subsisting in such sort as to recover upon instalments as wages earned, when in fact they were not earned, and recover as each came due, the result would be a specific performance of the contract, and that, too, by a multiplicity of suits. Surely no lawyer would seriously ask a court of equity to specifically enforce a contract which, in its nature, gives to the aggrieved party so plain and full a remedy at law, in an action for damages." Ibid.

V. Statutory provisions.

In a few instances statutes have been enacted which recognize or in effect restate the doctrine of "constructive service."

For instance, it is provided by statute in Louisiana that if, without any serious ground of complaint, a man should send away a laborer whose services he had hired for a certain time, before that time had expired, he would be bound to pay such laborer the whole of the salary which he would have been entitled to receive had the full term of his services arrived. See Chevalier v. Borie (1832) 3 La. 299 (holding that the right of action accrues immediately upon the discharge, unless the employee and the master become reconciled); Orphan Asylum v. Mississippi M. Ins. Co. (1835) 8 La. 181 (holding generally that, upon wrongful discharge during the term, the discharged employee may recover the salary for the full term); Beckman v. New Orleans Cotton Press Co. (1838) 12 La. 67 (holding same as Orphan Asylum v. Mississippi M. Ins. Co. (La.) supra); Sherburne v. Orleans Cotton Press (1840) 15 La. 360 (holding that the right of action accrues as soon as the servant is discharged, subject to no imposition of conditions by the employer); Shea v. Schlatre (1842) 1 Rob. (La.) 319 (holding that the right to recover accrues as soon as the servant is discharged); Lartigue v. Peet (1843) 5 Rob. (La.) 91 (holding same as Orphan Asylum v. Mississippi M. Ins. Co. (La.) supra); Decamp v. Hewitt (1845) 11 Rob. (La.) 290, 43 Am. Dec. 204 (holding same as preceding case); Angelloz v. Rivollet (1847) 2 La. Ann. 652 (holding same as Shea v. Schlatre (La.) supra); DePuilly v. Church of St. Louis (1852) 7 La. Ann. 443 (holding same as Orphan Asylum v. Mississippi M. Ins. Co. (La.) supra); Shoemaker v. Bryan (1857) 12 La. Ann. 697 (holding that the statute applies to all persons who work for compensation except menial servants); Trefethen v. Locke (1861) 16 La. Ann. 19 (holding that the statute does not apply where the contract is entirely unperformed); Word v. Winder (1861) 16 La. Ann. 111 (holding same as preceding case); Jones v. Jackson (1870) 22 La. Ann. 112 (holding same as Orphan Asylum v. Mississippi M. Ins. Co. (La.) supra); Bormann v. Thiele (1871) 23 La. Ann. 495 (holding same as preceding case); Woodward v. Gross (1872) 24 La. Ann. 109 (holding that where the salary or pay is dependent upon results which can be determined before the end of the term of employment, judgment cannot be given until the amount is actually determined); Hewitt v. Roudebush (1872) 24 La. Ann. 254 (holding that the discharge must be wrongful); Leche v. Clavierie (1873) 25 La. Ann. 308 (holding same as Orphan Asylum v. Mississippi M. Ins. Co. (La.) supra); Taylor v. Kehlor (1874) 26 La. Ann. 369 (holding that the discharge must be wrongful); Alba v. Moriarty (1884) 36 La. Ann. 680 (holding same as preceding case);

Tete v. Lanaux (1893) 45 La. Ann. 1343, 14 So. 241 (holding same as preceding case); Woods v. M. A. Shumard & Co. (1905) 114 La. 451, 38 So. 416 (holding same as preceding case); Berlin v. P. L. Cusachs (1905) 114 La. 744, 38 So. 539 (holding that the employer, although liable for the wages for the full term, is not liable for collateral damages such as arise from unjust or unauthorized adverse inferences or conclusions which the public may draw against him from the mere fact itself of the discharge); Curtis v. Lehmann (1905) 115 La. 40, 38 So. 889 (holding that the right to recover accrues at the moment of the discharge and becomes a vested right which cannot be affected by the subsequent conduct of the employer); Thurmond v. Skannal (1907) 118 La. 6, 42 So. 577 (holding same as Orphan Asylum v. Mississippi M. Ins. Co. (La.) supra); Daspit v. D. H. Holmes Co. (1907) 120 La. 86, 44 So. 993 (holding that the right of action accrues immediately upon the discharge, and by the fact of the discharge); Camp v. Baldwin Melville Co. (1909) 123 La. 257, 48 So. 927 (holding that the fact that the discharged employee has elsewhere earned money during the unexpired part of the term does not affect his right to recover his full salary for the contract term); and Dunbar v. Orleans Metal Bed Co. (1919) 145 La. —, 82 So. 889 (holding that the right of action to recover the entire salary accrues immediately upon the discharge; that the employer cannot afterward require him to work out the term as a condition precedent to recovery; that the employee's rights are not affected by the fact that he engaged his services for the unexpired term to another employer; and that the employee need neither tender his services after his discharge nor put his employer in default).

And in Arkansas by special statute it is provided that as to future contracts a railroad company, on discharging an employee without paying all wages then earned, continues liable for wages at the contract rate until paid, but not, however, to exceed sixty days unless an action therefor is commenced within that time. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Paul (1897) 64 Ark. 83, 37 L.R.A. 504, 62 Am. St. Rep. 154, 40 S. W. 705, affirmed in (1899) 173 U. S. 404, 43 L. ed. 746, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 419, holding that such damages are exemplary and reasonable. G. J. C.

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Second Branch of the Appellate Court, First District, affirming a judgment of the Circuit Court for Cook County (Walker, J.) in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover damages for the alleged negligent killing of plaintiff's intestate. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Mr. Chilton P. Wilson, for appellant:

Defendant's demurrer to the declaration was overruled, he filed the general issue, and thereby waived any error in overruling the demurrer.

Shreffler v. Nadelhoffer, 133 Ill. 536, 23 Am. St. Rep. 626, 25 N. E. 630; Chicago & A. R. Co. v. Clausen, 173 Ill. 100, 50 N. E. 680; Pittsburg, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Robson, 204 Ill. 254, 68 N. E. 468.

The sufficiency of the declaration is thereby admitted.

Russell v. Whiteside, 5 Ill. 7; Stearns v. Cope, 109 Ill. 340; Fish v. Farwell, 160 Ill. 236, 43 N. E. 367.

Independent of any contract liability, and independent of ordinary negligence, defendant is liable for his failure to make the heater comply with the ordinance.

Messrs. Beach & Beach for appellee.

Cartwright, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action on the case instituted by the appellant, Mary E. Mercer, administratrix of the estate of Charles Mercer, deceased, in the circuit court of Cook county, against the appellee, Frederick E. Meinel, to recover damages for the death of Charles Mercer. An issue was formed by the plea of not guilty, and at the conclusion of the evidence for the plaintiff the court, on motion of the defendant, directed a verdict of not guilty. Judgment was entered on the verdict, and on appeal to the appellate court for the first district the judgment was affirmed, and the court granted a certificate of importance and allowed an appeal to this court.

The declaration contained three counts, the first of which alleged that on January 1, 1914, the defendant owned and controlled the premises at 535 North Albany avenue, in Chicago, and prior thereto installed a water heater in the bathroom of said premises, with a burner to be lighted to heat water for bath and other purposes and with a ventilating pipe running up in the corner of the bathroom behind a flush box and below the ceiling, so that one entering the bathroom could not see that the pipe ended inside of the bathroom; that when the heater was lighted it gave off carbon and other material in the bathroom; that the defendant occupied the premises for several months prior to January 1, 1914, when the heater was installed, and knew its dangerous condition; that on July 23, 1914, the defendant sold the premises to Charles Kocher without informing him of the manner in which the heater was installed, or that the exhaust pipe ended in the bathroom, or the dangerous condition thereof; that Kocher never occupied the premises, but on October 12, 1914, leased them to plaintiff and her family, who thereafter occupied them as a dwelling, and that while said heater was lighted and heating water, Charles Mercer, son of the plaintiff, was with due care and caution taking a bath in the bathroom, and was then and there poisoned and killed by carbon monoxid gas generated in the bathroom by reason of the careless and negligent manner in which the heater was installed. The second count made the same allegations, with the further averment that at the time the heater was installed by the defendant there was an ordinance of the city of Chicago, requiring a ventilating pipe not less than 2 inches in diameter extending to a chimney flue or open air, with a cap or cowl to the outer air opening, to carry off escaping gases or fumes, and that the heater was installed by the defendant contrary to the provisions of the ordinance. The third count made the same allegations as the first, but averred that after the heater was installed the ordinance was passed, and provided that water heaters that had been installed should be made to comply with the ordinance, and that the defendant occupied the premises for several months after the ordinance was in force and effect without making the heater comply with it.

It is assigned for error that the trial court erred in entertaining a motion to direct a verdict because a demurrer to the declaration had been overruled, and the defendant had filed a plea of the general issue, so that the question raised by the motion had already been determined. The demurrer admitted the material averments of the declaration, and the question raised thereby was whether such averments were sufficient to constitute a cause of action, but on the motion to direct a verdict the question presented was whether the evidence offered by the plaintiff, with all legitimate inferences to be drawn from it, would be sufficient to sustain a verdict. If the declaration stated a cause of action, the motion raised an entirely different question, whether the evidence fairly tended to sustain its averments. The court did not err in entertaining the motion.

Trial—overruling of demurrer—effect on motion for directed verdict.

The evidence introduced by the plaintiff was to the following effect: The bathroom was very small, measuring 4 feet 6 inches by 5 feet 6 inches. The bathtub occupied the north side, and, owing to a slanting roof, the wall was only 3 feet high on that side. The roof sloped up over the bathtub to near the south side of the ceiling, leaving a small part of a flat ceiling about 8 feet high. There was a small glass window in the sloping part of the roof, opening out on the roof, and a door on the south side. At the east wall the heater in question was placed, and at the southeast corner there was a toilet seat, over which there was a flush box near the ceiling. Next to the heater and near the east wall there was a sewer pipe 6 inches in diameter, which ran from the basement through the bathroom and out through the roof, and next to the sewer pipe there was a  $\frac{3}{4}$  inch gas pipe. The exhaust pipe ran from the top of the heater along the east wall along the sewer pipe and ended behind and above the flush box. The Mercer family, consisting of the plaintiff, her husband, five children, and other persons, making a large family, moved into the building on November 4, 1914, and used the bathroom and heater for family use until August 29, 1915. Some of the time the hot water for the bathtub was supplied from pipes attached to the coal range in the kitchen on the first floor, but the bathroom was in general use with that exception. The plaintiff almost invariably prepared the water for the bath for each member of her family, but did not remember of any of the family taking a bath while the heater was going. On August 29, 1915, the plaintiff lighted the heater and turned on the water, and her son Charles Mercer, fourteen years old, went into the bathroom to take a bath. He closed the window and the bathroom door, and soon afterward his mother, the plaintiff, heard water dripping in the room on the floor below. She went up to the bathroom, and found Charles sitting in the tub, dead, with water running from the cold and hot water faucets, the heater going, and the water up to the overflow pipe, which leaked and caused the water to drop below.

The death of Charles was caused by the escape of carbon monoxid gas from the exhaust pipe, and that gas is odorless, of a heavier specific gravity than air, and a deadly poison when breathed into the lungs. The defendant had installed the heater and occupied the premises with his family for several years before he sold the property to Kocher, and after that sale until November 4, 1915, when the plaintiff and her family moved in. There never had been an opening into a chimney flue or through the roof of the building, and there never had been any bad results from the use of the heater and bathroom during the time the defendant occupied the premises nor the ten months during which the plaintiff and her family occupied them up to the time of the accident. The evidence as to the condition of the pipe when the defendant sold to Kocher was given by Kocher as a witness, and he testified there was never any talk between him and the defendant about the heater. He described the sewer pipe, the small gas pipe, the exhaust pipe, and the flush box over the toilet seat, and a hole in the ceiling above the flush box. He said he saw the heater and the pipe leading up to the ceiling; that the pipe ran straight up to the ceiling to the hole in the wall; that he could not see whether it ran into the ceiling or through the ceiling, but he did not think it ended in the bathroom, or he would have noticed it, and that the hole was a little larger than the pipe as he remembered it, and the pipe went all the way up to the ceiling. After the accident an examination was made, which showed the hole in the ceiling above the end of the exhaust pipe, but the pipe did not reach the hole or ceiling. The plaintiff's husband testified that the pipe from the heater led up straight and ran along the slant of the roof behind and above the flush box, and he stood on the toilet and looked along and felt with his hand, and found that the end of the pipe then pointed south to a short distance of the south wall of the bathroom and ended pointing south; that it did not reach up to the hole in the ceiling; and that the Mercer family never moved the pipe. The ordinance took effect April 12, 1911, and the heater was not thereafter made to conform to the ordinance.

There have been cases where it was held that a manufacturer of a machine or article designed and fitted for a particular use is liable to a third person who, in the natural and intended use, suffers an injury as the natural and probable consequence of the negligence of the manufacturer in its construction and sale. The case of Huset v. J. I. Case Threshing Mach. Co. 61 L.R.A. 303, 57 C. C. A. 237, 120 Fed. 865, is an example of that class. There have been other cases in which it has been held that where there are concealed defects in demised premises, attended with danger to an occupant which a careful examination would not disclose, but which are known to the landlord, the latter is under obligation to make them known to the tenant, and upon his failure to perform that duty he will become liable for whatever damages result to the tenant therefrom. Sunasack v. Morey, 196 Ill. 569, 63 N. E. 1039; 1 Thomp. Neg. §§ 1131-1158. A large number of cases of both kinds are cited and made the basis of an argument that the defendant remained liable after he parted with the title and control of the premises and sustained no contract relation either with Kocher or his tenant, but no case has been found where such a liability has been declared.

Negligence—
liability.

The liability, if any,
must rest upon the existence of a duty

which must arise out of a relation between the parties and a negligent failure to perform the duty. There is a material difference between the relation between a manufacturer or vendor of a machine or article purchased for a specific use and one using the machine or article for the contemplated purpose, or between a landlord occupying a contractual relation with his tenant and the tenant, and the situation of one who has ceased to have any connection whatever with property which he has conveyed, or his grantee. Whether or not there is a liability in case of an existing dangerous condition, it cannot be true that the grantor assumes a duty to see that the premises remain in a safe condition. In this case there was an entire failure of any evidence fairly tending to prove either the averment of the declaration that the heater, at the time of the sale to Kocher, was in a defective or dangerous condition, or that the defendant had any knowledge of such condition, if it existed. Kocher testified, as before stated, that at the time of the sale, as far as he could see, the pipe extended up to the ceiling, and as far as he remembered it ran through the ceiling, and that it did not end in the bathroom, otherwise he would have noticed it. The only other testimony was that after the accident the end of the pipe pointed to the south and was horizontal, and did not point upward to the hole or the ceiling. The evidence was that it could not then be seen by one entering the bathroom door, and the reasonable conclusion is that the pipe is jointed and the position of the upper end had been changed in some way. The heater had not been made to comply with the ordinance, but the bathroom had been used by the defendant for several years without any bad effects or any accident, which makes it quite clear there was no dangerous defect. If there was any liability of the defendant it arose at the time of the sale to Kocher, and there was no evidence from which an inference could fairly be drawn that a dangerous condition existed at that time. The conclusion that it did not is strengthened unsafe premises —liability of vendor.

by the fact that the bathroom was used thereafter for ten months by the members of a large family without any deleterious effect.

The fact that the ordinance had not been complied with during the ownership of the defendant created no liability of the defendant to any person, because no damage or injury resulted from the failure. If the defendant would have been liable to a penalty in a prosecution under the ordinance, any duty to make the heater comply with the ordinance rested on Kocher after the sale, and not on the defendant, and if any injury resulted from such failure the liability would rest upon Kocher, if anyone. We do not say whether the declaration stated a cause of action or not, but, if it did, there was no evidence tending to prove its averments that a dangerous condition existed at the time of the sale to Kocher, or, if it did exist, that the defendant knew or from any fact or circumstance ought to have known of it.

The judgment of the Appellate Court is affirmed.

ANNOTATION.

Liability of former owner of real estate because of a violation of statute or ordinance relating to condition of premises.

No cases other than the reported case (MERCER v. MEINEL, ante, 351) have been found in which an owner of premises who had conveyed the same was sought to be held liable for a violation by him prior to the conveyance of statute or ordinance relating to the condition of the premises.

It has been held that a vendor who had surrendered possession to his vendees was not liable for an injury occurring the next day from a negligently maintained gate on a building on the premises adjoining a public sidewalk. Palmore v. Morris, T. & Co. (1897) 182 Pa. 82, 61 Am. St. Rep. 693, 37 Atl. 995, 3 Am. Neg. Rep. 597. The court, after stating that the authorities on the exact question were very meager, referred to the case of landlord and tenant, and continued: "But this is not a letting of the land by a landlord to a tenant; it is an absolute sale whereby the owner divests himself of title and all right to possession or of re-entry for repairs or for any other purpose. Any future possession in face of his deed, unless there be an independent stipulation to the contrary, would be a palpable trespass, and with his surrender of possession all the duties incident to ownership as to him were at an end. . . . The learned judge of the court below adopts a different event for the commencement of liability on the part of the grantee than possession taken under the deed; he says: 'He ought within a reasonable time to see that the property which he had purchased, if it was in dangerous condition to the public, was put in repair.' That is, he imports into the deed an implied covenant on the part of the grantors that they will be answerable to third parties for defects in the building for a reasonable time after the grantee takes possession. Public policy does not demand that such clogs on the transfer of real estate should be imposed by construction; nor does the law warrant such an implication. Before he purchased the real estate the law presumes the grantee examined the property and was cognizant of its situation, surroundings, the character of the structures upon it, and their condition of repair. Without an express covenant by the grantors as between them and the grantee, there was no duty on the grantors to repair. The purchaser thereafter assumed that duty because he then became the owner and occupant. If the grantors, after possession by Lodge, the grantee, owed no duty to him, why should there be neglect in performance on their part as to the public? It is not even the case of no actual occupancy, where the law casts the duty on the owner, but one where the owner and actual occupant were the same. If the accident did not happen during the ownership and occupancy of Morris, Tasker, & Company, and the evidence showed that it happened after Lodge took possession, the question for the jury was not whether there was negligence on part of defendants in maintaining a defective gate; the real question on the evidence was, Did Lodge take possession of the property described in his deed on Friday, the 10th of May? If he did, then the accident which occurred on the 11th must be imputed to the negligence of the owner and occupant of the premises, and not to Morris, Tasker, & Company, who, before that time, were owners and occupants. . . . There may be a case where the grantor conceals from the grantee a defect in a structure known to him alone, and not discoverable by careful inspection, that the owner would be held liable, though out of possession; but that is not this case. The rotten gate, the testimony shows, was as obvious before the accident as afterwards, and the reasonable time for the purchaser to discover it was not limited to the twenty hours after he took possession, but to the weeks and months pending the negotiations, before the delivery of the deed."

Where a nuisance has been created upon property it has been stated to be the general rule that the owner thereof does not relieve himself from liability therefor by conveying the premises. 20 R. C. L. p. 392, § 15.

PEOPLE OF THE STATE OF ILLINOIS

v.

TIM JONES, Plff. in Err.

(290 Ill. 603, 125 N. E. 256.)

Robbery — taking money from pocket of drunken man.

1. The taking of money from the pocket of a drunken man, which requires no force or violence, is not robbery, although, upon being accused of the theft, the thief assaults his victim.

— definition.

2. Robbery is the felonious and violent taking of money, goods, or other valuable thing from the person of another by force or intimidation.

— necessity of force.

3. The crime of robbery is not committed unless the property stolen is taken from the person by force or intimidation.

[See 23 R. C. L. 1144.]

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Montgomery County (Jett, J.) to review a judgment convicting defendant of robbery. *Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Mr. John E. Hogan, for plaintiff in error:

The facts in this case do not constitute robbery.

People v. Ryan, 239 Ill. 410, 88 N. E. 170; Burke v. People, 148 Ill. 70, 35 N. E. 376; Hall v. People, 171 Ill. 540, 49 N. E. 495; Schroeder v. People, 196 Ill. 211, 63 N. E. 678; People v.

Campbell, 234 Ill. 391, 128 Am. St. Rep. 107, 84 N. E. 1035, 11 Ann. Cas. 186.

The verdict is manifestly against the weight of the evidence, and insufficient to establish guilt beyond a reasonable doubt.

People v. Freeland, 234 Ill. 190, 119 N. E. 928; People v. McMahon, 254 Ill. 62, 98 N. E. 239.

Messrs. Edward J. Brundage, Attorney General, Sumner S. Anderson, Assistant Attorney General, J. Earl Major, and J. D. Wilson, for defendant in error:

While it is true that the gist of the crime of robbery consists in the force or intimidation used in taking from the person assaulted, against his will, an article of value, yet the degree of force used is immaterial.

34 Cyc. 1799; People v. Campbell, 234 Ill. 391, 123 Am. St. Rep. 107, 84 N. E. 1035, 14 Ann. Cas. 186; State v. McCune, 5 R. I. 60, 70 Am. Dec. 176; Burke v. People, 148 Ill. 70, 35 N. E. 376.

The sufficiency of the evidence in the first instance is a matter for the jury's determination, and unless the reviewing court can say that the jury has been manifestly swayed by passion or prejudice, and that its determination is manifestly against the weight of the evidence, it will not reverse the case upon the ground of the sufficiency of the evidence.

Nall*, 242 Ill. 284, 89 N. E. 1012.

Dunn, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

At the November term, 1918, of the circuit court of Montgomery county, the grand jury returned an indictment against Tim Jones and Charles Peppard, charging them in two counts with assaulting William Kehl and by force and intimidation robbing him of $70. The indictment also contained two counts for larceny. The defendants were placed on trial, and at the close of the people's evidence a nolle was entered as to Peppard. At the close of all the evidence the court required the state's attorney to elect upon which counts he would ask a conviction, and he elected the counts charging robbery. The jury found the defendant Tim Jones guilty of robbery, and he has sued out a writ of error to reverse the judgment entered on the verdict.

The plaintiff in error contends that the evidence is insufficient to prove his guilt beyond a reasonable doubt, and that if any crime was proved to have been committed it was not robbery but larceny.

The evidence shows that the prosecuting witness, William Kehl, who was a concrete worker and had come to Illinois from Michigan in March, 1918, and had afterward worked for periods varying from a few days to a few weeks at Peoria, Bloomington, Hudson, and Raymond, in this state, having previously arranged for work on an elevator being constructed in Nokomis, came to that place on September 16, 1918, arriving about 10 o'clock in the morning. He soon afterward went to Sam Lapaski's saloon and spent most of the rest of the day and evening there until 9 or 10 o'clock, drinking whisky, wine, and beer, treating the crowd, matching half dollars, giving money to a man and a boy, buying chances in a raffle, and becoming very drunk. Jones, Peppard, and Lon De Witt, who were all strangers to Kehl, were in the saloon after supper and drank with him at his expense. He finally fell on the floor, and as he had procured no lodging place, these three went with him to a hotel to get a room. He sat down or fell down on the porch and did not get a room. The four then started back across the railroad, De Witt on one side of Kehl and Jones on the other, helping him, and at the railroad track Kehl again fell down or sat down. Kehl testified that at the railroad crossing Jones slipped his hand in Kehl's hip pocket and took the latter's pocketbook, in which was his money; that Kehl said to Jones, "You have my pocketbook," and then Jones hit him over the eye and "knocked him out." De Witt testified that Kehl sat down on a pile of ties and was going to lie down. De Witt and Jones went to pick him up, Jones taking hold of one side and De Witt the other, and as they started to raise him up Jones put his hand in Kehl's pocket, took the latter's pocketbook out, and shoved it in Jones's pocket. Then Kehl said, "You have got my pocket-book," and Jones called Kehl a liar and hit him. Jones denied taking the pocketbook or money, and Peppard did not see him take the pocketbook or put his hand in Kehl's pocket, though there was a scuffle at the railroad crossing, where Kehl lay down. The evidence discloses nothing further as to the pocketbook or money.

"Robbery" is the felonious and violent taking of money, goods, or other valuable thing

from the person of another by force or intimidation, and is punishable by imprisonment in the penitentiary not less than one year nor more than fourteen years. Private stealing from the person is declared by the statute to be deemed larceny, and is punishable, if the property stolen exceed $15 in value, by imprisonment in the penitentiary not less than one year nor more than ten years. The statute makes the distinction, and it is the duty of the courts to enforce the statute. The distinction is that, while any felonious stealing of the personal goods of another is larceny, it is necessary, to constitute robbery, that the taking be by force or intimidation. The force or intimidation is the gist of the offense, and the crime of robbery is not committed unless the property stolen is taken from the person by force or intimidation. Burke v. People, 148 Ill. 70, 35 N. E. 376; Hall v. People, 171 Ill. 540, 49 N. E. 495.

force.

In the latter case Hall unbuttoned his victim's vest and took the pocketbook from his inside vest pocket, using no more force than the mere physical effort of taking the pocketbook from the victim's pocket and transferring it to his own, and the court said that if that is robbery, then no practical distinction between that crime and larceny from the person exists. The owner's power to retain his property must be overcome by the use of actual violence or by fear. People v. Ryan, 239 Ill. 410, 88 N. E. 170. In People v. Campbell, 234 Ill. 391, 123 Am. St. Rep. 107, 14 Ann. Cas. 186, 84 N. E. 1035, it was held that the force required to tear a diamond stud from the wearer's shirt front, to which it was attached by a spiral pin, and the struggle to retain the pin, constituted the taking robbery. In the present case the incriminating evidence tended to show only a stealthy taking of the pocketbook from Kehl's pocket and transferring of it to Jones's pocket. The evidence excluded any attempt to use violence. There was no evidence of a struggle to retain possession of the pocketbook, but only an accusation of the theft after it occurred, which the plaintiff in error resented by assaulting the accuser. The actions of the plaintiff in error as testified to were those of a pickpocket, and not of a highwayman.

Under the evidence, the plaintiff in error was not guilty of the crime of robbery, and the judgment must be reversed.

I. In general.

"Open and violent larceny from the person, or robbery, the rapina of the civilians, is the felonious and forcible taking from the person of another of goods or money to any value by violence or putting him in fear." 4 Bl. Com. 241.

Taking property from the person by stealth is not robbery.

New York.—Norris's Case (1821) 6 N. Y. City Hall Rec. 86; PEOPLE v. JONES (reported herewith) ante, 357.

In Territory v. McKern (Idaho) supra, a charge as to robbery, "that if a man stealthily flich from the pocket of another, the force necessary to remove the property is all the force that the statute required," was held error.

Stealthily putting one's hand in another's pocket and pulling out his pocketbook or money before the latter is aware of what is being done is not robbery. Bibb v. Com. (1908) 33 Ky. L. Rep. 726, 112 S. W. 401; Jones v. Com. (1903) 115 Ky. 592, 103 Am. St. Rep. 340, 74 S. W. 263, 14 Am. Crim. Rep. 580; Dawson v. Com. (1903) 25 Ky. L. Rep. 5.

And merely inserting one's hand into another's pocket and abstracting therefrom loose change, with intent to steal it, does not come within a statute making everyone guilty of robbery who feloniously takes the property of another from his person and against his will, by violence to his person. State v. Parker (Mo.) supra. The court distinguished cases which sustained a conviction of robbery where the facts showed that there was a sudden snatching or jerking of the property from the person of another.

In People v. Ryan (Ill.) supra, it was held that the offense is not robbery where the evidence tends to prove the removal of a stud by stealth and adroitness only.

But jerking a diamond pin or stud out of a shirt was held to be robbery in People v. Campbell (1908) 284 Ill. 391, 123 Am. St. Rep. 107, 84 N. E. 1035, 14 Ann. Cas. 186.

After money has been stealthily removed from the pocket of another, the force used to prevent its recapture or to effect an escape does not relate back, so as to constitute the original taking a robbery. Colbey v. State (1903) 46 Fla. 112, 110 Am. St. Rep. 87, 35 So. 189; Jones v. Com. (1903) 115 Ky. 592, 103 Am. St. Rep. 340, 74 S. W. 263, 14 Am. Crim. Rep. 580.

Where a man slyly put his hand into another's pocket and took his purse without knowledge of the latter until just as it was drawn from the pocket, it was held merely larceny from the person. Norris's Case (1821) 6 N. Y. City Hall Rec. 86.

It was held not to be robbery where the defendant slipped his hand into a lady's outside pocket, and furtively took therefrom a purse of money. Before he got the purse entirely out, she felt the hand and tried to seize it, but the thief had succeeded and the purse was gone. In extracting hand and purse, the pocket was torn, and when the lady turned she saw the thief looking unconcernedly at the houses on the street. She rushed upon him and caught him by the coat, which, in his struggle to escape, was left torn in her possession. Fanning v. State (1880) 66 Ga. 167, 4 Am. Crim. Rep. 561.

In Dawson v. Com. (1903) 25 Ky. L. Rep. 5, 74 S. W. 701, it was held not to be robbery where the accused stealthily placed her hand in prosecutor's pocket and took therefrom some money, nor did the fact that accused drew a pistol when the loss of the money was learned and prosecutor demanded its return make the act of taking robbery.

But where accused, who was endeavoring stealthily to take money from prosecutor's pocket, was caught by the latter while his hand was in the pocket, and a struggle ensued, accused endeavoring to get the money and prosecutor to prevent him, and the money was finally taken violently by inflicting physical injuries, the offense was robbery, and not larceny from the person. Carter v. State (1907) 3 Ga. App. 477, 60 S. E. 216. The court distinguished the case at bar from Fanning v. State (Ga.) supra, stating that in the latter case the force used to keep possession of the property was after accused had surreptitiously taken it from the prosecutor's pocket.

II. From drunken persons.

Taking property from an unresisting drunken man who does not know he is being robbed is not robbery. Ramirez v. Territory (1905) 9 Ariz. 177, 80 Pac. 391; Hall v. People (1898) 171 Ill. 540, 49 N. E. 495; Brennon v. State (1865) 25 Ind. 403; PEOPLE v. JONES (reported herewith) ante, 357.

Where one merely filches money from the pocket of another who is drunk, the mere force necessary to remove the property is not all the force required by the statute to constitute robbery. Ramirez v. Territory (Ariz.) supra.

Unbuttoning his pocket, possibly by pulling at it, and taking a pocketbook from a drunken man who does not know what is being done and makes no resistance, is not robbery. Hall v. People (1898) 171 Ill. 540, 49 N. E. 495.

It will be seen that it is held in the reported case (PEOPLE v. JONES) that stealthily taking a pocketbook from a drunken man is not robbery, though the loser immediately discovers the loss.

But the jury are authorized to conclude that terrible injuries which have been inflicted upon the person of the owner of property indicate active resistance on his part and the use of force on the part of one accused of robbery in removing the property from his person, even though resistance may have been blindly offered, and the force exercised against a man practically unconscious from drink or drugs, who is unable to recall the facts when finally restored to reason.

And producing unconsciousness by means of a drug for the purpose of obtaining money in custody of the person rendered unconscious has been held to be an exercise of force within the meaning of the statute against robbery. State v. Snyder (1918) 41 Nev. 453, L.R.A.1918E, 933, 172 Pac. 364.

III. Victim deceived as to purpose of force.

It is robbery when force is used in its consummation, although the victim does not know what is being done. Seymour v. State (1860) 15 Ind. 238; Snyder v. Com. (1900) 21 Ky. L. Rep. 1538, 55 S. W. 679; Blanton v. Com. (1900) 139 Ky. 411, 58 S. W. 422, 14 Am. Crim. Rep. 588; State v. Gorham (1875) 55 N. H. 162; Mahoney v. People (1874) 3 Hun (N. Y.) 202, affirmed in (1875) 59 N. Y. 659; Com. v. Snelling (1812) 4 Binn. (Pa.) 379; Anonymous (1825) 1 Lewin, C. C. (Eng.) 308.

Thus it is robbery when the prosecutor thought the thief simply meant to beat him. Com. v. Snelling (1812) 4 Binn. (Pa.) 379. So, putting an arm around one's neck, ostensibly to whisper to him, and then picking his pocket, is robbery. State v. Gorham (1875) 55 N. H. 152. So, it is robbery to pick one's pockets while scuffling with him (Blanton v. Com. (1900) 139 Ky. 411, 58 S. W. 422, 14 Am. Crim. Rep. 588); or while jostling him (Snyder v. Com. (1900) 21 Ky. L. Rep. 1538); or while running against him (Anonymous (1825) 1 Lewin, C. C. (Eng.) 300); or while pushing him (Seymour v. State (1860) 15 Ind. 238); or while crowding and putting one's arms around him (Mahoney v. People (1874) 3 Hun (N. Y.) 203).

But it was held a taking in an artful, secret manner, and not robbery, where a man accosted a country boy as an acquaintance, at the same time seizing him around the waist and by fumbling around him at length succeeded in picking his pocket of an empty pocketbook. Davis's Case (1817) 2 N. Y. City Hall Rec. 32.

In a case where it does not appear whether the victim knew the purpose of the force or not, in holding that throwing an arm around a person and taking his pocketbook is robbery, the court said: "The evidence in this case discloses the fact that the defendant, Burke, made an assault on Schultz, and used force to take from his person, against his will, his pocketbook containing his money, and this is sufficient to constitute the offense." Burke v. People (1893) 148 Ill. 70, 35 N. E. 376.

And whether there was such force as to constitute robbery, where one put her arms around another and took money from his pocket, was held in State v. Spivey (1918) — Mo. —, 204 S. W. 259, to be a question for the jury.

IV. Miscellaneous.

It does not constitute robbery to take money from an open drawer, although the owner of the money had been tied by accused, where the tying was for another purpose, and the taking of the money was an afterthought. United States v. Birueda (1905) 4 Philippine, 229.

It has been held that if the violence to the person in a case of snatching was accidental and unintentional, it is not robbery, as in Reg. v. Edwards (1848) 1 Cox, C. C. (Eng.) 32, where a woman was returning from market in a wagon with a basket tied onto the seat by her side, and the prisoner and another, both armed with broom knives, endeavored to lift off the basket by stealth, but, seeing the string, cut it through with the knife just at the same moment when the woman perceived their intention and stretched out her arm to lay hold of the basket and thus received a wound on the wrist from the knife, which caused her to withdraw her hand and leave the thieves in possession of the basket. This was held to be simply larceny, for in robbery force must not only be employed by the party charged, but it is necessary to show that the force was used with the intent to accomplish the robbery, while in this case the wound seemed to have been inflicted undesignedly and by mere accident.

The taking of property was held in

People v. Pasqueria (1916) 30 Cal. App. 625, 159 Pac. 173, to have been accompanied by all the elements constituting the crime of robbery where accused entered a Chinaman's store, and, claiming to be a detective, accused the Chinaman of having lottery tickets in his possession, and stated that he wanted to search his place, and, under the pretense of making a search for lottery tickets, put his hand in the Chinaman's pocket and took therefrom a pocketbook and purse from which he abstracted $30 in money, a diamond ring valued at $65, and a stick pin, and putting them in his own pocket, struck the Chinaman upon the jaw and ran out of the store.

In construing a statute providing that "robbery is . . . the sudden snatching, taking, or carrying away any money, goods, chattels, or anything of value from the owner or person in possession or control thereof, without the consent of the owner or person in possession or control thereof," the court stated that formerly violence of some kind was essential to the offense of robbery, but that under this act, in order to prove a case of robbery by suddenly taking or carrying away the property of another without his consent, it is necessary to show only that the person robbed was conscious that something was being taken from him, and that for any reason he was unable to prevent it; that the only difference between robbery of this class and larceny from the person is that in the latter case property is abstracted without the knowledge of the possessor; but if the possessor becomes conscious, even in the taking, that his property is being taken from him, and the knowledge is obtained before the taking is complete, it is robbery. And so, in that case, it was held that, as there was evidence that the prosecuting witness was conscious that something was being taken from his pocket before, or at least at the same time that, an outcry was made that his money was taken from him, the jury was authorized to find that his money was suddenly taken away from him without his consent, but with his knowledge, and that the offense was robbery, and not larceny from the person, or secret theft. Williams v. State (1911) 9 Ga. App. 170, 70 S. E. 890.

A conviction under the same statute was sustained where the defendants followed the prosecutor to a train, and one of them mounted the train and came to the platform as the prosecutor was about to enter, and pressed him against the other, and the prosecutor felt the hand of one of them go into his pocket, and exclaimed, "I am being robbed." The defendants quickly disappeared, and the prosecutor felt for his pocketbook, and it was gone.

Hickey v. State (1906) 125 Ga. 145, 53 S. E. 1026.

But in Morris v. State (1906) 125 Ga. 36, 53 S. E. 564, it was held that the evidence was insufficient to warrant a conviction under this act, where the prosecutor's purse was taken from his pocket without his knowledge, and without resort to any violence in the taking, the court stating that the offense proved, if any, was that of larceny from the person, the distinction between this and the preceding cases being the fact that the property was taken without the owner's knowledge.

Appeal — discrepancy in stating amount of bail bond — absence of prejudice.

10. Reversal of a judgment on a bail bond will not be granted because of discrepancy in the summons in stating the amount of the bond, if the surety was not prejudiced thereby.

APPEALS by the sureties from judgments of the Circuit Court for Nelson County against them for the respective amounts of their bail bonds in proceedings for forfeiture of said bonds. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Nat. W. Halstead and Frank E. Daugherty, for appellants:

The judgment, findings, and determination of the local board under the Selective Service Act in placing the defendants in class 1A were conclusive.

United States ex rel. Bartalini v. Mitchell, 248 Fed. 997; Ex parte Platt, 253 Fed. 413; United States v. Miller, 249 Fed. 985; United States ex rel. Brown v. Commanding Officer, 248 Fed. 1005.

The evidence of the inferior military officers at Camp Zachary Taylor, to the effect that defendants Andrew Briggs, Jr., and Lud Bodine, could have obtained passes for a few days' absence, and thereby have attended the Nelson circuit court, was wholly incompetent and improper.

Franke v. Murray, L.R.A.1918E, 1015, 160 C. C. A. 623, 248 Fed. 866, Ann. Cas. 1918D, 98; Ex parte King, 246 Fed. 868.

Whenever sureties on a criminal bail bond are prevented by a declaration of martial law, or draft law, by the Federal government, from enforcing the attendance of their principal so they cannot perform their obligations, they are discharged as such sureties.

Ex parte King, supra; Com. v. Overby, 80 Ky. 208, 44 Am. Rep. 471; Com. v. Webster, 1 Bush, 616; United States ex rel. Brown v. Commanding Officer, 248 Fed. 1005; 6 C. J. § 284; State v. Herber, — Okla. —, L.R.A.1918F, 396, 173 Pac. 651.

The court erred to the prejudice of the substantial rights of appellants in refusing to allow them, as sureties on the bonds of these soldiers, the benefit of the Federal statute known as the Soldiers' and Sailors' Civil Relief Act.

Belond v. Guy, 20 Wash. 161, 54 Pac. 995; Jackson v. Davis, 4 Mackey, 202;

Leary v. United States, 224 U. S. 567, 56 L. ed. 889, 32 Sup. Ct. Rep. 599, Ann. Cas. 1913D, 1029.

The court had no authority to render judgment in the Bodine case, as the bond was taken by the police court of Bardstown, and never certified by that court to the Nelson circuit court as a part of the minutes of the examining court, or filed in the case.

Morgan v. Com. 12 Bush, 84.

On Petition for Rehearing.

Messrs. Hobson & Hobson, also for appellants:

If the bail were released when the accused were taken out of their custody, they were under no obligation to incur expenses or spend time and effort to have the accused in court.

Com. v. Bronson, 14 B. Mon. 361; Smith v. Com. 91 Ky. 590, 16 S. W. 532; Com. v. Overby, 80 Ky. 208, 44 Am. Rep. 471; Yarbrough v. Com. 89 Ky. 153, 25 Am. St. Rep. 524, 12 S. W. 143; Alford v. Irwin, 84 Ga. 25; McCluskey v. Brock, 84 Ga. 206; Robertson v. Patterson, 7 East. 405, 103 Eng. Reprint, 157; Hargis v. Begley, 23 L.R.A. (N.S.) 139, note; 3 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 717; 3 R. C. L. p. 58, § 69; Medlin v. Com. 11 Bush. 607; Com. v. Webster, 1 Bush, 616.

Even on the voluntary enlistment of the accused in the Army of the United States the bail is released.

People v. Cushney, 44 Barb. 118; People v. Cook, 80 How. Pr. 110; McFarland v. Wilbur, 85 Vt. 842.

The voluntary acts of the accused in declining to accept a furlough when out of the custody of the bail could not revive a liability which did not exist.

Reese v. United States, 9 Wall. 13, 54 L. ed. 541; Taylor v. Taintor, 16 Wall. 366, 21 L. ed. 287.

The bail stands like any other surety, and is released by any material change made by the government without his consent, which affects his liability or rights under the contract.

Reese v. United States, supra; Cross v. Allen, 141 U. S. 537, 35 L. ed. 849, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 67; United States Fidelity & G. Co. v. Golden Pressed & Fire Brick Co. (United States Fidelity & G. Co. v. United States) 191 U. S. 423, 43 L. ed. 245, 24 Sup. Ct. Rep. 142; United States v. Freil, 92 Fed. 301.

If defendants were taken out of the custody of the sureties and taken charge of by the Federal law, although it may have been erroneously done, it was done by a tribunal that had power and authority to do so, and because of that fact, appellants are discharged as such sureties.

Messrs. Ernest N. Fulton, John S. Keeley, John A. Fulton, J. Lewis Williams, and Charles H. Morris, Attorney General, for the Commonwealth.

Quin, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Lud Bodine and Andrew Briggs, Jr., were indicted by a grand jury of Nelson county for the offense condemned by § 1155, Ky. Stat., and were released on bail furnished by appellants and another. Bodine's bail was fixed at $2,500, and that of Briggs at $2,000. We shall designate the accused as defendants, and the sureties as appellants. After having been twice continued on defendants' motion, the cases were called for trial June 5, 1918, when a similar motion by the defendants was overruled. Defendants failing to answer when called, the bonds were forfeited, and summons issued against appellants, returnable the first day of the October term, 1918, to show cause, if any they could, why judgment should not be rendered against them on said forfeitures. November 13th the court rendered separate judgments against the appellants for the respective amounts of the bonds, and to reverse said judgments these appeals have been prosecuted.

The proceedings in the two cases are identical. In the answer it is alleged: (1) That defendants registered on June 5, 1917, under the Selective Service Act (Act Cong. May 18, 1917, chap. 15, 40 Stat. at L. 76, Comp. Stat. §§ 2019a, 2019b, 2044a-2044k, 9 Fed. Stat. Anno. 2d ed, pp. 1136, 1156, 1157, 1159-1163), they were duly classified and placed in class 1A, and on May 25, 1918, they were called by the local board and inducted into the National Army; (2) defendants and appellants alike were deprived by the regulations of the Army from defending the indictments, and because of the detention of defendants in the Army the court had no jurisdiction over the defendants or appellants; (3) under the act of Congress, known as the "Soldiers' and Sailors' Civil Relief Act" (Act Cong. March 8, 1918, chap. 20, 40 Stat. at L. 440, Comp. Stat., §§ 3078½a-3078½ss, Fed. Stat. Anno. Supp. 1918, pp. 812-825), the court was without jurisdiction to proceed or to enter judgment on the obligations of appellants, and they asked that the order forfeiting the bonds be set aside and held for naught.

The allegations of the answers were controverted by a reply. On the motion to set aside the order forfeiting the bonds the appellants introduced no proof, but the testimony on behalf of appellee may be summed up as follows: The defendants were eligible for service under the Selective Service Act. They registered June 5, 1917. Later their questionnaires were properly executed. They were classified and placed in class A1. It is provided in rule 13 of the Selective Service Regulations that "any registrant . . . at large on bail under criminal process shall first be classified and recorded as any other registrant; but, pending his discharge from confinement, or the final disposition of his case, he shall be treated as standing at the bottom of class IV. and so recorded by entering in red ink next to and in the same column with his name on the classification list (form 1,000) the figure IV."

The county attorney was insisting before the local board that this rule should be followed in the case of the two defendants, while counsel for the defendants was claiming they should be left in class A1, and taken in the order of their call. Being in doubt as to the proper procedure in the matter, members of the local board of Nelson county communicated with the chief of selective service for Kentucky, at Frankfort, informing him of the nature of the charge against defendants, and the board was advised to leave them out of the regular call. After these instructions were received by the local board, attorneys representing defendants went to Frankfort, and following said visit, and within about two days after receiving orders to leave the defendants out of the call, the local board received instructions rescinding the former order, and were told to take the defendants in the order of call in class A1. They were so placed, and on May 25, 1918, were inducted into the military service of the United States government and stationed at Camp Zachary Taylor, Kentucky.

Before their induction, the local board received a request by telephone from a naval recruiting office in Louisville to release the defendants from the order of their call, so that they could be enlisted in the Navy, and, after insistence upon the part of this recruiting office, a consultation was held among the members of the local board, and the recruiting office having been advised of the status of the defendants and of the charge against them, the request for their release was withdrawn.

About two weeks before June 5, 1918, the day of trial, appellants called upon the circuit judge at Munfordsville in behalf of the defendants, and he referred them to the commonwealth's attorney at Glasgow. Appellants told the commonwealth's attorney they wanted to get the defendants in the Army, and that they could get them in if he, the commonwealth's attorney, would be willing to grant a continuance of their cases at the next term. They were advised this could not be done, and, if the witnesses for the prosecution were present, the commonwealth would insist upon a trial. When the commonwealth's attorney reached Bardstown to attend the June term of court, he was advised by the county attorney that the defendants had been inducted into the military service of the government. Thereupon he immediately communicated with the officer at Camp Zachary Taylor in charge of defendants, informing him of the trial, and requested said officer to issue passes or grant furloughs to the defendants to enable them to attend the trial. This the officer promised to do. About 8 o'clock on the morning of the trial the commonwealth's attorney received a telephone message from one of the officers at the camp in charge of the defendants, that in compliance with his request he had tendered a pass to one of the defendants, and he would not accept it, and said he did not want to come to Bardstown to stand trial.

The captain commanding the company to which the defendants had been assigned, the adjutant of the battalion, and the sergeant major testify that a request was received from the commonwealth's attorney for a leave of absence for the defendants, and that the officer having authority to issue passes immediately made a search for the defendants. He located the defendant Bodine, told him they wanted him to attend trial at Bardstown the next day, and offered him a pass for himself and for the defendant Briggs. Bodine declined to receive a pass; said he did not want it, and that he could answer the same for Briggs. Under the regulations of the Army passes can be granted by the company officers for any period under nine days, and at the expiration of this limit they have authority to extend the time not exceeding an additional nine days. A furlough which is for a period of ten days or over can be granted only by higher authorities. It is also in evidence that the morning train leaving Louisville reaches Bardstown about 10:30, which would have been in time for the trial, and Bardstown is about 40 miles from Camp Zachary Taylor.

Had defendants been placed at the bottom of class IV. as provided in rule 13, they would never have been called into the service.

As to the release of bail: In this state, where the principal is actually confined in an insane asylum, being thus in the custody of the state, and beyond the power of the sureties to produce him, the latter is discharged. Wood v. Com. 17 Ky. L. Rep. 1076, 33 S. W. 729. Likewise where the principal has been adjudged to be of unsound mind. Com. v. Fleming, 15 Ky. L. Rep. 491.

But where the principal, though insane, has not been so adjudged, the bail is liable if he permits the accused to escape beyond the jurisdiction, and, the court being in law the custodian of the principal, his surety must produce him either for trial or for surrender as provided by statute. Com. v. Allen, 157 Ky. 6, 50 L.R.A.(N.S.) 252, 162 S. W. 116.

The arrest and confinement of the principal for crime in another state does not relieve the bail. Withrow v. Com. 1 Bush, 17; Yarbrough v. Com. 89 Ky. 151, 25 Am. St. Rep. 524, 12 S. W. 143; Hall v. Com. 20 Ky. L. Rep. 99, 45 S. W. 458.

Where the commonwealth has taken the principal into its custody for another offense, and thereby prevents his appearance and discharge of the recognizance, it presents a good defense for the sureties when proceeded against for forfeiture. Alquire v. Com. 3 B. Mon. 349; Kirby v. Com. 1 Bush, 113. And, overruling Com. v. House, 13 Bush, 680, the court, in Com. v. Overby, 80 Ky. 208, 44 Am. Rep. 471, held that where accused had been convicted by the Federal court for the same offense charged against him in the state court, the effect was the same as if his non-presence was caused by the commonwealth; for the authority of neither can be resisted by the bail or by the defendant, and in both cases, the bail being deprived of the aid and protection of the commonwealth, to which under the contract he is entitled, he was released.

Where the principal was arrested and removed from the county by order of an official of the United States government, and the surety thereby deprived of the power to surrender him, he cannot be made responsible on the bail bond for the failure of the principal to appear in answer to the charge. Com. v. Webster, 1 Bush, 616.

And, if the principal on the day fixed for his appearance was a soldier in the Federal Army, at a remote distance from the court, and was refused a furlough, which he solicited, to enable him to attend in the discharge of his recognizance this was held a good defense; it being alleged that he would have been in court had the furlough not been denied him, and his attendance was prevented without fault on his part and against his will. Com. v. Terry, 2 Duv. 383.

That the cognizor was an infant under the control of his mother, who removed him out of the state, and thus prevented his surrender, is insufficient to discharge the bail. Starr v. Com. 7 Dana, 243.

Death of the principal will relieve the bail. But in Bonner v. Com. 27 Ky. L. Rep. 652, 85 S. W. 1196, where accused was con-financed in a hospital with a serious illness, physically incapacitating him from appearing on the day the indictment was returned, the bail was not released. However, in Hargis v. Begley, 129 Ky. 477, 23 L.R.A. (N.S.) 136, 112 S. W. 602, it is held that where defendants were prevented from appearing in answer to their recognizance, not on account of any wrongful act or dereliction on their part, but on account of unavoidable accident or sickness, over which they had no control, they were entitled to a new trial under § 518 of the Civil Code.

In Com. v. Rowland, 4 Met. (Ky.) 225, an allegation that at the time stipulated in the bond for the appearance of the accused he was held and retained by authority of the government of the United States as a prisoner in another state, and therefore unable to appear and answer said charge in compliance with the term of his bond, was held insufficient.

The question for our decision might thus be stated: Where a person indicted for a felony has been inducted into the military service of the United States government, either voluntarily or by draft under the Selective Service Act, where the defendant and his surety were instrumental in securing his induction, and at the time of trial is stationed at a camp within 40 miles of the place of trial,—a 2-hours' ride by rail,—and upon application to the proper officer, by the accused or his bail, a pass or furlough would be granted to enable defendant to attend court, but such request is not made, should the bond for his appearance be forfeited?

We answer in the affirmative. There is not the least doubt that both defendants could have attended court June 5, 1918, had they so desired. The undertaking of the bond is that accused shall be in court on the day fixed to answer the charge against him, and shall at all times render himself amenable to the orders and process of the court. Failing so to do, the amount of the bond shall be paid to the commonwealth. Crim. Code, § 82.

Not the slightest attempt was made to comply with this obligation, hand was not turned, nor the scratch of a pen, in an effort to have the defendants in court. Appellants had been warned that a continuance would not be granted, and had any portion of the diligence exercised in the endeavor to get defendants in the Army been directed toward the obtention of a brief leave of absence, the forfeiture could have been prevented.

Those who gave up their positions, left home and loved ones, and entered the Army or Navy, and unselfishly offered their lives, if need be, to protect and defend those rights and privileges for which our forefathers fought, are deserving of our highest praise and commendation,—real patriots these. But, obedience being one of the chief characteristics of a true soldier, it seems that a sense of honor and duty would have constrained defendants to have done everything in their power to have been on hand when their cases were called.

As to Bodine, he was offered a pass, but declined it. Briggs's status is not far different. He could have received the pass had he requested it. This he neglected to do.

A good statement of the law on the subject is found in Vincent v. Com. 1 Ky. Ops. 452, wherein it is said: "Construed fairly, the answer prima facie imparts that the principal in the recognizance was not delinquent at the term at which he was recognized to appear, but during that term was forced by military power, against his will, from Kentucky into the Confederate lines, and in like manner was prevented from appearing or being surrendered by the appellant as his bail before the adjudged forfeiture. And, thus interpreted, the answer presents a good defense to scire facias, and the circuit court erred in sustaining the demurrer and adjudg-ing the penalty against the appellant."

Measured by this rule, and one that accords with the weight of authority, we do not think appellants have shown themselves entitled to the relief sought.

It is earnestly insisted the court erred in refusing to allow appellants the benefit of the Federal statute known as the Soldiers' and Sailors' Civil Relief Act. 40 Stat. at L. 440, chap. 20, Comp. Stat. §§ 3078½a-3078½ss, Fed. Stat. Anno. Supp. 1918, pp. 812-825. As stated in the act itself, it is intended as a protection for those in the military service of the United States in order to prevent prejudices or injury to their civil rights. No civil rights of the defendants are involved here, but, even so, Congress could hardly have intended to extend protection in a case presenting facts such as this, where the parties affected could have prevented the default had they made any effort so to do.

By § 3078½b of said act, the entry or enforcement of any order, writ, judgment, or decree or the stay, suspension, or postponement of any suit or proceeding, may, in the discretion of the court, likewise be granted to sureties, guarantors, and indorsers. We do not think the lower court abused its discretion in refusing to stay the proceedings in the case at bar.

This conclusion renders unnecessary a decision as to the liability of defendants to reimburse appellants for any sum the latter may be required to pay because of the nonappearance of accused. There is much conflict of authority as to the right of bail in criminal cases to recover reimbursement.

In 82 Cyc. 257, note 90, it is stated that the better opinion is against the right to recover. We find countervailing opinions by United States Supreme Court, able dissenting opinions in many cases, and the text-writers are not in accord. See United States v. Ryder, 110 U. S. 729, 28 L. ed. 308, 4 Sup. Ct. Rep. 196; Leary v. United States, 224 U.

S. 567, 56 L. ed. 880, 32 Sup. Ct. Rep. 599, Ann. Cas. 1913D, 1029; Ratcliffe v. Smith, 13 Bush, 172; Ellis v. Norman, 19 Ky. L. Rep. 1798, 44 S. W. 429; Carr v. Davis, 64 W. Va. 522, 20 L.R.A. (N.S.) 58, 63 S. E. 826, 16 Ann. Cas. 1031; Littleton v. State, 46 Ark. 413; Jackson v. Davis, 4 Mackey, 202; Belond v. Guy, 20 Wash. 161, 54 Pac. 995; 3 R. C. L. p. 60, § 73; United States v. Simmons (C. C.) 14 L.R.A. 78, 47 Fed. 575, id. 47 Fed. 723; Highmore, Bail, 204.

We find no case holding that the nonappearance of the accused, due merely to the fact that he was in the military service, releases the surety, where it was within the power of the defendant and his sureties to have the former present at the trial of the indictment; but no attempt was made by either to have the accused on hand.

A splendid statement of the rule governing the case at bar is found in 8 R. C. L. § 65, under the head of Bail, which is as follows: "The imprisonment of a citizen by legitimate orders of a military commander has the same force and effect as if he were confined upon a proper warrant from a civil tribunal. And therefore, if the principal in a bail bond is arrested and imprisoned by military or naval authorities, and the sureties are prevented thereby from procuring his appearance at the trial, they will be excused from complying with the conditions of the bond; and the enforced military or naval service of the principal will be a sufficient excuse for his nonappearance in accordance with his recognizance. Where the principal is at the time of the execution of his bail enlisted in the Federal Army and is refused a furlough which he asks for in order to be present at his trial, the bail are exonerated. There is some difference of opinion as to whether the voluntary enlistment of a principal in the Army or Navy after the entry of bail, whereby it is made impossible for him to appear in accordance with the condition of the recognizance, will relieve the sureties from their obligation. It is held in some of the cases that, where the principal enlists without the knowledge or consent of his sureties, their consequent inability to retake him into custody is ground either for their release or at least for a continuance where it is shown that they were reasonably diligent in their endeavor to secure the appearance of the principal. The better authorities hold, however, that voluntary enlistment, being the act of the obligor, cannot release either him or his sureties from his obligations. The reason for not exonerating the bail will be still stronger if the enlistment was with the advice and consent of the surety, and where this is the case it seems that the detention of the principal is not a good defense even in those jurisdictions where the decisions have treated the sureties most leniently. In every case where such a defense is advanced, it should be shown that proper effort has been made to secure the person of the principal from the military authorities. The fact that the principal has been captured by foreign soldiers and detained in another country may be advanced as a defense by his sureties, and, if the taking is not connived at by the principal, will relieve against a forfeiture for his failure to appear at the time specified."

To the same effect is 6 C. J. p. 1028; note in 6 Ann. Cas. 616. The text found in these books finds support in the following cases: People v. Cushney, 44 Barb. 118; Belding v. State, 25 Ark. 318; Lamphire v. State, 73 N. H. 463, 62 Atl. 786, 6 Ann. Cas. 615; Winniger v. State, 23 Ind. 228; People v. Cook, 30 How. Pr. 110; State v. Scott, 20 Iowa, 63; Way v. Wright, 5 Met. 380; Gingrich v. People, 34 Ill. 448.

It is further urged by counsel for appellant that the judgment, findings, and determination of the local board under the Selective Service Act in placing defendants in class A1 are conclusive, and a number of Federal cases are cited in support of this proposition. We have examined all these cases, and others, and find that in almost every one of them the real question involved was as to whether the Selective Draft Act applied to the person involved; most of them growing out of petitions for writs of habeas corpus. The courts held that the decisions of the draft boards are final where the board has proceeded in due form and the party involved was given a fair opportunity to be heard and present his evidence. See Angelus v. Sullivan, 158 C. C. A. 280, 246 Fed. 54; United States ex rel. Bartalini v. Mitchell (D. C.) 248 Fed. 997; United States ex rel. Brown v. Commanding Officer (D. C.) 248 Fed. 1005; Ex parte Platt (D. C.) 253 Fed. 413; Brown v. Spelman (D. C.) 254 Fed. 215; Ex parte Tinkoff (D. C.) 254 Fed. 222.

Ex parte King (D. C.) 246 Fed. 868, relied upon by appellant, was a case of a soldier who, after the declaration of war, killed a policeman in Newport, Kentucky, while in the performance of his duty as a soldier, and the court held that the military authorities had superior jurisdiction of the offense, and the jailer was directed to deliver the prisoner to the military authorities.

There is nothing in the present suit that brings in question any judgment, proceedings, or determination of the local or district draft board. Whether the board should have followed rule 13 of the Selective Service Regulations in the placement of the defendants is not involved here.

In the Bodine case the bond was executed before the police court of Bardstown, and it is pointed out by counsel that the bond was never certified to the circuit court or filed in the case. It is apparent, however, the parties throughout the trial of the cases treated the bond as having been properly filed; indeed, the suretyship of appellants is admitted in the answer, in which no irregularity as to the filing is pleaded. In appellants' brief we find reference to the fact that the bond was put in evidence. The bill of exceptions shows it was filed in the circuit court, though appellants objected to incorporating the same therein.

There is a discrepancy in the amount of the bond, as stated in the summons, but this is not material, and appellants were in no wise prejudiced thereby. Appellants are not entitled to a reversal on this ground.

The uncontradicted evidence shows that after the induction of the defendants into the military service they were so situated, both as to time and distance, that they could have been present at the calling of the indictment against them on June 5, 1918. Passes or furloughs would have been given upon request of either of accused or sureties. As to one of the accused a pass was actually offered, and when the defendants and the appellants failed and neglected to comply with the obligations of the bond, it was proper for the lower court to order a forfeiture thereof.

Finding no error in the judgment appealed from, same is accordingly affirmed.

Petition for rehearing denied October 31, 1919.

ANNOTATION.

Induction of principal into military or naval service as exonerating his bail for his nonappearance.

Voluntary enlistment.

In several cases it has been held that a voluntary enlistment in the military or naval service by the principal in a bail bond does not exonerate the sureties, though it is thereby rendered impossible for them to produce him. State use of Elder v. Reaney (1858) 13 Md. 230; Sayward v. Conant (1814) 11 Mass. 146; Harrington v. Dennie (1816) 13 Mass. 93; Lamphire v. State (1906) 73 N. H. 463, 62 Atl. 786, 6 Ann. Cas. 615. See also State v. Scott (1865) 20 Iowa, 63.

In Sayward v. Conant (1814) 11 Mass. 146, supra, it was held that the voluntary enlistment of the principal was no defense to a scire facias against bail. That decision was followed in State use of Elder v. Reaney (Md.) supra, and Harrington v. Dennie (1816) 13 Mass. 93, supra, the court saying in the case last cited: "The bail bond constitutes a contract, the essence of which is that the principal shall be brought into court, that he may be taken in execution, or that he shall be otherwise found within the precinct of the sheriff; and the legal penalty for the breach of this contract is a satisfaction of the judgment by the bail themselves. To admit that a principal, by a voluntary assumption of a duty or office which may exempt him from arrest, may defeat this contract, or enable his surety to do it, without the consent of the party interested, would be to violate the common principles of justice, as well as the faith of engagements."

In Lamphire v. State (1906) 73 N. H. 463, 62 Atl. 786, 6 Ann. Cas. 615, it was held that the enlistment of the principal in the United States Navy, whereby the sureties were prevented from surrendering him, was not ground for discharging the sureties, under a statute providing as follows: "When the sureties in a recognizance, without their fault, are prevented from surrendering their principal by the act of God, or of the government of the state or of the United States, or by sentence of law, the supreme court, on petition and notice thereof to the county commissioners and state's counsel, may discharge them on such terms as may be deemed just."

In State v. Scott (Iowa) supra, it appeared that the principal in a bail bond voluntarily enlisted in the Army. After a forfeiture the surety sought to arrest the principal, but was prevented by the military authorities from surrendering him. The court said that if the surety had arrested the principal before forfeiture and had been prevented from surrendering him, it might perhaps have been a defense, but with respect to an arrest after forfeiture said: "Inasmuch, therefore, as the surety after forfeiture cannot, as a matter of right, be discharged on surrendering the principal, it logically and necessarily follows that the mere fact that he was prevented, by whatever cause, from making such surrender, will not exonerate him."

In other jurisdictions it is held that the voluntary enlistment of the principal is a defense, provided it is shown that by reason thereof it is impossible for him to appear or for the surety to produce him. Com. v. Terry (1866) 2 Duv. (Ky.) 383; People v. Cushney (1865) 44 Barb. (N. Y.) 118; McFarland v. Wilbur (1862) 35 Vt. 342.

In Com. v. Terry (Ky.) supra, it was said: "To a scire facias on a forfeited recognizance for the appearance of Willis Field to answer an indictment against him, the appellees, proceeded against as his sureties, answered that, on the day fixed for his appearance, he, being a soldier in the Federal Army, at a remote distance from the court, was refused a furlough, which he solicited, to enable him to attend in discharge of his recognizance, which he would have done had he not been thus prevented without his fault and against his will. This, if true, was a sufficient defense."

So, in People v. Cushing (1865) 44 Barb. (N. Y.) 118, it appeared that the principal had enlisted in the United States Army. At the time fixed for his appearance he applied to his commanding officer for a leave of absence and was refused. It was held that a demurrer to a plea by the sureties setting up these facts was improperly sustained, the court saying that the performance of the obligation of the recognizance was prevented by an act of the law.

In McFarland v. Wilbur (1862) 35 Vt. 342, the enlistment of the principal in the Army was held to constitute a good defense to scire facias against the sureties, the court saying: "It is worthy of notice that the act of the extra session, under which the arrest and imprisonment of volunteers in the militia in the United States service, on civil process, was prohibited, was passed after the bail contract was entered into by the defendants, and before the plaintiff obtained his judgment, and issued his execution. In this respect the case differs from those in Massachusetts. If this makes no real difference between them, we think those cases are not supported by sound principle, and we cannot follow them. It seems to us that the whole question hinges upon this: If the defendants had surrendered their principal, could the plaintiff legally have held his body till he satisfied his debt, or would he have been entitled to an immediate discharge, so that such surrender would have been wholly unavailing to the creditor? As before stated, the plaintiff does not claim he could legally have held the body of the principal, if surrendered to be taken in execution by him, and any other construction would render the act of the legislature a mere nullity."

The bare fact of enlistment is not enough to discharge the surety. It must appear that it is impossible for the principal to appear. Winninger v. State (1864) 23 Ind. 228. And see the reported case (BRIGGS v. COM. ante, 363).

In Winninger v. State (Ind.) supra, the court said: "To a complaint upon a forfeited recognizance taken in a criminal case, alleging for breach the failure of the principal to appear according to the terms of the condition, an answer was filed by the surety, alleging that, after the recognizance was forfeited, and before the commencement of the suit, the principal enlisted as a volunteer in the Army; wherefore the surety could not surrender him. This is no defense. For aught that appears, the principal enlisted by the surety's advice; nor do we know that the military authorities would not at any time surrender him to the surety on application."

In the reported case (BRIGGS v. COM.) the fact that the principal could have obtained a furlough in order to appear at the time fixed by his recognition, and failed to request it, is held to prevent a discharge of the sureties.

In one case the absence of the principal in the military service under a voluntary enlistment was held to be ground for a continuance of proceedings against the sureties. Gingrich v. People (1864) 34 Ill. 448, wherein it was said: "Under the peculiar circumstances of this case and the conditions of the country, the cause should have been continued on the affidavits on behalf of the defendants. It seems from them, they did all that could be expected of them, to take and surrender the principal to answer the indictment. He had enlisted in the Army without the knowledge or consent of his sureties, and they had used reasonable diligence to arrest and surrender him. They seem to have acted in good faith in their efforts to take him. We are inclined to think the fifth and sixth pleas presented no good defense, but show ground for a continuance merely. Under such facts it would be unjust to condemn the defendants without giving them the fullest time to produce their principal."

Involuntary induction into service.

The involuntary induction of the principal in a bail bond into military or naval service exonerates the surety, this being a contingency which could not be prevented or provided against. In Robertson v. Patterson (1806) 7 East, 405, 103 Eng. Reprint, 157, 3 Smith, 556, there was an application to have an "exoneration" entered as to the defendant's bail, because after arrest and giving bail, and before the bail was fixed, the defendant was forced into service as a seaman. The court held that, since the surrender of the principal would be of no avail to the plaintiff, as he would be entitled to an immediate discharge if surrendered, the surety was exonerated. Since the principal's induction into service was not a voluntary act on his part, but was an act of law which could not be prevented, the sureties cannot be held liable, for nothing in their power could have prevented his entrance into service. v.

GLOBE & RUTGERS FIRE INSURANCE COMPANY.

(— W. Va. —, 101 S. E. 247.)

Insurance — vacancy of premises — effect.

1. A covenant or stipulation in a policy of fire insurance that the entire policy shall be void in case the premises shall become vacant, and so remain longer than a certain period of time, is a reasonable and valid provision, and in case such insured premises are destroyed by fire while vacant, after having so remained for a longer time than allowed by the terms of the policy, the insured, in the absence of a waiver of such condition, will not be entitled to recover the indemnity provided in the policy.

— waiver by insurer.

2. The waiver by the insurer of one of the conditions or warranties in a policy of insurance is not evidence that another condition or warranty therein contained is also waived. Ordinarily a condition, stipulation, or warranty contained in a policy of in-insurance applicable to the subject-matter can only be waived in the manner provided in the policy, or by some act or conduct upon the part of the insurer, after being informed of the facts constituting a breach of the warranty or stipulation, from which it may reasonably be inferred that such insurer intends the policy to remain in force notwithstanding such breach.

— indorsement as to interest — effect on vacancy.

3. Where a policy of fire insurance provides that the entire policy shall be void, unless otherwise provided by indorsement thereon or attached thereto, if the interest of the insured shall be other than that of unconditional sole ownership, or if the property shall become vacant and unoccupied, and so remain for a period longer than ten days, an indorsement attached to said policy, stating that the interest of the insured is that of fee simple in remainder, after a certain life estate therein mentioned, will not make inapplicable or waive the condition or warranty rendering the policy void in case the premises are vacant at the time of the fire, and had been so vacant for a longer period than that provided in the policy.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Mingo County to review a judgment in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover the amount alleged to be due on a fire insurance policy. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Wade H. Bronson and Wiles & Bias, for plaintiff in error:

The effect of the written rider showing the interest of plaintiff to be that of remainderman in fee was, in effect, a waiver of the printed vacancy provision, showed that the insurer knew plaintiff was not and could not be in possession, but that the life tenant was in possession, and therefore the insured is entitled to recover.

Ritz, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

On August 26, 1916, the defendant issued to the plaintiff a policy of fire insurance covering for one year a house in the city of Williamson, West Virginia; and providing for indemnity in the sum of $1,500. The policy was issued on what is known as the New York standard form, and provides that the same shall be void, unless otherwise provided by agreement indorsed thereon or attached thereto, if the interest of the insured be other than unconditional sole ownership, and further, that the said policy shall be void if the building described becomes vacant or unoccupied, and so remains for ten days. There are many other stipulations, conditions, and warranties contained in the policy, but these are the ones that are particularly involved in this litigation. The plaintiff owned the remainder in the property after the life estate of Sylvania Wolford, and for the purpose of showing his real interest in it an indorsement was attached to the policy as follows: "This policy covers the fee-simple interest of B. R. Bias, trustee, in the remainder of the property insured after the life estate of Sylvania Wolford in house and improvements on lot 7, block 13, Williamson, West Virginia."

At the time the policy was issued, and at the time of the fire, the life tenant was living. The house was destroyed by fire on the 19th of May, 1917. It had been vacant and unoccupied from the 23d of April preceding. It is agreed that neither the insured nor the insurer knew that the premises were vacant during this period. Because of the fact that the house was vacant and unoccupied at the time of the fire, and had been so vacant and unoccupied for more than ten days, the insured refused to pay the indemnity provided in the policy, and this suit was brought for the purpose of recovering the same.

It is very uniformly held that a condition or stipulation in a policy of fire insurance, providing that the same shall be rendered void if the premises insured shall remain vacant and unoccupied for a specific length of time, is a reasonable and binding condition, and should such premises be destroyed by fire while vacant and unoccupied, and after the same had so remained for a longer time than that provided in the policy, the insurer will be discharged from paying the indemnity therein provided. Joyce, Ins. § 2229; 2 Cooley, Briefs on Ins. pp. 1652 et seq.; 19 Cyc. 726; 14 R. C. L. title "Insurance," §§ 281 et seq. Indeed, it is not contended by the insured that this stipulation is not a reasonable and binding one, but he insists that when the company placed the indorsement thereon, showing that he was the owner of the remainder after the life estate of Sylvania Wolford, it thereby had information that he was not entitled to the possession of the property, and could not control the same, and, having this information, it waived the condition in the policy requiring the premises to be occupied. His contention is that when the insurer wrote the policy, with the knowledge that he was a remainderman, and did not have the right to the possession of the property, it thereby waived the performance upon his part of all promissory warranties, which could only be performed by one having the possession, or the right to the possession, and because of the fact that only one having the possession, or the right to the possession, could control the occupancy of the premises, this condition avoiding the policy in case the same became vacant and unoccupied did not apply to the estate covered by this policy of insurance.

Counsel in argument admit that they can find no authority on either side of this proposition, and after a careful search we are likewise unable to find any case directly in point, or even any authority from which a reasonable analogy can be drawn. There are many cases which hold that, where one insures his property and assigns the policy to a mortgagee, the mortgagee will not be permitted to collect the indemnity provided in the policy, unless the owner could have collected it in case there had been no assignment; but these cases furnish no authority for the proposition here, for the reason that the estate insured in that class of cases is that of the owner, and the mortgagee is simply the party appointed to receive the money in case of loss. There is another class of cases which arises under what is known as the "union mortgage clause." This clause provides that the mortgagee, to whom the policy is assigned, is not to be affected by the defaults of any other party, and under such a provision it has been very uniformly held that the mortgagee could collect the insurance in a case in which the insured would be barred because of the breach of some condition on his part; but this right to recover is based upon the fact that by agreeing to that stipulation the insurer makes a new contract with the mortgagee, agreeing with him to pay the indemnity, even though the insured should be guilty of a breach of some of the conditions of the policy, and the right to recover in these cases is based upon this special agreement. It has also been held that, where a mortgagee insures his own interest in real estate as such, he may recover upon the policy of insurance, notwithstanding the property may have been treated in such manner by the owner as to avoid the insurance if it had been procured by him. For instance, it is held that, where a mortgagee insures his interest in real estate, the policy will not be avoided because the owner of the equity of redemption sells or encumbers his interest; but this throws no light upon the question we have here, for the reason that the covenant in the policy is not against alienation of any interest except that which is insured, and so long as the interest insured is not alienated or encumbered that condition of the policy is not broken.

Can it be said that by placing the indorsement upon the policy above referred to the insurer in this case waived the condition in the policy relied upon to defeat recovery, or made that condition inapplicable to the estate insured? It must be borne in mind that there are many conditions and promissory warranties contained in this policy, and if it should be held that by indorsing the policy, so as to show the real interest of the insured, the company thereby made inapplicable to the estate insured the condition avoiding it in case of vacancy, it would also make inapplicable the covenants and conditions in regard to the use of the premises for various purposes, such as having inflammables stored therein, or being occupied by certain kinds of businesses, or covenants in regard to other conditions which are required to be kept, looking to greater safety from destruction by fire. None of these covenants would be applicable, if the plaintiff's contention is correct. It cannot be contended that the indorsement expressly waives the performance of any of these conditions. In construing this indorsement we must bear in mind that there is a condition in the policy rendering it absolutely null and void if the interest of the insured is other than unconditional sole ownership, so that without this indorsement upon the policy it would have been void from the beginning. The insurance company was willing to accept the risk even though the interest of the insured was only a remainder; but can it be said that the obligation was not upon the insured to perform and keep all of the other covenants contained in the contract? The policy contemplates that all of these conditions and stipulations shall be applicable unless otherwise provided by an indorsement attached to the policy, and it seems to us that it would be straining construction past the breaking point to say that by the insurer thereby waived every other one in any wise connected with the one waived by the indorsement.

—waiver by insurer.

It is true the insured did not have the possession or the right to the possession of the premises, but that does not make the covenant inapplicable. It simply made the right of the insured to recover depend upon what a third party might do with his property, and there is no reason why a contract depending for its validity upon such a contingency should not be held as binding as any other. The insured may not have as absolute protection as though he were in possession of the premises himself, but he is offered the protection provided by the policy so long as the premises are used and occupied in the manner that such property is ordinarily used by the owners thereof. It is not very different from the case in which the insured has the premises leased, and some of his tenants, without his knowledge and against his commands, violate some of the promissory warranties contained in the policy of insurance. It is uniformly held in such cases that the insured cannot recover, even when such violations are entirely unknown to him. 19 Cyc. 727 and authorities there cited. As we said in the case of Bond v. National F. Ins. Co. 77 W. Va. 736-750, 88 S. E. 389, the fact that the insurer waived one condition or stipulation in the policy of insurance does not necessarily mean that he waived another. The company may be entirely willing that one covenant or warranty shall not be applicable as between it and the insured; but it does not, by waiving the performance of that condition or covenant upon the part of the insured, make inapplicable any other covenant or condition contained in the policy which would, in the absence of such waiver, apply to the subject-matter of the insurance.

—indorsement as to interest—effect on vacancy.

We are of opinion that the findings of the court below in favor of the defendant are correct, and the judgment rendered upon such findings will be affirmed.

NOTE.

The reported case (BIAS v. GLOBE & R. F. INS. CO. ante, 373) seems to be a case of first impression as to liability of an insurance company under a policy issued to a remainderman, for loss to property which had been vacant for a longer period than that provided for in the policy.

SOVEREIGN CAMP, WOODMEN OF THE WORLD.

Wisconsin Supreme Court — December 9, 1915.

(162 Wis. 116, 155 N. W. 928.)

Insurance — automatic suspension for nonpayment of assessments.

1. Under a provision of a mutual benefit certificate that suspension of a member for nonpayment of assessments occurs on the first day of the month following default in such payment, no recovery can be had on a certificate where the death of the member occurs while default continues beyond the first of the month following that in which the assessment became due.

— mutual benefit — provision against effect of knowledge of collector.

2. A mutual benefit society may provide that notice to the clerk of a local camp of matters not necessarily involved in or part of his duty of collection and remittance of assessments will not be notice to the supreme lodge.

— provisions for insurance for term.

3. A mutual benefit society may provide for a benefit covering only such period as is covered by each successive payment of assessments, and terminating at the end of such period, to be revived for a like period by a new payment or reinstatement of the member.

— duty to continue advancement.

4. The secretary of a local camp of a mutual benefit society does not, by advancing assessments for a member, become bound to continue making such advancements.

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Sauk County (O'Neill, J.) in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover the amount alleged to be due on a benefit certificate. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Bentley, Kelley, & Hill for appellant.

Messrs. V. H. Cady and Grotphorst, Evans, & Thomas for respondent.

Timlin, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This action is by the beneficiary named in a death benefit certificate issued by a Nebraska corporation called "Sovereign Camp of the Woodmen of the World." The defendant is organized on the plan of having one principal or head lodge or camp with numerous local or subordinate camps, to each of which it issues what is called a charter. In the certificate and in the by-laws each member is called a sovereign, and he is also entitled, in case he has complied with all the conditions of the beneficiary certificate and by-laws, to a death benefit ranging from $1,000 to $3,000. The certificate in this case was dated August 26, 1911, and the husband of the plaintiff, "Sovereign Harry C. Haycock," died September 21, 1912. Local lodges or camps apparently attend to the business of collecting and remitting assessments to the defendant, and also securing members, largely through their social and fraternal features. Assessments are made monthly. Among the by-laws is one which provides that the suspension of a member for nonpayment of assessments occurs on the first day of the month following default. No notice of assessment is given by the principal lodge to the member, and the local camps have no power of suspension of members. The mere failure to pay an assessment ipso facto causes suspension, and thereupon the certificate becomes void until the member is reinstated. A suspended member may, if he is in good health, be reinstated on payment within ten days. After that time, only on certain proof being made, etc. The by-laws also provide that no officer or employee or agent of the sovereign camp, nor of any camp, has the power, right, or authority to waive any of the conditions upon which the beneficiary certificates are issued, or to change, vary, or waive any of the provisions of the constitution or by-laws. "The clerk of a camp shall not, by acts, representations, waivers, or by vote of his camp, have any power or authority not delegated to him or to the camp by the constitution and laws of the order to bind the sovereign camp or his camp." The organization is quite similar to that noticed in Jones v. Modern Brotherhood, 153 Wis. 223, 140 N. W. 1059; Knoebel v. North American Acci. Ins. Co. 135 Wis. 424, 20 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1037, 115 N. W. 1094. The controversy here must be disposed of under the rules of law established by these cases and other complementary cases. We find no statute of this state, and we are cited to none, prohibiting the enactment of such laws or the making of such a contract by fraternal or mutual benefit corporations.

Deceased defaulted nearly every month from the date of the certificate, but payments were for a time advanced for him by the clerk of the local camp, whom he repaid. Assessment No. 260 for May, 1912, was unpaid, and the local clerk advanced this for deceased. Deceased also defaulted on the June assessment, No. 261, and this was not advanced. On July 12, 1912, deceased was, by the local clerk, reported for suspension on this last default. Two days after, the local clerk collected from deceased the amount of assessments Nos. 260 and 261, including the latter by mistake. The secretary thought he had, since last payment by assured, advanced two assessments for deceased, but he had in fact advanced only the May assessment, No. 260. The secretary did not remit to the chief lodge assessment No. 261, nor report any payment, nor report deceased for reinstatement. But deceased also defaulted in July and August, and made no attempt to pay, and no inquiry concerning his membership after July 14, 1912.

We need not in this case decide how far the defendant might go in authorizing the local clerk to collect from members, and at the same time limit the scope of his agency so that in making and remitting such collection he did not act as agent of the defendant. In the state of defendant's domicile (Henton v. Sovereign Camp, W. W. 87 Neb. 552, 138 Am. St. Rep. 500, 127 N. W. 869) and elsewhere (Murphy v. Independent Order, S. D. J. A. 77 Miss. 830, 50 L.R.A. 111, 27 So. 624; Modern Woodmen v. Tevis, 54 C. C. A. 293, 117 Fed. 369; Knights of Columbus v. Burroughs, 107 Va. 671, 60 S. E. 40, with notes in 17 L.R.A. (N.S.) 246 et seq.) all seem to considerably limit the power. The defendant could at least provide that notice to the local clerk of matters not necessarily involved in, or part of, his duty of collection and remittance, would not be notice to the supreme lodge. Jones v. Modern Brotherhood, 153 Wis. 223, 140 N. W. 1059. It could also provide for a death benefit covering only such period as was covered by each successive payment, and terminating at the end of such period, to be revived for a like period by a new payment and reinstatement of the member. This it seems to have done.

—provisions for insurance for term.

When the local secretary advanced the assessments for deceased he did so as the agent of the deceased. He was not bound to continue making such advances. He failed to advance for June and the plaintiff became suspended —duty to continue advancement.

July. 1st. On July 14th, more than ten days after default, he paid the June assessment to the local secretary, and the latter by mistake failed to bring this to the notice of the defendant. The suspension therefore continued. Had the member paid for July and August the continuation of this suspension might perhaps be challenged; but the ipso facto provisions above alluded to would make default for July and August conclusive, even if the defendant were estopped to take advantage of the June default. This makes it unnecessary to consider rulings on evidence, for the foregoing facts are undisputed.

—automatic suspension for nonpayment of assessments.

Judgment affirmed.

NOTE.

The reported case (HAYCOCK v. SOVEREIGN CAMP, W. W. ante, 378) is illustrative of one of the many forms of provisions suspending insurance during delinquency in payment of premiums or assessments which have been held to be automatic or self-operative. This case, together with others which involve other provisions which have been held of the same effect, is treated in II. a, of the annotation following CONTINENTAL INS. CO. v. STRATTON, post, 398, upon the general question "Provisions suspending insurance during default in payment of premiums or assessments as affected by failure of insured to declare a suspension before loss."

HEAD CAMP, PACIFIC JURISDICTION, WOODMEN OF THE WORLD, Appt.

(— Cal. —, 180 Pac. 2.)

Insurance — acceptance of past-due assessments — effect.

1. Failure of a member of a mutual benefit society to pay his assessments promptly, the consequence of which under the laws of the association is to remove him from good standing, will prevent recovery on his certificate in case of his death, notwithstanding the clerk of the local camp accepted his overdue assessments from time to time, and failed to report him as delinquent, if the clerk had no power to waive the laws of the order.

— mutual benefit — power of local camp officers to waive constitutional provisions.

2. Under provisions of a mutual benefit society making clerks of local camps the agents of such camps and members, and not of the head camp, and declaring that no officer has any power to change, alter, modify, or waive the requirements of the constitution, a local clerk cannot reinstate a delinquent member by receiving payment of his assessment without his complying with the requirements of the constitution as to furnishing a certificate of health.

— reinstatement after suffering broken neck.

3. A delinquent member of a mutual benefit society cannot be reinstated after meeting with an accident which results in a broken neck, which caused his death, if the conditions of the order relating to reinstatement require an express warranty of present sound bodily health.

[See 19 R. C. L. 1244.]

4. Knowledge by the local camp clerk of the condition of a member of a mutual benefit society who applies for reinstatement after suffering a broken neck does not estop the society from contesting liability on his certificate because of falsity of warranty in the required application for reinstatement that he was in sound health, where the local clerk had no power to waive any provision of the laws of the society.

— retention of overdue assessment — effect.

5. The retention by the local camp clerk of money paid to reinstate a member who has suffered a broken neck, until his death, which occurs a few days later, does not estop the society from contesting liability on his certificate because of failure to secure reinstatement, if the local clerk has no authority to waive any provision of the laws of the society, and no knowledge of the attempted reinstatement comes to the officers of the head camp until after the member's death.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Superior Court for Alameda County (Arnot, J.) in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover the amount alleged to be due on a benefit certificate. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Robinson & Robinson & Price, for appellant:

Under the conditions of the benefit certificate and the provisions of the constitution, Valentine stood a suspended and delinquent member,—a member not in good standing by reason of his failure to pay his assessments and dues and his being reported as delinquent to the head camp.

Butler v. Grand Lodge, A. O. U. W. 146 Cal. 172, 79 Pac. 861; Marshall v. Grand Lodge, A. O. U. W. 133 Cal. 686, 66 Pac. 25; Carlson v. Supreme Council, A. L. Mr. Valentine and his beneficiary, the plaintiff, in connection with the execution and delivery by the insured of a reinstatement application, were guilty of such a breach of warranty and of such fraud as to prevent a valid reinstatement, and to preclude any recovery.

Mr. J. C. Nichols also for appellant. Messrs. Stanley Moore, George K. Ford, and Wilder Wight for respondent.

Angellotti, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This action was brought by plaintiff to recover upon a fraternal benefit certificate issued by defendant to her husband, Clarence A. Valentine, which provided for payment to her upon his death, if then in good standing, of the sum of $3,000. Judgment was given in favor of the plaintiff by the trial court, and we have here an appeal by defendant from such judgment.

The defendant is a mutual fraternal organization maintained on the lodge plan, purely for the mutual benefit of its members, and, among other things, to provide and maintain, by means of assessments on its members, a benefit fund from which is paid to designated relatives or dependents of each deceased member who is in good standing at the time of his death, such sum, either $1,000, $2,000, or $3,000, as is specified in his benefit certificate. It consists of a national or supreme body known as the head camp, and local organizations or lodges, known as camps. As is usual in this kind of association, the supreme authority of the association is vested in the supreme body, the head camp, which, at its head camp sessions, composed of the officers of the supreme body, delegates from the local camps, and past head consuls, made its laws, elected its officers, etc. The matters of the issuance of benefit certificates, levy of assessments, etc., were in the hands of the head camp; the business relative thereto, being conducted by the officers of the head camp in accord with the provisions of the constitution and by-laws adopted by the head camp sessions. The collection of the assessments was in the hands of the local camps, and particularly of the clerks of the local camps, who received from the members of their respective camps amounts due for assessments and local camp dues, forwarding the former, as collected, to the proper head camp officers, who were required to keep the accounts showing the situation as to each member.

Mr. Valentine became a member of defendant association in the year 1901, his benefit certificate being dated January 16, 1901, and subsequently affiliated with the local camp at Oakland, California, known as "Bay Tree Camp, No. 640." He died on August 22, 1912. The controversy in this case is as to his good standing as a member of defendant association at the time of his death, the terms of his benefit certificate expressly providing, as required by the constitution of the order, that the beneficiary is entitled to "participate in its benefit fund after his death when in good standing, and not otherwise," and that the certificate will not be in force at any time when the member stands suspended and is not in good standing pursuant to the constitution and by-laws "now in force or hereafter regularly adopted and in force at the time of his death." To remain in good standing it was imperatively required by the constitution and by-laws of the order that the member pay to the clerk of his camp every assessment levied and called during the month in which it is payable; failure to do this ipso facto putting the member out of good standing. This requirement, which was one essential to the maintenance of the mutual benefit fund from which assessments were to be paid, was emphasized by repeated provisions in the constitution and by-laws of defendant, as well as in the benefit certificates issued by it. Apparently the only exception provided was one for the benefit of a member who, while in good standing, becomes sick or disabled, and, while still in good standing, properly notified the clerk of the local camp thereof. Such a member may be carried by such local camp for a limited time; the latter remitting to the head camp from the local camp funds the amount of his assessments as the same accrue. This provision, however, has no materiality here. From May, 1911, until two days before his death, Mr. Valentine was continuously delinquent in his payments on account of assessments to the clerk of the local camp, making small payments on account thereof from time to time to the clerk of the local camp to some time in June, 1912. The clerk of the local camp, in violation of the laws of the order, had continued to carry him as in good standing to August 1, 1912, at which time several assessments remained unpaid by him, the amount of all of which, however, except that due for July, 1912, had been advanced for him by the clerk of the local camp, and forwarded by such clerk to the head camp to his credit, with the result that, in so far as the head camp was informed, he was regularly paying his assessments as required by the laws of the order. The amount of the assessment due in July, 1912, was not so advanced by the clerk, nor forwarded to the head camp. On August 14, 1912, such clerk, in his report sent to the head camp, reported Mr. Valentine as delinquent for failure to pay the July assessment. So far as appears in the record, this was the first intimation to the head camp of any delinquency at any time on the part of Mr. Valentine; the reports theretofore received showing him as regularly paying all assessments. On August 17, 1912, while engaged in his trade as a carpenter, he fell from a ladder a distance of about 20 feet. His neck was broken by this fall. The full extent of his injury was not at once known, and, in view of the findings of the trial court, it will be assumed that it was not known until after August 20, 1912. He was taken to a hospital, where he remained until August 22, 1912, when he died as a result of the injury. On August 19, 1912, Mrs. Valentine paid to the clerk of the local camp all amounts accruing for assessments and dues to September 1, 1912, including the July assessment, the total so paid being $23.20. On August 20, 1912, she paid such clerk the further sum of $2.95 as advanced assessment for September, 1912. The law of the order provided that a suspended benefit member could become reinstated within a limited time after his suspension by complying with certain specified conditions, and not otherwise, one of which was the delivery by the member to the clerk of the local camp of an application for reinstatement, certifying, warranting, and representing that he was then "in good, sound bodily health," and another of which was the payment of all arrearages. The benefit certificate in terms provided, as required by the laws of the order, that if any assessment was not paid within the time allowed, "then this certificate shall be null and void and continue so until he is reinstated as required by the head camp constitution and by-laws of his camp." When the payment of August 19th was made by Mrs. Valentine, the clerk of the local camp informed her that a reinstatement application must be signed by Mr. Valentine and delivered to him, and he furnished Mrs. Valentine a form for that purpose, which he himself had filled in with name and date. It was not the form prescribed by the laws of the order, the difference being in the omission of a final paragraph to the effect that the member agreed that the representation of present sound bodily health is a strict warranty, and that, if his death occurred within one year as the result of any disease with which he was then afflicted, no beneficiary shall be entitled to receive benefits. The constitution provided in effect that no reinstatement could be accomplished except by the presentation of an application in the exact form required thereby. Mrs. Valentine procured Mr. Valentine's signature to this application so furnished and delivered it to the clerk the next day. This application, as required by the law of the order, stated: "I, C. A. Valentine, a delinquent and suspended benefit member, hereby request to be reinstated, and offer herewith all arrearages of benefit assessments, equalization payment, and camp dues. I certify, warrant, and represent that I am in sound bodily health. . . ."

When the payments were made and the application for reinstatement was delivered by Mrs. Valentine to the clerk of the local camp, the latter was informed by her of the accident and that Mr. Valentine was seriously injured. The evidence fairly shows that there was then no attempted concealment of any of the facts from the clerk, and that no one then knew that the neck was "broken." But the clerk did know from the information given him that Mr. Valentine was not in "sound bodily health." Unquestionably his sympathies were with Mrs. Valentine in the effort to put Mr. Valentine in good standing. The amounts paid by Mrs. Valentine in August, 1912, were never forwarded to the head camp by the local clerk, but appear to be still in his custody. This was doubtless due to the almost immediate death of Mr. Valentine. His statement that he informally offered to return the money is disputed by Mrs. Valentine. However, he did within a day or two of Mr. Valentine's death advance Mrs. Valentine $50, none of which has been returned. No head camp officer had any notice or knowledge of any attempted reinstatement until after the death of Mr. Valentine. At the time Mr. Valentine became a member of the order the constitution of defendant provided in express terms, as it has ever since, that "camp clerks and bankers are by this constitution expressly made agents of the camp and of the several members thereof, and not agents of the head camp." As amended and revised at the head camp session in 1910, which, it will be observed, was prior to any delinquency on the part of Mr. Valentine, the constitution was made to provide with relation to "every benefit certificate" "that no agent or representative of this society nor any officer or member of a local camp has the right or power, by any statement, agreement, or promise, or by any method of transacting business with its members, to waive a strict observance and compliance with the laws, rules, and regulations of this society as set forth in this constitution, and by-laws of his camp, and such amendment or alteration therein as may be hereafter made." It was expressly declared in the section including this provision, among others, that the conditions enumerated "shall apply to every benefit certificate, and shall be binding on both members and this order." Section 118. At the same time it was provided in § 130 that noncompliance with any of the conditions named in the laws of the society shall be an absolute bar to any claim on the benefit fund thereof "under or by virtue of any benefit certificate that may have been issued, or that may hereafter be issued to an applicant, or by reason of any steps taken by an applicant to entitle him to the same, or by a subordinate camp or member thereof, and no officer or member of the head camp has any authority to change, alter, modify, or waive the foregoing requirements, or the consequences thereof in any manner."

The theory upon which the trial court awarded judgment to plaintiff was twofold, being: First, that the imperative conditions and provisions of the laws of the order and the benefit certificate in the matter of the payment of assessments, etc., were waived by defendant by the course of conduct in receiving payments from Mr. Valentine from May, 1911, notwithstanding his delinquency, with the result that he was in good standing at all times up to the time of his death; and, second, that, if out of good standing because of nonpayment of assessments, he was reinstated August 20th, and died in good standing.

It cannot be doubted that the laws of the defendant constituted a part of the contract between Valentine and defendant (see Butler v. Grand Lodge, A. O. U. W. 146 Cal. 172, 175, 79 Pac. 861), or that Valentine was charged with full knowledge of the provisions of the constitution of defendant (see Supreme Lodge, F. B. v. Price, 27 Cal. App. 607, 616, 150 Pac. 803). These propositions are so well settled as to require no citation of authority. In this connection it must further be held that the express provisions written into the constitution of defendant in 1910, to the effect that no officer or member of a local camp or of the head camp has any power or authority to waive any of the requirements of the constitution or the consequences thereof, in any way, were applicable. As we have seen, under the terms of the original contract, the power to amend the constitution and by-laws was expressly reserved, and the question of good standing at the time of death was to be determined in accord with the provisions of the constitution and by-laws as they then were or might be subsequently amended. The amendments, as applied to Valentine's case, were prior to any delinquency, and were not such as to impair any vested right. They were mere regulations of the internal affairs of the society, in no degree affecting any right of the insured under his contract, or in any way impairing the substance of his contract. They simply put into clear and unambiguous express provisions of the constitution a limitation upon the power and authority of any officer or member of a local camp, or any officer of the head camp, to waive any of the requirements of the contract. Perhaps this limitation was fairly inferable before, but in view of the amendments we need not discuss that question. The power of the head camp to make such amendments applicable to those already members and to the benefit certificates of such members, in so far as all future conduct was concerned, cannot be doubted. We have in mind the rule enunciated in many states, including this state (see Bornstein v. District Grand Lodge, 2 Cal. App. 624, 628, 84 Pac. 271), to the effect that alterations in the laws will not be construed to operate retrospectively unless the intent that they shall so operate clearly appears. But we give to these amendments, in applying them to Valentine's case, no real retrospective or retroactive operation. And we further are of the opinion that the intent to make the amendments applicable to every benefit certificate outstanding was clearly and definitely expressed. In addition to these express provisions of the amendments we have the provision of the constitution that was in force when the benefit certificate of Valentine was issued, to the effect that camp clerks are not agents of the head camp, but only agents of their local camps and of the several members thereof.

In view of these provisions it cannot be held that the local camp clerk was, to use the language of Marshall v. Grand Lodge, A. O. U. W. 133 Cal. 686, 692, 66 Pac. 25, 27, "anything more than a special agent of defendant, with defined powers which were known to the members." Whatever force there may be in the theory that, notwithstanding a provision declaring a local camp officer to be the agent of the members, and not of the head camp, the law will nevertheless hold him to be the agent of the head camp for the transmission of money properly paid him by a member in accord with the law of the society (see Supreme Lodge, K. P. v. Withers, 177 U. S. 260, 44 L. ed. 762, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 611), both principle and the great weight of authority preclude a conclusion that, in the face of the provisions of the constitution we have quoted, the local camp clerk could waive any requirement of the law, or, by any act or course of conduct, create any estoppel against defendant (see Hartman v. National Council, 76 Or. 153, L.R.A.1915E, 152, 147 Pac. 931). As was held in Northern Assur. Co. v. Grand View Bldg. Asso. 183 U. S. 308, 46 L. ed. 213, 22 Sup. Ct. Rep. 133, it is competent for parties to provide in an insurance policy that the power of agents of the company be limited, and where a limitation is expressed it is binding in the absence of waiver or ratification by the company with knowledge of the facts. This is the settled doctrine in California both as to ordinary life insurance companies (see Elliott v. Frankfort Marine, Acci. & Plate Glass Ins. Co. 172 Cal. 261, L.R.A.1916F, 1026, 156 Pac. 481), and as to fraternal insurance societies (Marshall v. Grand Lodge, A. O. U. W. 133 Cal. 686, 66 Pac. 25).

The local camp clerk having no power by any course of conduct to waive the requirements of the law of the society as to the time of the payment of the assessments or the consequences thereof, the failure of Valentine to pay assessments as required operated ipso facto to remove him from good standing, and consequently as a suspension of his benefit certificate. See Butler v. Grand Lodge, A. O. U. W. 146 Cal. 172, 79 Pac. 861; Marshall v. Grand Lodge, A. O. U. W. supra. This was the situation when he was injured on August 17, 1912. Unless reinstated prior to his death, he was not in good standing at the time of his death, with the result that, under the terms of his benefit certificate, his beneficiary could not participate in the benefit fund. The question, then, is whether there was an effective reinstatement. It seems perfectly clear to us that this question must be answered in the negative.

—reinstatement

Such a reinstatement could be accomplished only by a full compliance with the law of the society relative to reinstatement. Ibid. The law in force at all times required as a condition precedent to reinstatement the presentation of an application including an express warranty of present sound bodily health. As we have seen, the local camp clerk had no power by any act or course of conduct to waive the presentation of the application required by the law. The required application was one in which the member was not only made to declare, "I certify, warrant, and represent that I am in good sound bodily health," but also that "I agree that this representation is a strict warranty." The latter provision was not in fact contained in the application presented on behalf of Valentine, with the result that the precise application required by the law was not presented. The law providing that "no attempted reinstatement by the clerk of the camp without such reinstatement application shall reinstate a suspended member or entitle his beneficiaries to receive any benefit," it may well be claimed that for this reason alone there was no reinstatement here. Certainly this claim is good if the part omitted was at all material. But we think that the application as presented contained such a warranty in the statement, also required by law, that "I certify, warrant, and represent that I am in good sound bodily health." This statement clearly was one upon the literal truth or fulfilment of which the validity of the contract depended, and amounted to a warranty. See Hogins v. Supreme Council, C. R. C. 76 Cal. 109, 112, 9 Am. St. Rep. 173, 18 Pac. 125, 127; Caldwell v. Grand Lodge, U. W. 148 Cal. 195, 199, 2 L.R.A. (N.S.) 653, 113 Am. St. Rep. 219, 82 Pac. 781, 7 Ann. Cas.

356. This warranty, as we have seen, was absolutely false. "By a warranty the insured stipulates for the absolute truth of the statement made" (Hogins v. Supreme Council, C. R. C. supra), and its falsity is necessarily a defense to the contract procured by the making thereof. There could be no effective reinstatement based upon an application containing a warranty that was in fact false, in the absence of an effective waiver of the falsity by the defendant head camp. Plaintiff relies upon the fact that the local camp clerk had knowledge of the falsity of the warranty. In view of what we have said as to the limitations on the power of the camp clerk, it is clear that this knowledge on the part of that officer is an immaterial factor. He could not, by any course of conduct or possession of knowledge, bind defendant in such a manner as to estop it from defending upon the ground that the warranty was false. This is substantially the effect of what is said in Elliott v. Frankfort Marine, Acci. & Plate Glass Ins. Co. 172 Cal. 261, 266, L.R.A. 1916F, 1026, 156 Pac. 481. In view of his limited powers, his knowledge was not the knowledge of defendant. See Iverson v. Metropolitan L. Ins. Co. 151 Cal. 746, 751, 13 L.R.A. (N.S.) 866, 91 Pac. 609. No officer of the head camp had any knowledge whatever as to the matter; no information even that there had been an attempted reinstatement, until after the death of Valentine. To our minds there is no escape from the conclusion that the attempted reinstatement was ineffective for any purpose, and that Valentine was not in good standing on August 22, 1912, when he died as the result of the injury received on August 17, 1912.

of local clerk
—effect.

Some reliance is placed upon the retention by the local camp clerk of the money paid by Mrs. Valentine upon the attempted reinstatement, as constituting a waiver of all objections by defendant, or an estop-pel on it to dispute its effectiveness. In view of the circumstances of this case we do not see the materiality of this fact. He cannot be held to have received or to hold possession of this money as a representative of the head camp; for, in view of his limited authority, he had no power, under the circumstances, to so receive or hold it. Before information or knowledge came to any officer of the head camp, upon which any claim of waiver or estoppel might be based, Valentine had died. As held in Thompson v. Travelers' Ins. Co. 11 N. D. 274, 277, 91 N. W. 75, 77, the rights of the parties became fixed upon the death, and thereafter "no new contract between the parties by a waiver or estoppel could be created, as one of the contracting parties was dead." Subsequent conduct could not operate so as to affect the right to recover on the benefit certificate. This question is practically decided by what is said in Butler v. Grand Lodge, A. O. U. W. 146 Cal. 178, 179, 79 Pac. 861. It is proper to add that it does not appear that subsequent to the death of Valentine any Head Camp officer ever did anything or said anything which could by any possibility serve as a basis for a claim of waiver or estoppel, assuming that the necessary waiver or estoppel could be based on matters occurring after the death of the insured, or upon the acts or conduct of individual head camp officers.

Our conclusion upon the points we have discussed renders unnecessary a discussion of many other claims of appellant. As is said by appellant's counsel in their brief, the fundamental basis upon which respondent must rest her reliance for an affirmance is that the local camp clerk was the agent of the head camp, with power to waive the requirements of its constitution. This basis not existing, her case must necessarily fail.

There was an attempted appeal from the order denying a new trial, but the order was not made until after the change in our law abolishing the right of appeal from such orders. The order, however, may be reviewed upon the appeal from the judgment. In view of what we have said, the motion for a new trial should have been granted.

The judgment is reversed.

NOTE.

The reported case (VALENTINE v. HEAD CAMP, P. J. W. W. ante, 380) is illustrative of those cases wherein provisions in insurance contracts and premium notes, declaring the insurance suspended during default in payment of such a note, have been held to be self-operative. This, together with other cases of like character, is treated in II. b, 1, of the annotation following CONTINENTAL INS. Co. v. STRATTON, post, 403, which treats the general question of "Provisions suspending insurance during default in payment of premiums or assessments, as affected by failure of insured to declare a suspension before loss."

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Ohio County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover the amount alleged to be due on a fire insurance policy. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Woodward & Kirk for appellant.

Messrs. Heavrin & Martin, for appellee:

The provision of the policy that the company shall not be liable for loss during the period of time that any of the instalments shall be due and unpaid is not a void provision, but only voidable at the option of the company, and may be waived by the company by its acts or conduct, either expressed or implied.

Defendant waived its forfeiture clause by its prior custom in dealing with the insured, in this: in its admitted acceptance of premiums paid by plaintiff before the loss, after maturity, without objection, both in 1916 and 1917, and by its admitted custom of sending notice to the policyholder fifteen days before the maturity of instalment and fifteen days after the maturity of instalment.

Sampson, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The insurance company issued and delivered to Stratton on September 14, 1915, a policy of fire insurance covering a certain dwelling house situated in Ohio county, insuring the property loss by fire between 12 noon on that date and 12 noon of September 14, 1920, consideration of a premium of $34.55, divided into five equal instalments of $6.91 each, the first of which was paid at the time the policy was issued, and the others were to become due and be payable on the 1st day of October of each succeeding year through the life of the policy. The second premium was not paid on the 1st of October, in compliance with the contract, but it was paid about the 9th of that month by check sent to the New York office of the company. The third premium of $6.91 due on October 1, 1917, was not paid when due, but a check for the proper amount, dated September 26th, was received at the office of the company in New York on October 15, 1917, credited to the account of Stratton, and deposited in the bank by the company on that date. A few days later the company received notice from Stratton that the house which the policy covered had been destroyed by fire on October 12th, which was three days before the premium was received at the office of the company. The company declined to pay the policy, $350, and Stratton instituted this action on the 13th of February, 1918, to recover on the policy. A judgment having been entered in favor of Stratton, the company appeals. An agreed statement of facts is filed in lieu of evidence. By said statement it is agreed that the policy contains this provision: "And it is hereby agreed that, in case of nonpayment of any one of the instalments herein named at maturity, this company shall not be liable for loss during such default, and the policy for which this note was given shall lapse until payment is made to this company in New York, or to its western department at Chicago, and in the event of such nonpayment the whole amount of instalments earned, due, and payable, and may be collected by law. The said policy may be canceled at any time by compliance with its provisions."

The note for \$27.64, signed by Stratton, which was to cover the deferred payments of \$6.91 on the premiums, contains this statement: "I promise to pay to said company [appellant] or order, at their office in Chicago or New York, . . . twenty-seven and  $\frac{64}{100}$  dollars in instalments, . . . and it is hereby agreed that, in case of nonpayment of any one of the instalments herein named at maturity, this company shall not be liable for loss during such default, and the policy for which this note was given shall lapse until payment is made to this company in New York, or to its western department at Chicago, and in the event of such nonpayment the whole amount of instalments remaining unpaid on said policy may be declared earned, due, and payable, and may be collected by law. The said policy may be canceled at any time by compliance with this provision."

The insurance company is defending upon the ground that the premium, $6.91, which was due October 1, 1917, was not paid at that time, nor received nor credited in the office of the company until October 15th, which was three days after the fire occurred that destroyed the building insured; and it is insisted this caused the policy to lapse for nonpayment of the premium, and, the premium not being paid until after the fire, there was no property to be insured and the policy could not, therefore, be revived.

Appellee Stratton insists that the policy was in full force at the time of the fire, and that such a provision in the policy as quoted above does not cause the policy to lapse by nonpayment of the premium on the day fixed, but only renders such contract voidable at the option of the insurance company, and as this option of the company to render the policy inoperative was not exercised by the company before the happening of the fire, it was too late to claim exemption from liability on account of the nonpayment of the premium. While it is alleged in the pleading of Stratton that the check for the premium due October 1, 1917, was made out and signed by him on the 26th of September, and duly posted to the company at its office in New York, the agreed statement of fact does not fully support this averment, the statement being "that the third instalment, due October 1, 1917, was not paid when due, but was paid by check dated September 26, 1917, and mailed to the defendant company, and received and cashed by it on October 15, 1917."

It will be noticed that the agreement goes only to the extent of showing that the check was dated September 26th, and does not show that it was mailed on that day. However, it shows that it was received and cashed in the office of the company on October 15th, which was some nineteen days later. From the date of other letters passing between the parties, we learn that it takes from two to three days for a letter to go from the postoffice address of Stratton to the office of the company in New York. It is interesting to note the absence of proof of the date the letter was posted by Stratton. However this may be, a payment by check of an overdue premium is not made, under a contract similar to the one under consideration, until the check is received at the office of the company, cashed, and applied to the extinguishment of the premium note. Continental Ins. Co. v. Hargrove, 131 Ky. 837, 116 S. W. 256. A fair construction of the clause of the policy and promissory note above quoted would give them this meaning: The insurance company shall not be liable for loss occurring after the premium on the policy becomes due and while it remains unpaid, and the policy shall be inoperative and its binding force suspended during such delinquency of the insured; but on the payment of the overdue premium and acceptance by the company the policy shall immediately revive and become effective, eo instante.

lapse of policy

Applying this construction to the facts before us, we are forced to the conclusion that Stratton, through his neglect, forfeited his rights under the policy sued on. Admitting that he posted the check to the company for the premium on October 11, 1917, as is his contention, it was not received at the office until the 15th of the month, which was after the fire. Had it been received at the company's office on the 11th of October, or at any time before the fire actually occurred, and the company had accepted the check in payment of the premium, and cashed the same, it would have been bound upon the policy, because such acceptance would have immediately revived the policy in favor of Stratton. At the time the premium was received and accepted at the office of the company in New York, the house had been destroyed by fire, and, as stated in the case of Continental Ins. Co. v. Hargrove, supra: "The contract was no longer executory, for, as the subject-matter [the house] had been destroyed, it was no longer possible for the insurer to indemnify against its future loss, and there was nothing to support the undertaking in the policy to do so."

A revival of the contract of insurance can be operative only from the instant that it took effect, and the policy became rejuvenated and alive. It could not relate back, because a contract of insurance can only look forward, and never retrospectively.

Appellee Stratton relies upon the waiver by the company of the forfeiture clause of the policy. The waiver, he asserts, results from the company's admitted acceptance of premiums paid by Stratton, before the loss, but after maturity, without objection, in the years 1916 and 1917, and a further fact that the company admits that it was its custom to send a notice to each policyholder fifteen days before maturity of instalments, and another notice fifteen days after the maturity of each instalment. The only deferred instalment paid was the one due October 1, 1916, and which was paid about the 9th of that month. True, an instalment was paid at the time the policy was issued. We are of opinion that a single prior instance of accommodation and indulgence granted by the company to Stratton on the payment of a premium is not sufficient to establish a custom of accepting instalments after they are due. However this may be, it would have little or no effect upon the case at bar, under the construction we have placed upon the contract embraced in the note and policy.

By the terms of the policy and note, the insurance company had the right to retain the notes and to collect such part of them as equaled the earned premium to the date of the lapsing of the policy. The company was, therefore, not under the necessity of returning the notes to Stratton before the policy became suspended in order to avoid liability. Stratton had contracted with the company that, in case he defaulted in the payment of a premium instalment or allowed the instalment to become overdue, the policy should become inoperative during such default on Stratton's part, and we know of no principle of public policy that would prevent persons sui juris from entering into a binding obligation of this kind upon sufficient consideration.

The unusual situation which the facts present makes this a hard case, but the neglect of Stratton alone is responsible for his loss. Under the agreed state of facts it appears that the judgment of the court, to whom both questions of waive default.

—custom to

—duty to return premium note.

—payment after loss—effect.

fact and law were submitted, should have been for appellant company. The appeal prayed is granted, and the judgment is therefore reversed, for proceedings consistent with this opinion.

ANNOTATION.

Provision suspending insurance during default in payment of premiums or assessments as affected by failure of insurer to declare a suspension before loss.

I. Necessity in general for affirmative action, 395.

II. Automatic or self-operating provisions:

a. In general, 398.

b. Where premium note given:

1. Provisions in both policy and note, 403.

2. Provisions in policy only, 406.

3. Provisions in note and not in policy, 407.

4. Under statute, 408.

III. Provisions requiring affirmative action, 409.

IV. Where whole subordinate body or branch suspended, 413.

I. Necessity in general for affirmative action.

While there is an apparent conflict of authority as to whether or not provisions suspending insurance during default in payment of premiums or assessments work automatically, i. e., are self-operating, or self-executing, so as to dispense with notice to the insured or declaration of suspension by the insurer, the well-settled rule is that, in the absence of special provisions which distinguish the case and call for a contrary conclusion, the operation of provisions of the character under consideration is not affected by the failure of the insurer to declare a suspension before loss.

The following cases uphold the non-liability of the insurer for loss occurring after default in payment of premiums or assessments, although the insurer took no affirmative action, such as declaring a suspension before loss:

II. Automatic or self-operating provisions.

a. In general.

It seems to be unquestioned that where the contract of insurance provides that, upon default in the payment of a premium or assessment, the delinquent shall "stand suspended without notice," and that "no action" upon the part of the insurer "shall be required as essential to such suspension," the provision is self-executing so that the insurer need not declare a suspension. At least, it has been so assumed. See Dillon v. National Council, K. L. S. (1909) 148 Ill. App. 121; Neenan v. National Council, K. L. S. (1914) 188 Ill. App. 490; Kraus v. National Council, K. L. S. (1916) 198 Ill. App. 345; Scheufler v. Grand Lodge, A. O. U. W. (1891) 45 Minn. 256, 47 N. W. 799; and Backdahl v. Grand Lodge, A. O. U. W. (1891) 46 Minn. 61, 48 N. W. 454.

Likewise, provisions to the effect that upon default the insured "shall stand suspended," and that no action on the part of the insurer shall be required as essential to such a suspension, have been held to be self-executory. Marshall v. Grand Lodge, A. O. U. W. (1901) 133 Cal. 686, 66 Pac. 25; Valentine v. Grand Lodge, A. O. U. W. (1911) 17 Cal. App. 317, 119 Pac. 671; Grand Lodge, A. O. U. W. v. Lachmann (1902) 101 Ill. App. 213, affirmed in (1902) 199 Ill. 140, 64 N. E. 1022; Field v. National Council, K. L. S. (1902) 64 Neb. 226, 89 N. W. 773.

And the same has been held under a provision that a delinquent member shall, "by the fact of such nonpayment, stand suspended without notice, and no act on the part of the council or any officer thereof . . . shall be required as essential to such suspension." National Council, K. L. S. v. Burch (1906) 126 Ill. App. 15.

So, a provision in the by-laws of a mutual benefit society that one indebted for dues "shall stand suspended," and that a vote of the local union is not necessary to a suspension, is automatic, and ipso facto suspends a delinquent member. Wall v. Brotherhood of Painters, D. P. H. (1911) 165 Ill. App. 59.

Of like effect and operation is a provision in the by-laws of a fraternal benefit association that a member failing to pay an assessment "shall stand suspended" from all rights, benefits, and privileges of this association, "without further notice." Gifford v. Workmen's Ben. Asso. (1908) 105 Mc. 17, 72 Atl. 680, 17 Ann. Cas. 1173; Borgraefe v. Supreme Lodge, K. L. H. (1886) 22 Mo. App. 127 (see this case as quoted infra, III.); Fletcher v. Supreme Lodge, K. L. H. (1911) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 135 S. W. 201; Cole v. Knights of Maccabees (1916) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 188 S. W. 699.

And a similar conclusion has been reached where the provision was merely that the insured "shall stand suspended by his own act," and "not be entitled to any benefits . . . during the time of such suspension." Independent Order of Foresters v. Hagerty (1899) 86 Ill. App. 31. Likewise, where it was provided that any member who failed to pay an assessment should "by that fact stand suspended." Catholic Order of Foresters v. Lynch (1906) 126 Ill. App. 439. So, under a provision that the insured shall "thereupon become suspended by his own act," and that his benefit certificate shall be void and all benefits forfeited, it has been held that a mere failure to pay dues ipso facto works a forfeiture. Kennedy v. Grand Fraternity (1907) 36 Mont. 325, 25 L.R.A.(N.S.) 78, 92 Pac. 971.

Or it is sufficient if the provision be that the insured shall ipso facto stand suspended. Glaspy v. United Brotherhood (1911) 163 Ill. App. 78; Burchard v. Western Commercial Travelers Asso. (1909) 139 Mo. App. 606, 123 S. W. 973. Especially where it is also expressly provided that no act on the part of the insurer or any officer is essential to such suspension. Lavin v. Grand Lodge, A. O. U. W. (1903) 104 Mo. App. 1, 78 S. W. 325. Or that, "during such suspension, his benefit certificate shall be absolutely null and void." Modern Woodmen v. Tevis (1902) 54 C. C. A. 293, 117 Fed. 369; Knodel v. Modern Woodmen (1918) 171 Mo. App. 377, 157 S. W. 818. In reaching this conclusion, the court in the Knodel Case (Mo.) supra, said: "We do not agree with counsel for plaintiff that his suspension could not become effective until he had received notice of it from defendant. The by-laws did not require defendant to give notice of suspensions or forfeitures, but, on the contrary, provided that a failure to pay assessments and dues at stated times should, ipso facto, constitute a suspension and forfeiture. Provisions in the laws of a fraternal society for the prompt payment of benefit assessments are of the substance and essence of its insurance contracts, and a law of the order, prescribing a self-executory suspension of the member and forfeiture of his insurance as a penalty for his failure to make prompt payments is reasonable, and will be enforced by the courts. . . . Where the contract, as evidenced by the certificate, constitution, and by-laws of the order, does not make the provisions insuring the prompt payment of dues and assessments self-executing, but merely provides that a failure to pay shall constitute a ground for suspension and forfeiture, it does not become effective until the forfeiture and suspension are declared by the order and notice of such action given the delinquent member. . . . But the parties have a right to stipulate in their contract that a failure of the insured to pay as agreed, of itself, shall terminate the insurance without notice, and such we find to be the character of the contract under consideration." And where the penalty for nonpayment is ipso facto suspension, the rule is not changed by another provision to the effect that a subordinate council may pay the assessment as a loan or a gift, it also being provided that an agreement by a subordinate council to pay an assessment is not binding upon the supreme council, unless it is complied with, and that no claim shall be recognized or valid unless payment has been made. Griffith v. Supreme Council, R. A. (1914) 182 Mo. App. 644, 166 S. W. 324.

So, under a provision that a delinquent "shall stand suspended," and that "during such suspension his or her benefit certificate shall be void," suspension occurs automatically when there is a default in payment. Day v. Supreme Forest, W. C. (1913) 174 Mo. App. 260, 156 S. W. 721; Modern Brotherhood v. Beshara (1914) 42 Okla. 684, 142 Pac. 1014.

And a by-law of a beneficial life insurance association to the effect that a delinquent member "shall stand suspended, and shall not thereafter be entitled to any benefits of the order, and his certificate canceled and void," is self-operative. Chapple v. Sovereign Camp, W. W. (1902) 64 Neb. 55, 89 N. W. 423.

And it has been held that a provision in a contract of insurance to the effect that if the insured default in payment of premium or assessment he "shall stand suspended" from all benefits, etc., is, without more, self-executing, so that no affirmative action on the part of the insurer is essential to a suspension.

In Beeman v. Supreme Lodge, S. H. (Pa.) supra, in discussing the effect of the provision, "shall stand suspended," upon the rights of the parties to a contract of insurance, the court said: "If we construe the law to the utmost in favor of the appellee, Beeman was suspended by force of the law of the order, ipso facto, at midnight on March 30, because of the nonpayment of his assessment. 'Each member shall pay the amount according to age, as per table, and any member failing to pay the same on or before the last meeting night of each month shall stand suspended from the order and all benefits therefrom.' We think it a proper construction of this language, under the law of the order, to say that, when the meeting adjourned on the evening of March 30,

Beeman was suspended and not entitled to benefits as a matter of law, without any action on the part of the lodge. It is the member himself who, by violating the laws of the order, works his own suspension through the nonpayment of his assessment. The words, 'shall stand suspended,' when used in respect to policies of insurance and death benefit certificates, would seem to be equivalent, in their legal effect, to 'cease and determine' and 'null and void.' And in Supreme Lodge, K. H. v. Keener (Tex.) supra, the court said that the provision, "shall stand suspended," is "self-executing, and requires no action on the part of a subordinate lodge, or of any other judicatory of the order, to put it in operation. The words of the Constitution are mandatory, not that a member may be 'suspended' for not paying his assessments, but he 'shall stand suspended.'"

So, it has been held that a provision of a mutual benefit society that the failure to pay an assessment, when due, shall suspend a member and all rights under his benefit certificate, is self-operative. Supreme Council, C. B. L. v. Grove (1911) 176 Ind. 356, 36 L.R.A.(N.S.) 913, 96 N. E. 159. And that a constitutional provision and by-law to the effect that for failure to pay dues the insured stands suspended, and is not entitled to any benefits, is self-operative, and suspends the member without any action upon the part of the insurer, was the holding in Smith v. Sovereign Camp, W. W. (1903) 179 Mo. 119, 77 S. W. 862. And in Brown v. Knights of Protected Ark (1908) 43 Colo. 289, 96 Pac. 450, where the contract provided that the delinquent member "shall stand suspended," and also that all benefits "shall be liable to forfeiture," it was held that, reading the two provisions together, the intent was clear that they were self-operative, so that no affirmative action upon the part of the insurer was necessary.

And a by-law of a mutual insurance company, providing that upon default in the payment of any premium or assessment "the risk of the company on the policy shall be suspended until the same is paid," has been regarded as self-operative. Nash v. Union Mut. Ins. Co. (1857) 43 Me. 343, 69 Am. Dec. 65; Hollister v. Quincy Mut. F. Ins. Co. (1875) 118 Mass. 478; Blanchard v. Atlantic Mut. F. Ins. Co. (1856) 33 N. H. 9. And the same has been held under a charter providing that upon default the "insurance shall be suspended," and that the insured "shall thenceforth have no claim . . . for losses sustained until" the assessment is paid. Hill v. Farmers' Mut. F. Ins. Co. (1901) 129 Mich. 141, 88 N. W. 392. Also, where the provision merely was that "the insurance should stand suspended" during the default. Coil v. Continental Ins. Co. (1913) 169 Mo. App. 634, 155 S. W. 872.

Under a by-law of a benefit society, providing that suspension of a member for nonpayment of assessments occurs on the first day of the month following default, the mere failure to pay an assessment "ipso facto causes suspension," and the certificate is rendered void until the member is reinstated. HAYCOCK v. SOVEREIGN CAMP, W. W. (reported herewith) ante, 378.

And provisions in the contract of a mutual fire insurance association that if there be default for thirty days in payment of premium the "policy shall be and remain suspended until the payment" and acceptance of the amount, that during the period of suspension the policy shall be unenforceable, and that if it remains suspended for sixty days "it shall be canceled without notice," have been held self-executing. Lamb v. Merchants Nat. Mut. F. Ins. Co. (1908) 18 N. D. 253, 119 N. W. 1048.

And it has been held that a charter provision of a mutual life insurance association to the effect that upon failure of a member to pay an assessment he "shall be suspended and treated as" a nonmember, and that "the holder of the benefit certificate shall be without right against the association" in case of the death of the delinquent member, is self-operative. Maginnis v. New Orleans Cotton Exch. Mut. Aid Asso. (1891) 43 La. Ann. 1136, 10 So. 180.

And a by-law of a mutual insurance company, providing that it shall not be liable for any loss sustained during the time the policy lapses by reason of nonpayment of assessment, is self-operative and bars recovery for loss occurring during such a default. Farmers' Mut. Ins. Co. v. Kinney (1902) 64 Neb. 808, 90 N. W. 926.

And under a by-law of a mutual benefit society, providing that a delinquent member "loses his benefits until he shall have paid what he owes," such a member loses benefits during the period of delinquency, although the society has taken no affirmative action toward ruling him from its lists. La Marsh v. L'Union St. Jean Baptiste Soc. (1894) 68 N. H. 229, 38 Atl. 1045.

So, under a provision of the constitution of a fraternal beneficial organization that a member indebted for dues for a specified time "shall not be entitled to benefits until" a specified time after all arrearages shall have been paid in full, it has been held that a member by default automatically suspends himself, and forfeits his right to benefits accruing during the period of suspension. Young v. Æolian Council (1915) 59 Pa. Super. Ct. 174.

And a by-law of a fraternal beneficiary society, providing that a member who shall fail to pay his dues shall "forfeit" his right "to the benefits as long as he shall continue to be in arrears," has been held to be self-operative. Labranche v. St. Jean Baptiste Soc. (1911) 76 N. H. 237, 81 Atl. 698. Peaslee, J., said: "No action by the society was necessary to create a suspension, and members who were in arrears for dues were suspended by virtue of that fact alone. While suspended their names were properly kept on the books. They were still members, though not members in good standing."

And a provision of a contract of insurance to the effect that on default in payment of premiums or assessments the policy or certificate shall be null and void, and continue so until payment thereof is made, is self-operative, and suspends the insured without any affirmative action upon the part of the insurer. Smith v. Sov- ereign Camp, W. W. (1903) 179 Mo. 119, 77 S. W. 862; Sovereign Camp, W. W. v. Hicks (1904) 37 Tex. Civ. App. 424, 84 S. W. 425.

And a provision in an accident policy that "no claim for injuries sustained during any period" for which the premium has not been paid shall be valid has been held automatic in its operation. Hagins v. Ætna L. Ins. Co. (1905) 72 S. C. 216, 51 S. E. 683.

It has also been held that where the constitution and by-laws of a mutual benefit society provide that no member who is in arrears for dues "shall be entitled" to benefits, and that a delinquent member "shall not be entitled to any benefit until all arrearages shall have been paid," the suspension is automatic. Henegar v. National Council, J. O. U. A. M. (1914) 5 Tenn. C. C. A. 225. Hall, J., in delivering the opinion of the court, among other things, said: "It was not necessary for the local council to first have suspended the insured in order to deprive him of the benefit. The by-law was self-executing, and operated to suspend the member from the benefits conferred by the funeral department. In other words, under said by-laws, he forfeited all right to said funeral benefit by reason of being in arrears with his dues. This did not affect his membership in the council for other purposes. Under the constitution and by-laws of the council, he remained a member for other purposes, but was not entitled to the benefit conferred by the funeral department of the national council. The laws of a benevolent society, when pertinent and not in conflict with the statute laws of the state or the recognized rules of public policy, become part of its contracts with members, and are binding on the parties."

And provisions of a fraternal benefit society that death certificates shall not be paid unless the member was in good standing at the time of his death, and that when an assessment is overdue the delinquent "stands unfinancial . . . until the same is paid," have been regarded as self-executing. Grayson v. Grand Temple & Tabernacle, K.

D. T. I. O. T. (1914) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 171 S. W. 489.

Where the contract of insurance provides that on default in payment of an assessment the delinquent member's certificate and membership shall cease until reinstated, and that no benefits shall be paid between the time when the delinquent payment became due and the time when the same is received, delinquency alone has been held to work a suspension. National Masonic Acci. Asso. v. Burr (1895) 44 Neb. 256, 62 N. W. 466.

So, it has been held that the provisions of a mutual fire insurance contract that on failure to pay assessments the directors "may annul the policy," and that "no person shall receive any benefit" under the policy "until all assessments" are paid, are "self-executing" so that "no affirmative action" on the part of the insurer was necessary. Stutzman v. Cicero Mut. F. Ins. Co. (1912) 150 Wis. 254, 136 N. W. 604.

And construing a constitutional provision of a mutual benefit association which provided that a member who does not pay his regular monthly dues or fines for a specified time is considered in arrears, and that, if this arrearage continue for a certain additional length of time, "the member will be declared suspended from the society," it has been held that being in arrears for the full specified length of time "operated ipso facto, and without any further action on the part of the defendant [insured], as a suspension" of the delinquent. Giniso v. Calabrian American Citizens' Mut. Ben. Asso. (1910) 66 Misc. 162, 121 N. Y. Supp. 209. This decision seems to go about as far as any in holding that the default automatically suspends the member and his rights. In fact, the decision can hardly be reconciled with some of the cases set out infra, III., which construe language of similar import as requiring affirmative action by the insurer in order to work a suspension.

1. Provisions in both policy and note.

Where both the policy and a premium note provide that if any installment shall not be paid promptly when due the policy "shall be suspended, inoperative, and of no force or effect until" paid, no affirmative action by the insurer is essential to a suspension, and no recovery can be had for a loss occurring during a default. McCullough v. Home Ins. Co. (1907) 118 Tenn. 263, 100 S. W. 104, 12 Ann. Cas. 626; Davis v. Home Ins. Co. (1913) 127 Tenn. 330, 44 L.R.A.(N.S.) 626, 155 S. W. 131. In the McCullough Case (Tenn.) supra, the court said: "The stipulation for a suspension of liability under a policy in case of default in payment of the premium is a reasonable one, made to enforce prompt payment of that part of the premium for which credit is given. It violates no principle of public policy or rule of the common or statute law, and is valid. Such a stipulation only becomes effective and injurious to the insured upon their own default in a matter of which they have full notice, and about which they cannot be mistaken. These being the terms of the contract, the decision of the case is without difficulty. The well-settled rule, as stated and enforced in the adjudged cases of all courts of last resort to which we have had access, and laid down in the textbooks of authority upon this subject, is that provisions of this character in insurance policies are valid and enforceable, and that if a loss occurs while the insured is in default, within the terms of his policy, no recovery can be had."

And where the policy provides that, on the failure of the assured to pay the note when due, the policy "shall lapse and the liability of the company thereon shall be suspended . . . during the period of such lapse caused by arrearage," and the note stipulates that default will render the policy void, failure to pay as provided defeats recovery for loss occurring during default. Gleason v. Prudential F. Ins. Co. (1912) 127 Tenn. 8, 151 S. W. 1030.

So, under provisions in an application and policy that if a premium note shall not be paid when due the policy "shall cease to insure," and the "company shall not be liable for any loss or damage which may accrue . . . during such default, nor until such policy shall be revived," and a provision in a premium note that the "company shall not be liable for any loss that may occur during the time this note remains overdue and unpaid," the obligation of the risk is automatically suspended during the default. East Texas F. Ins. Co. v. Perky (1893) 5 Tex. Civ. App. 698, 24 S. W. 1080. Finley, J., argued as follows: "By the terms of the contract, it was provided that if default was made in the payment of either of the premium notes the policy should cease to insure, and the insurance company should not be liable during such default. There is an independent provision in the contract, authorizing either party to it to have the policy canceled at any time, upon certain notice, and adjustment of the premiums paid. Considering all of these provisions together,—giving to each of them its legitimate force and effect,—we think the fair and reasonable interpretation is that it was the intention that the nonpayment of the premium notes at maturity should have the effect to suspend the obligation of risk during the continuance of default in the payment of the premium. The provision that the 'company shall not be liable for any loss or damage which may accrue to the property insured thereunder during such default,' we think, evidences the intention that the policy should not become utterly extinguished by failure to pay the note at maturity. . . . The failure on the part of the assured to pay the premium note at maturity relieved the company of liability under the policy while default in such payment continued, unless that provision in the contract was waived by the company, or unless the company was guilty of such conduct in relation thereto as to render it unfair to the assured that it should insist upon exemption from liability under such clause, and thereby became estopped from denying the continued binding force of the obligation of risk. . . . The fact that the policy also provided that the company should not again become liable, after default, 'until such policy shall be revived by written consent of the managers of said company's instalment department, or by an officer of said company, on payment of all amounts due thereon,' we do not think stands in the way of the construction of the contract which we have given to it. That provision stands upon no higher plane of binding force than the other provisions of the policy."

And where both the policy and a note given for a premium provide that the policy shall become void "while," or "so long as," or "during the time" the note remains due and unpaid, or "until" paid, it has been held that the insurer is not liable for a loss occurring while the policy remained suspended by a default, although the insurer took no affirmative action.

In Lenz v. German F. Ins. Co. (Ill.) supra, the court said: "Under the terms of the note and policy, the latter was suspended during the period of nonpayment of the premium note, after its maturity, August 4, 1894, and would be revived only upon payment, and then only from the time of such payment. By the terms of the contract there could be no forfeiture for nonpayment of the premium note, for the insured, at all times, had the right to pay, and it was the duty of the insurer to receive payment, thereby reviving the policy. According to the terms of the contract, the policy was suspended at the time the loss occurred, in consequence of which appellee was relieved of liability. That which counsel insist was a forfeiture was not, but only a suspension of the policy during the period of nonpayment of the note after it was due, and which was effected by operation of the contract made by appellant himself. If the facts relied upon had the effect of reviving the policy, it would take effect only after the loss, and would therefore be unavailing to appellant."

And in Williams v. Albany City Ins. Co. (Mich.) supra, in discussing the proper interpretation to give provisions declaring a policy void while premium notes remain overdue and unpaid, the court said: "Was it the intention that the policy should become utterly and finally extinguished on failure to pay the note at maturity? If the provision had stopped with the clause, 'and this policy becomes void,' such would have been the true interpretation. But the whole instrument, and especially the whole provision upon the same identical subject, must be construed together to ascertain the intent; and the clause last cited is but a part of one entire provision, but one branch or member of the same compound sentence, and is immediately followed by the qualifying clause, showing just how long the policy is to be void by reason of the default,—'while said past-due notes or obligations, or any part thereof, shall remain overdue and unpaid.' This shows just as clearly the intent to limit the period during which the policy shall be void, as the previous words do to make it void at all or for any period or purpose. In other words, it shows that, notwithstanding the use of the term, 'void,' the intention clearly was only to suspend its operation as a policy while the note or obligation should remain overdue and unpaid, and that, upon payment after default, the policy should again take effect from the time of the payment, and continue for the remainder of the period originally fixed; and that, by reason of such default, it should only become wholly void, or cease to be capable of revival as a policy, in case that default should continue to the end of the period first fixed for the insurance. The provision, therefore, is but a stipulation, in another form of words, that the company shall not be liable for any loss which may occur during the continuance of the default."

And where both the policy and the note provide that failure to pay a premium note when due shall avoid the policy "until duly reinstated," a policy automatically becomes inoperative with the delinquency, and so continues until reinstated. Hipp v. Fidelity Mut. L. Ins. Co. (1907) 128 Ga. 491, 12 L.R.A.(N.S.) 319, 57 S. E. 892.

And of the same effect are provisions in both an insurance policy and a premium note that the insurer shall not be liable for any loss or damage that may occur to the property while any instalments of the premium remain due and unpaid.

2. Provisions in policy only.

A conclusion similar to that reached in the cases cited in the next preceding subdivision has also been reached where it seemingly was provided in the policy only that the insurer should not be liable for any loss or damage occurring while a premium note, or any part thereof, was past due or unpaid. Watrous v. Mississippi Valley Ins. Co. (1872) 35 Iowa, 582; Nedrow v. Farmers Ins. Co. (1876) 43 Iowa, 24; Shakey v. Hawkeye Ins. Co. (1876) 44 Iowa, 540; Garlick v. Mississippi Valley Ins. Co. (1876) 44 Iowa, 553; Critchett v. American Ins. Co. (1880) 53 Iowa, 404, 36 Am. Rep. 230, 5 N. W. 543; Home Ins. Co. v. Karn (1897) 19 Ky. L. Rep. 273, 39 S. W. 501; McIntyre v. Michigan State Ins. Co. (1883) 52 Mich. 188, 17 N. W. 781; Burnham v. Michigan Mut. L. Ins. Co. (1907) 149 Mich. 84, 112 N. W. 704; Mooney v. Home Ins. Co. (1897) 72 Mo. App. 92; Proebstel v. State Ins. Co. (1896) 14 Wash. 669, 45 Pac. 308.

Likewise, a provision in a policy of insurance, rendering it void during the continuance of default in payment of any instalment of a premium note, is self-operative during the period of such default, so as to release the insurer from liability for a loss occurring during the same. American Ins. Co. v. Klink (1877) 65 Mo. 78; Phenix Ins. Co. v. Bachelder (1891) 32 Neb. 490, 29 Am. St. Rep. 443, 49 N. W. 217, affirmed on rehearing in (1894) 39 Neb. 95, 57 N. W. 996; Wall v. Home Ins. Co. (1867) 36 N. Y. 157, affirming (1861) 8 Bosw. 597. In the Phenix Ins. Co. Case (Neb.) supra, the court said: "It is obvious that the failure to pay the premium note at maturity suspended the policy until payment was made. It could have been revived for the balance of the term, by making full payment at any time before the loss. This, as we have seen, he failed to do. True, after maturity of the note, he paid $15 thereon, but this did not give him the right to avail himself of the benefits of the contract of insurance. Nothing short of full payment, or a waiver of the stipulation in the policy, could have the effect to remove the suspension caused by the failure to pay the note. The clause referred to is not unreasonable. It is but fair and just that while the insured is in default in the payment of his note the company should not be liable for loss, when the parties have so agreed. We have no right to make a new contract for them, or refuse to enforce the one they have made. To hold that the policy was in force at the time of the fire would be to set aside and disregard the plain stipulation of the parties."

And the same is true where the contract provides that the policy shall be void while a premium note remains overdue and unpaid. Gorton v. Dodge County Mut. Ins. Co. (1875) 39 Wis. 121.

And a by-law of a mutual insurance company, providing that if an assessment on a premium note is not paid within a specified time after notice the policy shall be "void until the said assessment be paid," has been held self-executing, so that the company need neither declare the policy void nor give notice of the suspension to the insured. Fogle v. Lycoming Mut. Ins. Co. (1860) 3 Grant, Cas. (Pa.) 77; Hummel & Co's Appeal (1875) 78 Pa. 320; Lycoming F. Ins. Co. v. Rought (1881) 97 Pa. 415. In the Hummel & Co. Case (1875) 78 Pa. 320, supra, the court, Per Curiam, said: "The effect of the . . . section is merely to suspend the benefit of the policy, after thirty days' default in payment, until payment of the assessment is made either voluntarily or involuntarily, the company by the same section being authorized to retain the premium note to enforce collection. The mistake of the master is in treating the words 'null and void' as creating an absolute extinguishment of the contract; whereas the provision is only a contract mode of enforcing payment of the premium, by withholding the protection of the policy during the default, the contract itself remaining in life, and its operation only being suspended, by its own terms, until payment is made by the insured, or the assessment collected under the premium note. The moment payment was made the contract, which was still alive, became again operative in its protection. There was no option to be exercised by the company in order to put an end to the contract, but the contract, propria vigore, suspended the protection until the default was at an end. Clearly it is the right of the parties to make this condition in their contract, and especially in such a case, where by the policy the relation of membership is created."

And under a provision in a fire policy that the company shall not be liable for any loss occurring at a time when any premium note shall be due and unpaid, delinquency itself suspends the risk during the default. Antes v. State Ins. Co. (1900) 61 Neb. 55, 84 N. W. 412.

So, it has been held that a provision in a fire insurance policy that, in case any part of a premium note is not paid when due, "this policy shall lapse and the same shall be suspended, inoperative, and of no force or effect so long as" the default continues, is self-operative and may be enforced by the insurer. Belk v. Capital F. Ins. Co. (1918) 102 Neb. 702, 169 N. W. 262 (as ruled in the first headnote).

And a provision in a policy that if a premium note is not paid when due the policy shall lapse and cease to be in force, and remain inoperative while the note is past due and unpaid, and the insurer not liable during the default, is self-operative, and default in payment itself constitutes a suspension and a defense to a claim based on a loss following default and preceding payment. Home F. Ins. Co. v. Garbacz (1896) 48 Neb. 827, 67 N. W. 864.

And a provision that the policy "shall be suspended, inoperative, and of no force or effect so long as" any premium note remains due and unpaid, and that the insurer shall not be liable for any loss while such default continues, is self-operative so as to excuse liability for a loss occurring after the maturity of a premium note, and while the same is unpaid. Houston v. Farmers & M. Ins. Co. (1902) 64 Neb. 138, 89 N. W. 635.

Likewise, default, under a provision in a policy that when default shall be made on a premium note "all obligations of the company to the insured shall be suspended until such time as the said note shall be fully paid," precludes a recovery unless the default be waived. Joliffe v. Madison Mut. Ins. Co. (1875) 39 Wis. 111, 20 Am. Rep. 35.

3. Provisions in note and not in policy.

Under a provision in a premium note declaring the insurance void while such note remains due and unpaid, at least, where the note is expressly made a part of the contract of insurance, the mere failure to pay the note when due has been held to itself avoid the policy during the delinquency. Hale v. Michigan Farmers Mut. F. Ins. Co. (1907) 148 Mich. 453, 111 N. W. 1068.

And the same conclusion has been reached where it merely appeared that the stipulation for suspension of benefits so long as the delinquency continued was contained in the premium note. New Zealand Ins. Co. v. Maaz (1899) 13 Colo. App. 493, 59 Pac. 213.

On the other hand, in Wilson v. Home Ins. Co. (1879) 6 Ohio Dec. Reprint, 708, where the provisions of the policy are not reported, but it appeared that a note given for an insurance premium contained a stipulation that if not paid at maturity the insurance should not be binding upon the insurer while the default continued, the court charged the jury that the mere fact that the note was not paid at maturity did not of itself avoid the policy, but simply gave the insurer the option of declaring a forfeiture, which option, it was said, "must be asserted by clear and unequivocal acts." It should be noted in connection with the fact that the reporter states that this decision follows strictly the decision in Mutual L. Ins. Co. v. French (1876) 30 Ohio St. 240, 27 Am. Rep. 443, that in that case the provisions provided for an absolute forfeiture rather than a mere suspension during default, which fact alone affords sufficient ground for distinguishing the cases.

And in Shawnee Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. Cannedy (1912) 36 Okla. 733, 44 L.R.A.(N.S.) 376, 129 Pac. 865, where the premium note provided that, if not paid at maturity, the policy should be "null and void, and so remain until the same shall be fully paid," which clause is really a suspension rather than a forfeiture clause, the court seems to have taken the same view as was expressed in the Wilson Case, it having cited with seeming approval Mutual L. Ins. Co. v. French, as holding "that a condition such as contained in the notes given for premiums in this case did not render the policy void until the company had, by affirmative action, declared the policy forfeited." However, the decision in the Cannedy Case may perhaps be distinguished from others which reached a contrary conclusion, on the ground that here the provision for suspension was in the note, but not in the policy. In fact the court points out that such a provision as the one before it in a premium note, but not in the policy, is nugatory, and also that where the provision for forfeiture is contained in the note equity will relieve against it, for the reason that its object is merely to secure prompt payment of the note, and, as the breach of the agreement to pay promptly can be compensated, equity will relieve against the forfeiture. It is of interest, in connection with this decision, that although there is a difference of opinion as to its validity, the contention has sometimes been advanced that where the provision for suspension in case of nonpayment forms no part of the original contract, but is found only in the note itself, it is in the nature of a condition subsequent, which only becomes operative when the insurer elects to take advantage thereof. For an illustrative case, see Columbian Nat. L. Ins. Co. v. Mulkey (1913) 13 Ga. App. 508, 79 S. E. 482, which, however, does not fall within the scope of the present annotation.

4. Under statute.

In a few instances, statutes relating to suspension and forfeiture of insurance for nonpayment of premium notes, etc., have been enacted, which control the decisions in cases falling within the scope of the present annotation.

For instance, it has been held that a provision ordinarily sufficient automatically to work a suspension does not have that effect where a statute regulating suspension of insurance policies for nonpayment of premium notes has not been complied with. Thus, in Schultz v. Des Moines Mut. Hail & Cyclone Ins. Asso. (1915) 35 S. D. 627, 153 N. W. 884, Ann. Cas. 1917D, 78, where the by-laws of a mutual insurance company provided that a member "should stand suspended," and that the association should not be liable for any loss occurring while any assessments were overdue and unpaid, it was held that such by-law did not, by reason of the nonpayment of an assessment, in law, suspend the policy, where the insurer had not given the notice required by S. D. Civ. Code, § 677, which provided that no policy of insurance should, by virtue of any condition or provision thereof, be suspended for nonpayment of any note or obligation taken for the premium unless the insurer should, among other things, give not less than thirty days' notice of the effect upon the policy of nonpayment, etc. It was said: "Inasmuch as respondent [insured] was not given the notice of assessment required by law, his policy of insurance was not, in point of law, suspended by reason of his nonpayment of his assessment, notwithstanding the provisions of the by-laws of the company. By-laws in conflict with express provisions of statute cannot be sustained. The law requires the officers of the company to give a certain kind of notice. They did not do so. If they intended to suspend that policy, they should have given the notice pointed out in the statute. The fact that the policy was not suspended at the time of the loss, in 1912, was due to their negligence or ignorance of the provisions of our laws."

For another statutory provision which expressly requires that, where a note has been given for a premium on a fire policy, notice must be given the insured before cancellation of the policy for nonpayment, see Antes v. State Ins. Co. (1900) 61 Neb. 55, 84 N. W. 412, which cites an Iowa statute to this effect, but in which the court declined to pass upon the effect of the same upon a provision of the character under consideration in the present annotation, on the ground that the policy in suit was a Nebraska and not an Iowa contract.

III. Provisions requiring affirmative action.

It has been said that "it is only in those cases where the language of the by-laws [contract of insurance] permits of no other construction that the courts hold that the mere failure to pay an assessment within the time, ipso facto, works a suspension or forfeiture. In such cases the member is summarily deprived of his rights in the order [insurance], and such action is not favored, and therefore such provisions are always strictly construed by the courts in favor of the member [insured], and against the order [insurer]." Burchard v. Western Commercial Travelers Asso. (1909) 139 Mo. App. 606, 123 S. W. 973.

However, it seems that few of the cases in which it has been held that the provisions under consideration were not self-operative have actually needed to invoke so broad a rule.

For instance, it has been held that affirmative action is required where the provision is that upon default in payment of dues the delinquent "may be suspended," and that no member shall be suspended "without a fair and impartial trial," etc. Rogers v. Union Benev. Soc. (1901) 111 Ky. 598, 55 L.R.A. 605, 64 S. W. 444.

And it has been held that, even where the contract provides that a delinquent member "shall stand suspended," the provision is not self-operative, if the contract also provides a formal method by which a member may be suspended and his beneficiary certificate canceled. Tourville v. Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen (1894) 54 Ill. App. 71; Scheufler v. Grand Lodge, A. O. U. W. (1891) 45 Minn. 256, 47 N. W. 799; Backdahl v. Grand Lodge, A. O. U. W. (1891) 46 Minn. 61, 48 N. W. 454.

And the fact that a provision that a delinquent member of a mutual benefit association "shall, by that fact, stand suspended" from membership and benefits, was followed by other clauses making provision whereby the lodge might appropriate funds for the payment of deficiencies, has been held to prevent the nonpayment of an assessment, operating ipso facto as a suspension without any action being taken by the lodge in that respect. Flicek v. High Court, C. O. F. (1900) 90 Ill. App. 344; Bange v. Supreme Council, L. H. (1907) 128 Mo. App. 461, 105 S. W. 1092, reaffirmed on subsequent appeal in (1910) 153 Mo. App. 154, 132 S. W. 276, and again in (1913) 179 Mo. App. 21, 161 S. W. 652. See also Murphy v. Independent Order, S. D. J. (1900) 77 Miss. 830, 50 L.R.A. 111, 27 So. 624. However, where the provision is that the association might pay, which privilege is confined to a specified period, it has been held that a refusal upon the part of the order to pay an assessment clearly results in a suspension of the delinquent member. Bange v. Supreme Council, L. H. (1907) 128 Mo. App. 461, 105 S. W. 1092.

And where the contract provides that upon default of the insured or his becoming in arrears he "shall be suspended," and also prescribes a formal method for such suspension, the rule is that default in payment does not ipso facto operate as a suspension from benefits, and that action must be taken in the mode prescribed by the contract. Osterman v. District Grand Lodge, I. O. B. B. (1896) 5 Cal. (Unrep.) 237, 43 Pac. 412. It was further held in that case that under such provisions the failure of a subordinate lodge of a mutual benefit insurance association formally to suspend a delinquent member is not excused by the facts that the assured was secretary of such lodge, and that the failure to institute formal proceedings for suspension was the result of his failure to report his own delinquency.

So, where the charter of a mutual benefit insurance company provided that on default in payment of assessments the delinquent member's insurance "may be suspended or canceled by the secretary or board of directors, . . . provided that when the insurance is suspended or canceled by the secretary an appeal may be made to the board of directors," etc., it has been held that default itself will not work a suspension. Olmstead v. Farmers' Mut. F. Ins. Co. (1883) 50 Mich. 200, 15 N. W. 82. In the course of his argument, Graves, Ch. J., said: "Wherever a forfeiture, whether total or partial, is intended to be authorized on the happening of some state of facts, the provisions for it should never be administered in a form or mode more rigorous than a strict construction against the party seeking or insisting on the forfeiture will fairly justify, and where the question is whether it was the purpose that there should be no forfeiture unless ordered as the result of a hearing; or whether the design was that it should immediately arise from the occurrence of certain facts without any authentic finding of their existence; or, again, whether it was the intention that it might be produced by a mere ex parte and arbitrary determination, it is incumbent on the court to incline strongly towards the first construction. The rule is universal, and it rests upon natural equity, that where the real subject is whether one shall lose a right or another gain an advantage, it will always be intended, if the case will in any wise admit of it, that the matter was meant to be settled by an exercise of judgment respecting the facts, after opportunity given to the parties to be heard. The principle applies. It is inferable from the charter that it was not intended that a forfeiture or suspension should come of itself on a neglect of payment, or be brought about without any hearing, or any considerate judgment on the existence of the necessary facts or the desirability of the thing itself. The secretary or board of directors may suspend or cancel the insurance. Here an act to accomplish the result is contemplated and discretion is distinctly implied, and whether this act is by the secretary or the board, the substantial form and the course of doing it are to be the same. But an appeal is authorized from the secretary. Why require the act referred to or allow the appeal, if the forfeiture or suspension was to result exclusively from a default, or from an ex parte decision? The appeal is not restricted to the company. It is allowed to the other party, and it would be absurd to say that a result subject to be appealed from by the parties was intended to be an ex parte result, or a result not amenable to judgment or discretion, but one inevitable in its nature. The charter provision supposes a determination capable of being appealed from by the parties, and on an occasion on which claims and objections could be urged and decided. It is needless to go further. There was neither any hearing nor any corporate declaration of forfeiture or suspension, and the defense failed wholly on its own theory."

And it has been held that a provision in an insurance policy that, upon failure to pay assessments, the insured "shall be suspended and his certificate become null and void, and all rights and benefits . . . forfeited," when followed by a clause to the effect that "a member who has been suspended for nonpayment of his dues and assessments may be reinstated," does not operate automatically, but requires some affirmative action on the part of the insured. Brooks v. Conservative

L. Ins. Co. (1906) 132 Iowa, 377, 119 Am. St. Rep. 560, 106 N. W. 913, 11 Ann. Cas. 339. In reaching this conclusion, the court said: "The provision in the original certificate with reference to suspension for nonpayment which has already been quoted is not, as we think, self-executing, but implies that to effect such suspension and the consequent forfeiture of all rights and benefits under the certificate, some affirmative action shall be taken by the association, and that only after proper action has been taken does the certificate become null and void. After suspension the member has the right to be reinstated on payment of back dues and assessments and the furnishing of a certificate of good health, and this provision evidently contemplates some act of suspension and notice thereof to the member, after which his privilege to secure reinstatement may be exercised. Under the general rules with reference to forfeitures, and construction of the contract of insurance most strongly against the company, we have no hesitation in reaching the conclusion that the provisions above quoted as to suspension imply an affirmative act on the part of the association or the duly authorized officers thereof." But that a provision relating to the reinstatement of a "suspended" member of a mutual benefit society, even when following a provision which, without qualification, declares that nonpayment of dues shall render the benefit certificate "null and void," does not prevent delinquency from ipso facto suspending and annulling a certificate, see Munger v. Brotherhood of American Yeomen (1915) 176 Iowa, 291, 154 N. W. 879.

And where the laws of a fraternal benefit association provide that a certificate of membership is annulled by the suspension of the beneficiary, it has been held that a forfeiture of benefits does not attach until the delinquent member is actually and legally suspended. Lewis v. Western Funeral Ben. Asso. (1898) 77 Mo. App. 586, citing to the same effect, the case of Puhr v. Grand Lodge, G. O. H., said to be unreported (but see (1898) 77 Mo. App. 47, where a case so entitled is reported).

And it has been held that a provision to the effect that, upon default or failure to pay, the insured "shall be suspended," requires that the suspension be made by some affirmative action of the insurer, and that the mere nonpayment of an assessment does not of itself operate as a suspension, sufficient to cut off benefits. Scheu v. Grand Lodge, O. D. I. F. (1883) 17 Fed. 214; Wilson v. District Council, S. M. W. (1916) 30 Cal. App. 190, 157 Pac. 629; Stiefel v. Amalgamated Sheet Metal Workers' Local Union (1917) 208 Ill. App. 121; Jelly v. Muscatine City & County Mut. Aid Soc. (1903) 120 Iowa, 689, 98 Am. St. Rep. 378, 95 N. W. 197. In Jelly v. Muscatine City & County Mut. Aid Soc. (Iowa) supra, the court, after declaring that it was clear that the clause under consideration was not intended to be self-executing, continued as follows: "Some affirmative action on the part of the association was contemplated before the certificate holder should become suspended. The expression 'shall be suspended,' as the same appears in said article, is declaratory merely of the right of the association to suspend for nonpayment of assessments, and it cannot be said that membership or standing has been lost or forfeited as long as the society does not see fit to exercise such right. A mere delinquency of a member of a mutual benefit association to pay dues or assessments does not defeat his good standing as long as he has a right to pay and the association forbears to take action." And the distinction between cases where the provision is merely "shall be suspended," and cases where the provision is that the insured shall "stand suspended . . . without further notice," was pointed out in the much-cited case of Borgraefe v. Supreme Lodge, K. L. H. (1886) 22 Mo. App. 127. Thompson, J., in construing the latter provision, said: "It was argued in behalf of the plaintiff, at the bar, that there was no forfeiture in this case because the declaration of a forfeiture is a judicial act, and neither Ada lodge, nor any other judicatory having the power to declare a forfeiture, had so adjudged. This contention has no foundation, in view of the fact that under the provision of section three of law two, above quoted, it is not necessary that the lodge or any other judicatory of the order should adjudge a forfeiture against a delinquent member for nonpayment of an assessment for a death benefit, but that, on the contrary, the suspension attaches by operation of law. There is, in view of this provision, a plain distinction between this case and cases which have arisen under the constituting instruments of mutual insurance companies and other benevolent orders of this character, where the governing statute recites that, for the nonpayment of dues or other named delinquency, the member may be suspended by the lodge or other judicatory. Here the member is not suspended until the lodge or other designated judicatory exercises the power of suspension. . . . The reason is that whatever right the lodge or the order may have against the member, for an infraction of its rules, must be sought in conformity with the laws and rules of the order. The remedy therein prescribed must be exhausted before resort can be had to the judicial courts. . . . But where, as in this case, the suspension attaches by operation of law upon an event named, and the member dies before the suspension has been set aside, in conformity with the rules of the order, there can be no recovery upon his benefit certificate."

So, it has been held that a provision of a by-law of a mutual benefit society that upon the failure of a member to pay his dues the lodge "shall suspend him" does not, on failure of a member to pay, ipso facto suspend him without any action upon the part of the lodge. Grand Lodge, F. A. M. v. Dillard (1918) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 162 S. W. 1173.

And in Order of United Commercial Travelers v. McAdam (1903) 61 C. C. A. 22, 125 Fed. 358, in holding that, where it was provided that members, upon failure to pay dues or assessments when due, "shall be suspended from the order at a regular meeting of the council, . . . and from all benefits derived therefrom," the mere failure to pay assessments did not in itself work a suspension, although the quoted provision was followed by another which provided that a defaulting member "shall immediately on the happening of such default, and by virtue thereof, forfeit his good standing . . . and all right to indemnity and benefits of whatsoever character," the court said: "The two provisions aforesaid, standing as they do in juxtaposition, must be read and construed together; and they must be so read in the light of the well-established rule that insurance contracts and other instruments of that nature, whereby an indemnity is promised in case of death or accident, must be construed most strongly against the insurer, and so as to avoid, if possible, a forfeiture of the rights of the insured, where the language employed in formulating the contract gives rise to doubt or uncertainty as to its proper interpretation. As contracts of that nature are formulated by the insurer, and generally with an eye singly to the protection of its own interests, it is the insurer's duty to see to it that the various provisions which they contain are harmonious, and that the intentions of the contracting parties are clearly expressed. . . . It is apparent, therefore, that the subject of suspending a member who is in default is one to be considered and acted upon at a regular meeting of the local council, and the exercise of this power involves the exercise of some discretion on the part of the local body." And see Schwartz v. St. Elizabeth Roman & G. Catholic Union (1907) 21 Ohio C. C. N. S. 165, wherein the court quoted with approval the following statement taken from note 1, page 1087, of 3 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law: "Where a suspension for nonpayment of dues is provided for in the laws of the association [referring to mutual benefit associations], and it is also provided that such suspension shall work a forfeiture of benefits, the fact of delinquency alone does not, ipso facto, work a forfeiture;

a suspension by formal proceedings is necessary."

Where the provisions of contracts of insurance between a mutual benefit association and its members merely indicate that delinquency as to dues and assessments is a ground of suspension, and provide that the insurer must in open conclave declare delinquent members suspended, mere non-payment of an assessment does not amount, ipso facto, to a forfeiture of insurance, in case of the death of the insured during the delinquency. Warwick v. Supreme Conclave, K. D. (1899) 107 Ga. 115, 32 S. E. 951.

Nor does a mere failure to pay dues in a mutual benefit society work a forfeiture of benefits, ipso facto, under constitutional provisions that "the financial secretary shall notify the president when a member has failed to pay the amount assessed in the required time, and the president shall announce the fact to the assembly, and the member shall stand suspended from the order and all benefits thereof," and that "it shall be the duty of the subordinate secretary to notify the general secretary of such suspension, and also notify the member suspended." Petherick v. General Assembly O. A. (1897) 114 Mich. 420, 72 N. W. 262.

And an actual suspension has been held necessary where the contract was that a member failing to pay dues "was to be suspended," and the time therefor was to be fixed by vote of the lodge. Supreme Lodge, K. H. v. Wickser (1888) 72 Tex. 257, 12 S. W. 175.

And it has been held that, where laws of a fraternal benefit society provide that when dues and assessments are three months in arrears, the delinquent members "are suspended in the meeting next following," and that "if they are six months in arrears they are expelled without further action of the guild," the provision first quoted is not self-executing, but requires affirmative action to be operative. Plattdeutsche Grot Gilde v. Ross (1904) 117 Ill. App. 247. In reaching this conclusion, the court said: "It does not appear that the guild ever suspended appellee, or that any action was taken in that regard. The law was not self-executing as regards suspensions. A member, if in arrears for six months, might be 'expelled without further action of the guild;' but it is plain from the difference in phraseology that the framers of the law intended that he should not be suspended without affirmative action by the guild, such as giving notice to the member in default and passing a resolution of suspension."

And that a by-law of a mutual benefit society to the effect that on due report of the default of a member to the lodge he shall "be declared to be suspended from membership, he having been first notified of the action that would be taken," is not self-operative, see Dale v. Weston Lodge (1896) 24 Ont. App. Rep. 351.

For a decision which is controlled by statute and in which the provision was held not self-operative, see Schultz v. Des Moines Mut. Hail & Cyclone Ins. Asso. (1915) 35 S. D. 627, 153 N. W. 884, Ann. Cas. 1917D, 78, as set out and quoted supra, II. b, 4.

For decisions which require affirmative action, where the suspension clause was contained in a premium note and not in the contract of insurance itself, see supra, II. b, 3.

IV. Where whole subordinate body or branch suspended.

It has been held that where the constitution of a mutual benefit insurance association provides that any subordinate lodge in arrears for dues "shall be suspended," and notified thereof, and remain suspended until reinstated, and that the members of such a subordinate lodge are not insured during such period of disability, the provisions are not self-executing and cannot be asserted as a defense against the claim of a member of a subordinate lodge which is in arrears, as to dues to the grand lodge, in the absence of a showing of a literal and exact compliance with the constitutional provisions. District Grand Lodge, U. O. O. F. v. Hill (1911) 3 Ala. App. 483, 57 So. 147. G. J. C.

DRAKE OIL COMPANY, Plff. in Err.

(— W. Va. —, 97 S. E. 414.)

Mines — lease of gas from wells — effect on operations for oil.

Where a lessee under an oil lease contracts with another to sell him the gas produced from oil wells on the premises, to be used in the manufacture of gasoline, he does not, in the absence of words indicating an intention to restrict his right to develop and exploit the oil field, debar himself from the use of such means for stimulating the flow of oil as science and experience have proved to be advantageous, even though as a result thereof the gas may lose some of its gasoline properties.

Headnote by LYNCH, J.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Wood County to review a judgment in favor of plaintiffs in an action brought to recover damages alleged to have been sustained to their gasoline plant, and for alleged obstruction of their business by reason of defendant's acts. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Kreps, Russell, & Hiteshew, Clyde B. Johnson, and W. E. Sykes, for plaintiff in error:

The question of whether or not the defendant conducted its oil operations in a manner not contemplated by contract became an issue of fact to be decided by the jury; and the burden of proof was on the plaintiffs to prove that the defendant conducted its oil operations in a manner not contemplated by the gasoline contract.

11 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. 335; Probst v. Braeunlich, 24 W. Va. 361; Robinson v. Kistler, 62 W. Va. 489, 59 S. E. 505; Rosenthal v. Fox, 70 W. Va. 752, 74 S. E. 959; Henderson v. Hazlett, 75 W. Va. 256, 83 S. E. 907.

The principle of law that before the jury could find for the plaintiffs the jury must believe that gasoline was being produced from the plant of the plaintiffs in paying quantities, having been laid down in the plaintiffs' instruction, in so far as they are concerned it must be considered as absolutely binding.

The evidence must be plainly and manifestly insufficient to warrant a court in setting aside a verdict.

The evidence was overwhelming to the effect that gasoline was not being produced in paying quantities from the plaintiffs' plant, and the court erred in setting aside the verdict, and would have erred had the evidence on this point been doubtful, as it was a matter for the jury.

Messrs. Kimball & Sugden also for plaintiff in error.

Mr. F. P. Moats for defendants in error.

Lynch, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The Drake Oil Company, a partnership, the predecessor in title of the defendant Drake Oil Company, a corporation, none of whose stockholders were members of the partnership, owned and operated oil wells upon lands leased for oil and gas purposes, and on February 8, 1911, sold unto W. C. Patterson, Jr., the right to take, pipe, and utilize gas from the oil wells, and out of it manufacture gasoline on the leased premises; he to furnish at his expense the instrumentalities necessary and usual in the process of producing gasoline, and to pay to the owners of the wells a stipulated share of the profits derived from the business. The partnership sold its wells and leases to Hyde and others, who incorporated the Drake Oil Company, and plaintiffs, Beeson and others, acquired from Patterson his rights under the contract, the buildings erected, machinery installed, and pipe lines laid by him to convey the gas to the plant, and on May 17, 1913, began and continued to produce gasoline until May 30, 1916, when they abandoned the enterprise, wrecked the plant, sold its component parts, and from it realized approximately one fourth the original cost of the establishment. The abandonment and cessation of the business, plaintiffs allege in their declaration, necessarily resulted from defendant's installation and application of a patented process used to accelerate oil production from the wells by the forced injection of air at high pressure, whereby they further allege the vaporous properties of the gas were destroyed by absorption or combination with the air, and thereby unfitted for use in the manufacture of gasoline, to their great financial loss and damage, wherefore they brought this action. The Drake Oil Company assigns as erroneous the action of the court in setting aside the verdict for defendant and in granting plaintiffs another trial.

Upon the date of the grant to Patterson and his assignment to the plaintiffs, and thereafter and during the operation of the gasoline manufacturing plant, the partnership and its successors, the corporation of the same name, continually prosecuted the business of producing oil from the leased premises. The continuation of the productive operation for oil contemporaneously with the operation of the gasoline manufacturing plant seems certainly to have been in the contemplation of the parties at the date of the contract. Such unity and continuity of operation, it may be said, was essential to the prosecution of the business enterprise pursued by the plaintiffs. The wells were drilled several years prior to the date of the Patterson contract, and though at first producing oil in large quantities, production later had materially diminished to such an extent, it appears, that their daily average then was about two and one half barrels for each of the nineteen wells, that average being maintained only by means of one or more vacuum pumps, a process commonly resorted to in order to stimulate the production of oil or gas, or both, in deteriorated or decadent wells. Such, it is agreed, and not denied, was the condition of the wells owned and controlled by the Drake Oil Company, the partnership, at the date of the contract involved, and its assignment to the plaintiffs, and during their ownership and exercise of the rights thereby conferred, until in lieu of the suction process defendant substituted the air compression process, a process more powerful and efficacious, and more modern, in invigorating and stimulating the oil production capacity of oil and gas wells. Such was the situation confronting the parties to this action, and those through whom they acquired their respective rights, at the time of their acquisition, and before the installation and operation of the substituted process.

If, as plaintiffs claim, the relation of landlord and tenant was established by the Patterson contract, and remained until interrupted by the acts complained of, nevertheless the circumstances detailed clearly indicate that the rights said to have been unlawfully impaired were subordinate to the rights of the defendant to extract oil from the premises which it owned and controlled through wells thereon, without liability, unless they wilfully interrupted or destroyed the subordinate rights and privileges of the plaintiffs. Wrongfulness and wilfulness are the charges preferred by the declaration; but the proof in support of averments in this respect falls far short of establishing as true the facts so averred. On the contrary, defendant, through its chief officers, offered to purchase plaintiffs' plant before the installation of the air compressor apparatus, an offer which plaintiffs declined to accept, because, they say, it was inadequate to compensate them for the outlay and expenses of the plant, and in lieu thereof they later elected to dismantle, junk, and dispose of it for an amount in excess of the offer. The offer, though inadequate, is significant only as tending to negative an intentional injury to the plaintiffs; at least, not to warrant the conclusion of the existence of sinister motives, prompting the action and conduct of the defendant's officers and agents.

Before the installation of the air compressor plant the suction of the pumps used under the old process had ceased to be effective in stimulating the productive capacity of the wells, and though the effect of the former upon the gasoline properties of the gas is doubtfully questionable, as we shall later see, certainly according to the proof the quantity and volume of the gas was increased commensurately and correspondingly with the increased production of oil, due to the substituted process. Obviously, the difficulty thereafter confronting plaintiffs in the manufacture of gasoline was the want of a plant large enough and powerful enough to meet the changed conditions brought about by the new situation.

The proposition that the injection of air into oil and gas producing wells renders gas flowing therefrom unfit for the manufacture of gasoline is not established clearly by the proof addressed to that subject. The weight of the evidence shows the fact to be otherwise. Although the latter instance necessitates the use of a higher degree of power to solve the manufacturing problems so presented, operators skilled in the oil and gas business, and incidentally in the production of gasoline, testifying in the case and basing their opinions upon their own personal experience, frankly, fairly, and unequivocally declare that the commingling of air with gas in an oil and gas well under pressure, to promote the production of oil therefrom, does not rob the gas of its gasolene qualities, but does require a more powerful compressive force to separate the lighter or vaporous element from the gas so burdened with air. Indeed, there seems to be a general concurrence of evidential opinion among the witnesses on this subject. Evidence to the contrary is slight and inconclusive.

Equally without merit is plaintiffs' contention, the one upon which they chiefly rely, that under the contract by which defendant sold to them all the gas produced from the oil wells on the leased premises, he may not now interfere with the supply or quality of such gas by the change of process from suction to compressed air. The pertinent part of the agreement between plaintiffs and defendant is: "The said Drake Oil Company by these presents does sell, assign, and transfer to said Patterson, his heirs and assigns, all gas produced from the oil wells now owned by the said Drake Oil Company on the leases hereafter described, and all gas produced from wells which said Drake Oil Company may hereafter drill thereon, reserving, however, to said Drake Oil Company enough gas to run the engines which it now has upon said leases, and such other engines as it from time to time may see fit to install or operate on said leases."

It evidently was the purpose and intention of the parties to the agreement that plaintiffs should become the purchaser of the gas produced merely as an incident of oil production. They did not deal with the wells as the subject-matter of the contract, but with the gas emanating from them. The ownership of the wells was not transferred to Patterson. Nothing in the agreement indicates that the right to use the gas was regarded otherwise than as incidental and subordinate to the development for oil. It cannot be assumed that defendant or its grantors intended to waive any right they possessed to use reasonably appropriate means or methods to stimulate the flow of oil, and the contract contains no language which expressly or by implication constitutes such a waiver. Indeed, it was a duty which defendant owed to his lessor to use all reasonable means to maintain the flow of oil. That duty existed before the date of the contract under which plaintiffs claim, wherefore their rights necessarily are subordinate thereto.

Hence, where a lessee under an oil lease contracts with another to sell him for gasolene purposes all gas produced from oil wells on the leased premises, he does not, in the absence of words indicating an intention to restrict his right to develop and exploit the oil field, debar himself from the use of such means as science and experience have proved to be advantageous, even though as a result thereof the gas may lose some of its gasolene properties.

What has been said sufficiently disposes of the question whether the contract on which plaintiffs rely had or had not terminated because of their inability to operate their plant as a profit; the contract providing that it should continue "so long as said Patterson out of the gas is able to manufacture gasolene in paying quantities."

Judgment below reversed, and judgment for defendant entered here on the verdict.

NOTE.

No other case has been found that has construed a contract respecting oil wells like that in the reported case (BEESON v. DRAKE OIL CO. ante, 414) as to its effect in restricting the methods of operation of the wells.

JOHN S. CHAMBERS, Comptroller of the State of California.

(— Cal. —, 185 Pac. 855.)

Statutes — part unconstitutional — separation.

1. The provisions in an act regulating the licensing of real estate brokers, conferring power upon the licensing officer to revoke a license in case the licensee is guilty of certain acts, and providing for a review of his acts by the court, are separable from the balance of the statute so as not to defeat the whole act if they are unconstitutional because conferring judicial power.

License — right to regulate lawful business.

2. A lawful and useful occupation may be subjected to regulation in the public interest, the test being whether or not the limitation imposed is really by way of regulation only, and is one whose purpose and effect go no further than throwing reasonable safeguards around the exercise of the right.

[See 17 R. C. L. 541.]

Broker — requiring certificate of good character.

3. Requiring an applicant for a license to do business as a real estate broker to file with his application a certificate of good character is reasonable.

— evidence of character — right to require.

4. One may be required to furnish evidence of good moral character or reputation to secure a license to do business as a real estate broker.

License — arbitrary power to refuse — construction.

5. Arbitrary power to refuse licenses to engage in the business of real estate broker is not conferred upon the licensing officer, where he is required to issue the license upon the presentation by the applicant of a certificate of good character, unless the officer is not satisfied that he has, in fact, the required qualifications of honesty, truthfulness, and good reputation.

[See 17 R. C. L. 532.]

Constitutional law — discrimination — power of head of one department.

6. Conferring power upon the head of one department to fix the salaries of his assistants, which power is not conferred upon the heads of other departments, is not unconstitutional discrimination.

7. Making a statute requiring licensing of real estate brokers apply to collectors of rent, when not applying to other collectors, is not an unconstitutional discrimination.

Broker — licenses — exception of person having power of attorney.

8. A provision in a statute requiring real estate brokers to secure licenses, that it shall not apply to persons holding a duly executed power of attorney from the owner, applies only to persons having authority to act for the principal in consummating the transaction as distinguished from merely negotiating it, and is not an unreasonable discrimination.

— discrimination between brokers and salesmen.

9. A larger fee and a different character of certificate may be required from a real estate broker, in order to secure a license to do business, than from a mere salesman in his employ.

— discrimination between trustees.

10. The express exception of a trustee selling under a deed of trust from a statute requiring real estate brokers to secure licenses does not discriminate against trustees leasing, renting, or collecting rents, where the latter are not included in the act.

Messrs. J. L. Atteridge and Wesley E. Marten for respondent.

Messrs. Fry & Wood, amici curiæ.

Olney, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The legislature of 1919 passed an act (Stat. 1919, p. 1252) purporting to regulate the business of acting as a real estate broker or salesman in California, creating a state real estate department with an official having the title of real estate commissioner at its head, and providing for the payment of the expenses of the department out of a certain fund in the state treasury. The petitioner, Ray L. Riley, was appointed real estate commissioner, incurred certain expenses on account of his department, and sought their payment out of the state treasury in the manner provided by the act. The respondent, the state comptroller, reipso facto operate as a suspension from benefits, and that action must be taken in the mode prescribed by the contract. Osterman v. District Grand Lodge, I. O. B. B. (1896) 5 Cal. (Unrep.) 237, 43 Pac. 412. It was further held in that case that under such provisions the failure of a subordinate lodge of a mutual benefit insurance association formally to suspend a delinquent member is not excused by the facts that the assured was secretary of such lodge, and that the failure to institute formal proceedings for suspension was the result of his failure to report his own delinquency.

So, where the charter of a mutual benefit insurance company provided that on default in payment of assessments the delinquent member's insurance "may be suspended or canceled by the secretary or board of directors, . . . provided that when the insurance is suspended or canceled by the secretary an appeal may be made to the board of directors," etc., it has been held that default itself will not work a suspension. Olmstead v. Farmers' Mut. F. Ins. Co. (1883) 50 Mich. 200, 15 N. W. 82. In the course of his argument, Graves, Ch. J., said: "Wherever a forfeiture, whether total or partial, is intended to be authorized on the happening of some state of facts, the provisions for it should never be administered in a form or mode more rigorous than a strict construction against the party seeking or insisting on the forfeiture will fairly justify, and where the question is whether it was the purpose that there should be no forfeiture unless ordered as the result of a hearing; or whether the design was that it should immediately arise from the occurrence of certain facts without any authentic finding of their existence; or, again, whether it was the intention that it might be produced by a mere ex parte and arbitrary determination, it is incumbent on the court to incline strongly towards the first construction. The rule is universal, and it rests upon natural equity, that where the real subject is whether one shall lose a right or another gain an advantage, it will always be intended, if the case will in any wise admit of it, that the matter was meant to be settled by an exercise of judgment respecting the facts, after opportunity given to the parties to be heard. The principle applies. It is inferable from the charter that it was not intended that a forfeiture or suspension should come of itself on a neglect of payment, or be brought about without any hearing, or any considerate judgment on the existence of the necessary facts or the desirability of the thing itself. The secretary or board of directors may suspend or cancel the insurance. Here an act to accomplish the result is contemplated and discretion is distinctly implied, and whether this act is by the secretary or the board, the substantial form and the course of doing it are to be the same. But an appeal is authorized from the secretary. Why require the act referred to or allow the appeal, if the forfeiture or suspension was to result exclusively from a default, or from an ex parte decision? The appeal is not restricted to the company. It is allowed to the other party, and it would be absurd to say that a result subject to be appealed from by the parties was intended to be an ex parte result, or a result not amenable to judgment or discretion, but one inevitable in its nature. The charter provision supposes a determination capable of being appealed from by the parties, and on an occasion on which claims and objections could be urged and decided. It is needless to go further. There was neither any hearing nor any corporate declaration of forfeiture or suspension, and the defense failed wholly on its own theory."

And it has been held that a provision in an insurance policy that, upon failure to pay assessments, the insured "shall be suspended and his certificate become null and void, and all rights and benefits . . . forfeited," when followed by a clause to the effect that "a member who has been suspended for nonpayment of his dues and assessments may be reinstated," does not operate automatically, but requires some affirmative action on the part of the insured. Brooks v. Conservative

L. Ins. Co. (1906) 132 Iowa, 377, 119 Am. St. Rep. 560, 106 N. W. 913, 11 Ann. Cas. 339. In reaching this conclusion, the court said: "The provision in the original certificate with reference to suspension for nonpayment which has already been quoted is not, as we think, self-executing, but implies that to effect such suspension and the consequent forfeiture of all rights and benefits under the certificate, some affirmative action shall be taken by the association, and that only after proper action has been taken does the certificate become null and void. After suspension the member has the right to be reinstated on payment of back dues and assessments and the furnishing of a certificate of good health, and this provision evidently contemplates some act of suspension and notice thereof to the member, after which his privilege to secure reinstatement may be exercised. Under the general rules with reference to forfeitures, and construction of the contract of insurance most strongly against the company, we have no hesitation in reaching the conclusion that the provisions above quoted as to suspension imply an affirmative act on the part of the association or the duly authorized officers thereof." But that a provision relating to the reinstatement of a "suspended" member of a mutual benefit society, even when following a provision which, without qualification, declares that nonpayment of dues shall render the benefit certificate "null and void," does not prevent delinquency from ipso facto suspending and annulling a certificate, see Munger v. Brotherhood of American Yeomen (1915) 176 Iowa, 291, 154 N. W. 879.

And where the laws of a fraternal benefit association provide that a certificate of membership is annulled by the suspension of the beneficiary, it has been held that a forfeiture of benefits does not attach until the delinquent member is actually and legally suspended. Lewis v. Western Funeral Ben. Asso. (1898) 77 Mo. App. 586, citing to the same effect, the case of Puhr v. Grand Lodge, G. O. H., said to be unreported (but see (1898) 77 Mo. App. 47, where a case so entitled is reported).

And it has been held that a provision to the effect that, upon default or failure to pay, the insured "shall be suspended," requires that the suspension be made by some affirmative action of the insurer, and that the mere nonpayment of an assessment does not of itself operate as a suspension, sufficient to cut off benefits. Scheu v. Grand Lodge, O. D. I. F. (1883) 17 Fed. 214; Wilson v. District Council, S. M. W. (1916) 30 Cal. App. 190, 157 Pac. 629; Stiefel v. Amalgamated Sheet Metal Workers' Local Union (1917) 208 Ill. App. 121; Jelly v. Muscatine City & County Mut. Aid Soc. (1903) 120 Iowa, 689, 98 Am. St. Rep. 378, 95 N. W. 197. In Jelly v. Muscatine City & County Mut. Aid Soc. (Iowa) supra, the court, after declaring that it was clear that the clause under consideration was not intended to be self-executing, continued as follows: "Some affirmative action on the part of the association was contemplated before the certificate holder should become suspended. The expression 'shall be suspended,' as the same appears in said article, is declaratory merely of the right of the association to suspend for nonpayment of assessments, and it cannot be said that membership or standing has been lost or forfeited as long as the society does not see fit to exercise such right. A mere delinquency of a member of a mutual benefit association to pay dues or assessments does not defeat his good standing as long as he has a right to pay and the association forbears to take action." And the distinction between cases where the provision is merely "shall be suspended," and cases where the provision is that the insured shall "stand suspended . . . without further notice," was pointed out in the much-cited case of Borgraefe v. Supreme Lodge, K. L. H. (1886) 22 Mo. App. 127. Thompson, J., in construing the latter provision, said: "It was argued in behalf of the plaintiff, at the bar, that there was no forfeiture in this case because the declaration of a forfeiture is a judicial act, and neither Ada lodge, nor any other judicatory having the power to declare a forfeiture, had so adjudged. This contention has no foundation, in view of the fact that under the provision of section three of law two, above quoted, it is not necessary that the lodge or any other judicatory of the order should adjudge a forfeiture against a delinquent member for nonpayment of an assessment for a death benefit, but that, on the contrary, the suspension attaches by operation of law. There is, in view of this provision, a plain distinction between this case and cases which have arisen under the constituting instruments of mutual insurance companies and other benevolent orders of this character, where the governing statute recites that, for the nonpayment of dues or other named delinquency, the member may be suspended by the lodge or other judicatory. Here the member is not suspended until the lodge or other designated judicatory exercises the power of suspension. . . . The reason is that whatever right the lodge or the order may have against the member, for an infraction of its rules, must be sought in conformity with the laws and rules of the order. The remedy therein prescribed must be exhausted before resort can be had to the judicial courts. . . . But where, as in this case, the suspension attaches by operation of law upon an event named, and the member dies before the suspension has been set aside, in conformity with the rules of the order, there can be no recovery upon his benefit certificate."

So, it has been held that a provision of a by-law of a mutual benefit society that upon the failure of a member to pay his dues the lodge "shall suspend him" does not, on failure of a member to pay, ipso facto suspend him without any action upon the part of the lodge. Grand Lodge, F. A. M. v. Dillard (1918) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 162 S. W. 1173.

And in Order of United Commercial Travelers v. McAdam (1903) 61 C. C. A. 22, 125 Fed. 358, in holding that, where it was provided that members, upon failure to pay dues or assessments when due, "shall be suspended from the order at a regular meeting of the council, . . . and from all benefits derived therefrom," the mere failure to pay assessments did not in itself work a suspension, although the quoted provision was followed by another which provided that a defaulting member "shall immediately on the happening of such default, and by virtue thereof, forfeit his good standing . . . and all right to indemnity and benefits of whatsoever character," the court said: "The two provisions aforesaid, standing as they do in juxtaposition, must be read and construed together; and they must be so read in the light of the well-established rule that insurance contracts and other instruments of that nature, whereby an indemnity is promised in case of death or accident, must be construed most strongly against the insurer, and so as to avoid, if possible, a forfeiture of the rights of the insured, where the language employed in formulating the contract gives rise to doubt or uncertainty as to its proper interpretation. As contracts of that nature are formulated by the insurer, and generally with an eye singly to the protection of its own interests, it is the insurer's duty to see to it that the various provisions which they contain are harmonious, and that the intentions of the contracting parties are clearly expressed. . . . It is apparent, therefore, that the subject of suspending a member who is in default is one to be considered and acted upon at a regular meeting of the local council, and the exercise of this power involves the exercise of some discretion on the part of the local body." And see Schwartz v. St. Elizabeth Roman & G. Catholic Union (1907) 21 Ohio C. C. N. S. 165, wherein the court quoted with approval the following statement taken from note 1, page 1087, of 3 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law: "Where a suspension for nonpayment of dues is provided for in the laws of the association [referring to mutual benefit associations], and it is also provided that such suspension shall work a forfeiture of benefits, the fact of delinquency alone does not, ipso facto, work a forfeiture;

Where the provisions of contracts of insurance between a mutual benefit association and its members merely indicate that delinquency as to dues and assessments is a ground of suspension, and provide that the insurer must in open conclave declare delinquent members suspended, mere non-payment of an assessment does not amount, ipso facto, to a forfeiture of insurance, in case of the death of the insured during the delinquency. Warwick v. Supreme Conclave, K. D. (1899) 107 Ga. 115, 32 S. E. 951.

Nor does a mere failure to pay dues in a mutual benefit society work a forfeiture of benefits, ipso facto, under constitutional provisions that "the financial secretary shall notify the president when a member has failed to pay the amount assessed in the required time, and the president shall announce the fact to the assembly, and the member shall stand suspended from the order and all benefits thereof," and that "it shall be the duty of the subordinate secretary to notify the general secretary of such suspension, and also notify the member suspended." Petherick v. General Assembly O. A. (1897) 114 Mich. 420, 72 N. W. 262.

And an actual suspension has been held necessary where the contract was that a member failing to pay dues "was to be suspended," and the time therefor was to be fixed by vote of the lodge. Supreme Lodge, K. H. v. Wickser (1888) 72 Tex. 257, 12 S. W. 175.

And it has been held that, where laws of a fraternal benefit society provide that when dues and assessments are three months in arrears, the delinquent members "are suspended in the meeting next following," and that "if they are six months in arrears they are expelled without further action of the guild," the provision first quoted is not self-executing, but requires affirmative action to be operative. Plattdeutsche Grot Gilde v. Ross (1904) 117 Ill. App. 247. In reaching this conclusion, the court said: "It does not appear that the guild ever suspended appellee, or that any action was taken in that regard. The law was not self-executing as regards suspensions. A member, if in arrears for six months, might be 'expelled without further action of the guild;' but it is plain from the difference in phraseology that the framers of the law intended that he should not be suspended without affirmative action by the guild, such as giving notice to the member in default and passing a resolution of suspension."

And that a by-law of a mutual benefit society to the effect that on due report of the default of a member to the lodge he shall "be declared to be suspended from membership, he having been first notified of the action that would be taken," is not self-operative, see Dale v. Weston Lodge (1896) 24 Ont. App. Rep. 351.

For a decision which is controlled by statute and in which the provision was held not self-operative, see Schultz v. Des Moines Mut. Hail & Cyclone Ins. Asso. (1915) 35 S. D. 627, 153 N. W. 884, Ann. Cas. 1917D, 78, as set out and quoted supra, II. b, 4.

For decisions which require affirmative action, where the suspension clause was contained in a premium note and not in the contract of insurance itself, see supra, II. b, 3.

IV. Where whole subordinate body or branch suspended.

It has been held that where the constitution of a mutual benefit insurance association provides that any subordinate lodge in arrears for dues "shall be suspended," and notified thereof, and remain suspended until reinstated, and that the members of such a subordinate lodge are not insured during such period of disability, the provisions are not self-executing and cannot be asserted as a defense against the claim of a member of a subordinate lodge which is in arrears, as to dues to the grand lodge, in the absence of a showing of a literal and exact compliance with the constitutional provisions. District Grand Lodge, U. O. O. F. v. Hill (1911) 3 Ala. App. 483, 57 So. 147. G. J. C.

distinguished from authority to consummate the transaction. If this be so, they argue in effect, and argue truly, any broker, while continuing to act solely as a broker, may yet escape from the restrictions of the act by always securing written authority, and there is no reason why any distinction should be made between brokers who always act under written authority and those who do not, so far as subjecting them to regulation is concerned.

Such a construction of the act, however, is not a reasonable one. It would not only render the act invalid, but, even if it did not do this, it would practically render it ineffective, since, as has been said, any broker could secure escape from its provisions merely by being careful to secure written authority in every case. A much more natural construction is that by power of attorney is meant

tion of person
of attorney.

written authority to act for and in place of the principal in consummating the transaction as distinguished from merely negotiating it. This construction removes the objection of unreasonable discrimination; for such an agent is much more than a broker, and there is nothing unreasonable in not applying to him the regulations applicable to brokers.

A third distinction urged by amici curiæ as unreasonable is that between brokers and salesmen. The discriminations between the two made by the act are that brokers pay an annual license fee of $10 and salesmen of $2, and the former is required to furnish certificates of character by two landowners, while the latter furnish certificates by their employers. But certainly a larger fee and a different certificate may reasonably be exacted from a broker engaged in business for himself than are exacted from a salesman working for another.

tion between brokers and salesmen.

The fourth point of amici curiæ is that trustees selling under a deed of trust are excepted, and no exception is made of trustees doing anything else than selling, such as leasing, or renting, or collecting rents. The reply is that trustees, whether selling or doing something else, do not come within the purview of the act. The express exception of trustees selling under a deed of trust adds nothing, and the act would be the same if it made no mention of trustees.

trustees.

The fifth point made by amici curiæ is that officers of a corporation licensed to do business as real estate brokers may act as brokers or salesmen without being subject to the requirements of the act. Suffice it to say that we do not so read the act.

There are a number of other objections made, but, inasmuch as counsel themselves say that they are made not so much to impeach the validity of the act as to show its injustice, a consideration addressable to the legislature, but not to us, no discussion of them is required.

It is ordered that the writ issue as prayed.

ANNOTATION.

Constitutionality of statute or ordinance requiring real estate brokers to procure a license.

It has been held that the legislature may tax real estate brokers where that body is left unrestricted by the Constitution as to the manner in which privileges shall be taxed. Wiltzie v. State (1873) 8 Heisk. (Tenn.) 544.

The power of a municipality to impose a license fee upon real estate brokers has generally been sustained. Little Rock v. Barton (1878) 33 Ark. 436; Braun v. Chicago (1884) 110 Ill. 186; Covington v. Herzog (1903) 116 Ky. 725, 76 S. W. 538; St. Louis v. McCann (1900) 157 Mo. 301, 57 S. W. 1016. Such an ordinance has been sustained as a valid exercise of the police power. Little Rock v. Barton (Ark.) supra; Braun v. Chicago (1884) 110 Ill. 186; St. Louis v. McCann (Mo.) supra. Such licenses have also been sustained upon the theory that they are a tax; the requirement as to uniformity is held to extend only to persons of the same class. Braun v. Chicago (1884) 110 Ill. 186.

A municipality which has power to tax brokers generally may tax certain brokers without taxing others. Pittsburg v. Coyle (1894) 165 Pa. 61, 30 Atl. 452. The tax in this case was imposed upon real estate and merchandise brokers. It was urged that the imposition of a tax upon the two designated classes of brokers, and not upon all other classes, violated a constitutional provision that taxation should be uniform upon the same class of objects within the territorial limits of the authority levying the tax. In denying this contention, the court states: "We are unable to see that there is any violation of that provision in this case. It is true that two classes of brokers only are named, to wit, merchandise brokers and real estate brokers, but all the members of each class are taxed alike. There might be very sufficient reasons for taxing the business of stockbrokers, either by an act of the legislature or by an authorized municipal ordinance, yet it could hardly be contended that such taxation would be void if all other classes of brokers were not included. . . . In this case, the subject of taxation being brokers, and there being many different kinds of brokers, we are of opinion that the classification of the different kinds, and the taxation of some of them, constitute a lawful exercise of the taxing power, although there may be other classes of brokers that are not taxed."

The statute sustained in the reported case (RILEY v. CHAMBERS, ante, 418) not only imposed a license fee upon real estate brokers, but required the broker to obtain a certificate of good character as a condition precedent to the issuing of the license.

Assuming that there is the right to impose a license fee upon real estate brokers, there is still the question where the provisions of the particular statute or ordinance are valid.

The exemption of real estate dealers and contractors whose business does not amount to $1,000 per annum, from the operation of an ordinance imposing a license tax for the privilege of transacting business, has been held unconstitutional and void as class legislation, where such contractors and dealers are classified with other persons effecting sales, to whom a similar exemption is not allowed. Com. use of Titusville v. Clark (1900) 195 Pa. 634, 57 L.R.A. 348, 86 Am. St. Rep. 694, 46 S. W. 236.

The power of the state to levy a tax upon real estate brokers who transact business in cities, graduating the tax according to the class of the city, has been denied. Hager v. Walker (1908) 128 Ky. 1, 15 L.R.A.(N.S.) 195, 129 Am. St. Rep. 238, 107 S. W. 254. And see the reported case (RILEY v. CHAMBERS) as to requirements of the statute there involved. W. A. E.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the District Court for Harrison County (Wheeler, J.) in favor of plaintiff in a bastardy proceeding.
Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Burke & Tamisiea, for appellant:

The one whose relations are such that he stands in loco parentis the law esteems the father, and will not, for various reasons, inquire by whom the child was begotten.

Wallace v. Wallace, 137 Iowa, 44, 14 L.R.A. (N.S.) 544, 126 Am. St. Rep. 253, 114 N. W. 527, 15 Ann. Cas. 761.

Stevens, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Minnie Kuhlman, who was then unmarried, was on May 29, 1914, delivered of an illegitimate child, and on November 3, 1915, she married Paul Burkhardt. On February 2, 1916, a complaint charging defendant with the paternity of the child, and asking judgment in the sum of $3,000, and an order charging the defendant with the maintenance thereof, was filed in the office of the clerk of the district court of Harrison county. A trial was had to a jury, resulting in a verdict of guilty. The defendant on the trial denied that he at any time sustained illicit relations with the mother, and sought to show facts from which the jury might infer that Burkhardt was the father of the child. The evidence offered was, however, wholly insufficient for that purpose.

Mrs. Burkhardt testified that her husband came to see her about a week after the child was born, at which time a marriage between them was discussed. The sole reliance of defendant for reversal is his contention that Paul Burkhardt, by his marriage to the mother of the child, stands to it in the relation of a parent, and that, as the marriage occurred during the period while the child received nourishment from the mother, the doctrine of State v. Shoemaker, 62 Iowa, 343, 19 Am. Rep. 146, 17 N. W. 589, to the effect that a party marrying a pregnant woman is presumed to be the father of the child, is applicable. We fail to find any reason for applying the doctrine of that case to the case at bar. The reason of the rule announced in State v. Shoemaker, supra, is stated as follows: "One who marries a woman known by him to be enceinte is regarded by the law as adopting into his family the child at its birth. He could not expect that the mother, upon its birth, would discard the child and refuse to give it nurture and maintenance. The law would forbid a thing so unnatural. The child, receiving its support from the mother, must of necessity become one of her family, which is equally the family of the husband. The child, then, is received into the family of the husband, who stands as to it in loco parentis. This being the law, it enters into the marriage contract between the mother and husband. When this relation is established, the law raises a conclusive presumption that the husband is the father of his wife's illegitimate child. We must not be understood to hold that this rule prevails in cases involving questions of heirship and inheritance. In these cases the rights of others besides the husband and bastard arise. In this case, the rights and liabilities of the husband and child are alone involved; they rest upon the relations which impose upon the husband the duty of maintaining the child. Our conclusion is supported by public policy, and considerations which work for the peace and well-being of families. A husband who, in the manner we have indicated, has put himself in loco parentis of a bastard child of his wife, ought not to be permitted to disturb the family relation, and bring scandal upon his wife and her child, by establishing its bastardy, after he has condoned the wife's offense by taking her in marriage."

Bastardy—presumption of paternity from marrying mother.

(— Iowa, —, 174 N. W. 934.)

But in this case no presumption under the facts could arise that Paul Burkhart is the father of the child, and the mere fact that at the time of the marriage the child received sustenance from the mother, and presumptively would become a member of the family, does not call for the application of the foregoing rule. No doubt, however, in making an order for the support of the child, this fact should be taken into consideration by the court; but it does not constitute a defense to the charge contained in the information. The relation of the father to the child and society would remain; but, of course, the husband will not, on account thereof, be relieved of the burden assumed by the marriage to the mother of a wholly dependent infant, at least so long as it continues to be a member of the family. Menefee v. Chesley, 98 Iowa, 55, 66 N. W. 1038. As bearing upon the question above discussed, see State v. Romaine, 58 Iowa, 46, 11 N. W. 721; Wallace v. Wallace, 137 Iowa, 37, 14 L.R.A. (N.S.) 544, 126 Am. St. Rep. 253, 114 N. W. 527, 15 Ann. Cas. 761. We have examined the record with care, but find no reversible error therein.

The judgment of the court below is therefore affirmed.

"But if the issue be born within a month or a day after marriage, between parties of full lawful age, the child is legitimate." 2 Co. Litt. 244a.

"Conception during wedlock is not essential to the presumption of legitimacy which arises from birth in wedlock." Zachmann v. Zachmann (1903) 201 Ill. 380, 94 Am. St. Rep. 180, 66 N. E. 256.

In Rex v. Luffe (1807) 8 East, 193, 103 Eng. Reprint, 316, Mr. Justice Lawrence said: "By the civil law, if the parents marry any time before the birth of the child, it was legitimate; and our laws so far adopt the same rule, that if a man marry a woman who is with child, it raises a presumption that it is his own."

"The rule of the common law is that if a man marry a woman who is with child, it raises a presumption that the child with which she is pregnant was begotten by him. This presumption is founded on the supposed acknowledgment of paternity by the subsequent act of marriage, and although such presumption is liable to be rebutted, yet, in the absence of proof, it stands." Reynolds v. Reynolds (1862) 3 Allen (Mass.) 605.

"Born in wedlock, the presumption of the legitimacy of the child obtains, even though this happen so soon after marriage as to render it certain that it was the result of coition prior thereto." Wallace v. Wallace (1908) 137 Iowa, 37, 14 L.R.A. (N.S.) 544, 126 Am.

St. Rep. 253, 114 N. W. 527, 15 Ann. Cas. 761.

In State v. Herman (1852) 35 N. C. (13 Ired. L.) 502, Ruffin, Ch. J., said: "There seems to be no difference in point of law between a case where the conception was prior and posterior to the marriage, provided the birth be after wedlock, for that makes the legitimacy."

In Dennison v. Page (1851) 29 Pa. 420, 72 Am. Dec. 644, the court, after reviewing many decisions, said: "Whether it was begotten in or out of wedlock, where the marriage precedes the birth, the presumption of paternity is the same, and the like evidence is required to bastardize the issue. That evidence is proof of non-access. Where the husband, or he who subsequently becomes such, has access to the mother of the child, the presumption that he is its father is conclusive."

In Rex v. Luffe (Eng.) supra, Lord Ellenborough said: "With respect to the case where the parents have married so recently before the birth of the child that it could not have been begotten in wedlock, it stands upon its own peculiar ground. The marriage of the parties is the criterion adopted by the law, in cases of antenuptial generation, for ascertaining the actual parentage of the child. For this purpose it will not examine when the gestation began, looking only to the recognition of it by the husband in the subsequent act of marriage."

In Anonymous v. Anonymous (1856) 23 Beav. 273, 53 Eng. Reprint, 107, the court said: "Though I do not entirely adopt, to its full extent, the proposition that a husband admits, by his marriage, that the child subsequently born is his, yet I think that the presumption is, that he does so admit it, if he takes no step to repudiate it, but adopts toward it exactly the same course as if it were his own child, making no complaint of the premature birth of the child, or of his having married a woman not fit to be his wife."

2. Illustrations.

The rule stated in the preceding subdivision has been applied apparently without regard to the precise period of time elapsing between the marriage and the birth of the child. Thus, in each of the following cases the child was presumed to be legitimate, the time of its birth after the marriage of the mother being as indicated:

—fifteen days (Zachmann v. Zachmann (1903) 201 Ill. 380, 94 Am. St. Rep. 180, 66 N. E. 256);

—three weeks (Com. v. Stricker (1801) 1 Browne (Pa.) xlvii., appx.);

3. Rebuttal of presumption.

(a) In general.

The presumption of legitimacy which exists in favor of a child born in wedlock, although conceived before marriage, may be overcome by proof of nonaccess by the husband, or of his impotency.

In State v. Romaine (Iowa) supra, it was said that the presumption "may be rebutted by strong, satisfactory, and conclusive evidence" that the husband did not have access to the mother of the child when it was begotten.

In Dennison v. Page (Pa.) supra, the court said: "This presumption can only be rebutted by clearly proving that no sexual intercourse occurred between the two at any time when the child could have been begotten."

In Stegall v. Stegall (1825) 2 Brock. 256, Fed. Cas. No. 13,351, it was held that although probability of nonaccess by the husband was not enough to rebut the presumption of legitimacy, it was not necessary to prove that nonaccess was impossible. Chief Justice Marshall, writing for the court, said: "This presumption of law may be rebutted by testimony which places the negative beyond all reasonable doubt."

In Rex v. Luffe (1807) 8 East, 198, 103 Eng. Reprint, 318, 9 Revised Rep. 406, it was held that the presumption of legitimacy could be overcome by proof of nonaccess of the husband; and that it was not necessary to prove nonaccess during the whole period of the wife's pregnancy, but it was sufficient if the circumstances of the case showed a natural impossibility that the husband could be the father.

In Rhyne v. Hoffman (1862) 59 N. C. (6 Jones, Eq.) 335, it was held that the presumption would obtain unless it was proven by irresistible evidence that the husband did not have sexual intercourse with the wife at the time when the child must have been begotten.

In Wallace v. Wallace (1908) 137 Iowa, 37, 14 L.R.A. (N.S.) 544, 126 Am. St. Rep. 253, 114 N. W. 527, 15 Ann. Cas. 761, it was held that the presumption might be rebutted by showing the husband to be impotent; or that he was entirely absent, so as to have no access to the mother; or was entirely absent at the period during which the child, in the course of nature, must have been begotten; or was present only under such circumstances as to afford clear and satisfactory proof that there was no sexual intercourse.

In Zachmann v. Zachmann (1903) 201 Ill. 380, 94 Am. St. Rep. 180, 66 N. E. 256, it was held that the presumption was not overcome by proof of the fact that the mother was divorced from her former husband only twenty days before her second marriage, especially in view of the fact that the child was treated and cared for by the husband as his own child.

In Phillips v. Allen (1861) 2 Allen (Mass.) 453, it was held that the jury could not legally find against the legitimacy, except on facts which proved, beyond all reasonable doubt, that the husband could not have been the father; and that evidence that the mother's reputation for chastity was bad at the time of the marriage, and that for some time prior thereto she had been intimate with other men, if competent, would not rebut the presumption of legitimacy.

The admission by a third person that the child was begotten by him, and not by the husband of the mother, has been held to be insufficient to rebut the presumption. Montgomery v. Montgomery (1848) 3 Barb. Ch. (N. Y.) 132.

In Baker v. Baker (1859) 13 Cal. 87, it was held that the presumption of legitimacy was outweighed, the evidence showing that as soon as the birth occurred, four months after the marriage, the husband repudiated the wife and child, sending them to the wife's relatives, and a confession by the wife also appearing.

(b) Declaration or testimony of spouse.

It is generally held that the testimony of the husband or of the wife is not admissible in evidence to prove nonaccess prior to the marriage, or impotence of the husband, in order to bastardize a child born in wedlock. Rabeke v. Baer (1897) 115 Mich. 328, 69 Am. St. Rep. 567, 73 N. W. 242; State v. Herman (1852) 35 N. C. (13 Ired. L.) 502; Com. v. Stricker (1801) 1 Browne (Pa.) xlvii., appx.; Dennison v. Page (1857) 29 Pa. 420, 72 Am. Dec. 644; Tioga County v. South Creek Twp. (1874) 75 Pa. 453; Rex v. Luffe (1807) 8 East, 198, 103 Eng. Reprint, 318, 9 Revised Rep. 406; Anonymous v. Anonymous (1856) 23 Beav. 273, 53 Eng. Reprint, 107, 22 Beav. 481, 52 Eng. Reprint, 1193, 4 Week. Rep. 307.

"Many reasons have been given for the rule. Prominent among them is the idea that the admission of such testimony would be unseemly and scandalous, and this is not so much from the fact that it reveals immoral conduct on the part of the parents, as because of the effect it may have upon the child, who is in no fault, but who must nevertheless be the chief sufferer thereby. That the parents should be permitted to bastardize the child is a proposition which shocks our sense of right and decency, and hence the rule of law which forbids it." Tioga County v. South Creek Twp. (1874) 75 Pa. 433, supra.

In Rex v. Luffe (1807) 8 East, 198, 103 Eng. Reprint, 318, Lord Ellenborough said that the rule which forbade the wife to prove nonaccess "was founded upon a principle of public policy which prohibits the wife from being examined against her husband in any matter affecting his interest or character."

"Declarations, as well as the evidence of either husband or wife, as to access or nonaccess, are excluded wherever the issue of legitimacy is involved, and this includes cases of antenuptial conception." Wallace v. Wallace (1908) 137 Iowa, 37, 14 L.R.A. (N.S.) 544, 126 Am. St. Rep. 253, 114 N. W. 527, 15 Ann. Cas. 761. And see Niles v. Sprague (1862) 13 Iowa, 198. Compare Wright v. Hicks (1854) 15 Ga. 160, 60 Am. Dec. 687, stated at length infra, I. b.

4. Effect of knowledge by husband of pregnancy.

It has been held that where a woman is pregnant at the time of marriage, and the fact of pregnancy is known to the husband, he is, where his rights only are concerned, conclusively presumed to be the father of the child. Bailey v. Harshman (1877) 60 Ind. 273; Bailey v. Boyd (1877) 59 Ind. 292; State v. Shoemaker (1883) 62 Iowa, 343, 49 Am. Rep. 146, 17 N. W. 589; State v. Romaine (1882) 58 Iowa, 48, 11 N. W. 721; Rhyne v. Hoffman (1862) 59 N. C. (6 Jones, Eq.) 335; State v. Herman (1852) 35 N. C. (13 Ired. L.) 502; Miller v. Anderson (1885) 43 Ohio St. 473, 54 Am. Rep. 823, 3 N. E. 605; Dennison v. Page (1857) 29 Pa. 420, 72 Am. Dec. 644. Compare Roth v. Roth (1871) 21 Ohio St. 646.

In State v. Shoemaker (1883) 62 Iowa, 343, 49 Am. Rep. 146, 17 N. W. 589, the court said: "One who marries a woman known by him to be enceinte is regarded by the law as adopting into his family the child at its birth. He could not expect that the mother upon its birth would discard the child and refuse to give it nurture and maintenance. The law would forbid a thing so unnatural. The child, receiving its support from the mother, must of necessity become one of her family, which is equally the family of the husband. The child, then, is received into the family of the husband, who stands as to it in loco parentis. This being the law, it enters into the marriage contract between the mother and the husband. When this relation is established, the law raises a conclusive presumption that the husband is the father of his wife's illegitimate child." To the same effect, see State v. Romaine (1882) 58 Iowa, 46, 11 N. W. 721.

In State v. Herman (1852) 35 N. C. (13 Ired. L.) 502, the court, on an appeal from a conviction in a bastardy proceeding, said: "Where a child is born during wedlock, of which the mother was visibly pregnant at the marriage, it is a presumption juris et de jure, that it was the offspring of the husband." See to the same effect, Dennison v. Page (1857) 29 Pa. 420, 72 Am. Dec. 644.

In Miller v. Anderson (1885) 43 Ohio St. 473, 54 Am. Rep. 823, 3 N. E. 605, a complaint in bastardy was made against the defendant, the complainant alleging that she had been delivered of a bastard child, and that the defendant was the father of the child. It appeared that about six months after the child was begotten, and while enceinte, the complainant was married to a man who had full knowledge of her condition of pregnancy, and who continued to live with her as her husband until his death. It was held that the defendant could not be held as the putative father of the child, and could not be required to contribute to its support; that the husband, in marrying the complainant under these conditions, knowing at the time that she was pregnant, consented to stand in loco parentis to, and was conclusively presumed to be the father of, the child. The court adopted the reasoning in the case of State v. Shoemaker (Iowa) supra, in all respects, and followed the holding in that case. In Roth v. Roth (Ohio) supra, however, it was held that the lower court erred in dismissing a bastardy proceeding because the complainant had, during the continuance of the cause, and while enceinte, married a man other than the defendant. In this connection the court said: "It cannot be conclusively presumed that the man who marries a pregnant woman is the father of the child with which she is pregnant. He may not have known that she was in that condition when he married her. And even if he did know it, he may not be the father of the child. It may, therefore, if born alive, be a bastard. Notwithstanding the marriage, the question remained, whether the defendant was the father of the child or not."

In Rhyne v. Hoffman (1862) 59 N. C. (6 Jones, Eq.) 335, the court quoted with approval from 1 Rolle, Abr. 358, and 2 Bacon, Abr. 84, to the effect that if a woman be big with child by A, and marries B, and then the child is born, it is the legitimate child of B.

However, it has been said that the rule just stated does not prevail in cases involving questions of heirship and inheritance, where the interests of third persons are concerned. State v. Shoemaker (1883) 62 Iowa, 343, 49 Am. Rep. 146, 17 N. W. 589; Miller v. Anderson (1885) 43 Ohio St. 473, 54 Am. Rep. 823, 3 N. E. 605.

But in Bailey v. Boyd (1877) 59 Ind. 292, an action was brought to recover possession of real estate, the plaintiff claiming through collateral, and the defendant through alleged lineal, descent from one Basil Bailey, Sr., by purchase from Basil Bailey, Jr. The determination of the controversy depended on the paternity of Basil Bailey, Jr. It appeared that the senior Bailey was married when the mother was visibly pregnant, and that the child was born shortly after the marriage. It was held that the father, by marrying the mother of the child, with knowledge of her pregnancy, acknowledged his paternity, and the child should be deemed his. See to the same effect, Bailey v. Harshman (1877) 60 Ind. 273.

In a few jurisdictions the courts take the view that the presumption existing in favor of the legitimacy of a child born in lawful wedlock is weakened by proof that the child was conceived before marriage. Wright v. Hicks (1854) 15 Ga. 160, 60 Am. Dec. 687; Wilson v. Babb (1882) 18 S. C. 59; Jackson v. Thornton (1915) 133 Tenn. 36, 179 S. W. 384. Compare Wright v. Hicks (1852) 12 Ga. 155, 56 Am. Dec. 451.

In Wilson v. Babb (1832) 18 S. C. 59, it appeared that a child was born about four and one-half months after marriage. It was held that the presumption was that the child was legitimate, but that this presumption could be overcome by less evidence than would be required in a case where the child was conceived in wedlock. The court said: "The true test is whether the husband of the wife who gives birth to the child is its father; and this must, of necessity, in every case, be a question of fact. Where the child is born after lawful wedlock, and after the lapse of the usual period of gestation, it should require a very strong state of circumstances to overthrow the presumption of legitimacy, such as impossibility of access, absolute nonaccess, abandonment, or something equally as conclusive. But where the birth is so soon after the marriage as to render it certain, according to laws of nature, that the child could not have been begotten during the wedlock, then it is more of an open question, depending on the weight of the testimony, aided in favor of the legitimacy, somewhat, by the marriage, but perhaps not to the extent of requiring such strong opposing evidence as in other cases. In every case, however, the question is still one of fact, to be determined in each special case by the principles hereinabove stated, to be administered and applied by the courts with a cautious regard to the peace of society and the happiness and reputation of families."

In Wright v. Hicks (1854) 15 Ga. 161, 60 Am. Dec. 687, the court said: "While the law presumes every child legitimate which is born within wedlock, still, in questions of this sort, there is and should be a difference between past and antenuptial conceptions. In the latter, much slighter proof should be required to repel the presumption of legitimacy, arising from marriage. For here, it is the marriage only, and not the presumed sexual intercourse resulting from marriage, which creates the presumption. Every child begotten and born within wedlock is rightly presumed to be the offspring of the husband. But such presumption does not necessarily arise where the child is begotten before marriage. Another man may as likely be the father as the future husband, as no one was entitled to sexual intercourse." In the earlier case of Wright v. Hicks (Ga.) supra, however, Lumpkin, J., speaking for the court, said: "The same rules apply whether the bastardy originates before or during marriage. If a man marries a woman pregnant by another person, the law presumes the child to be husband's; and whether she was a reputed virgin or grossment enceint, the books make no distinction. In both cases, the law says it is presumptively his child; still, he may show, by whatever proof he may command, that he has been made the innocent victim of fraud and artifice."

In Jackson v. Thornton (1915) 133 Tenn. 36, 179 S. W. 884, Williams, J., said: "Some of the courts hold that the presumption in such case must arise from the fact of the marriage, and not from sexual intercourse assumed to result from the marriage, and that the presumption of legitimate birth is therefore so far weakened as that it may be overcome by a less weight of evidence. . . . In other cases it is held that antenuptial conception does not weaken the presumption of legitimacy arising from birth after the marriage. . . . We think the better rule is that laid down in the first line of cases."

In these jurisdictions, while the evidence necessary to overcome the presumption need not be as great as if the child was conceived in wedlock, it must, nevertheless, be clear and convincing. Thus, in Jackson v. Thornton (Tenn.) supra, the court, after holding that proof of antenuptial conception weakened the presumption of legitimacy arising from birth after marriage, said: "But, even so, we hold that, in respect of the weight of the evidence required to override the presumption, clear, strong, and convincing testimony must be adduced by him who alleges illegitimacy. A mere preponderance in his favor is not enough; nor may testimony of mere rumor and suspicion among neighbors touching the true paternity of the child avail to overcome the presumption."

In Wright v. Hicks (1854) 15 Ga. 160, 60 Am. Dec. 687, there was evidence that neither the husband nor the wife recognized the child as being legitimate; that the husband declared the child to be a bastard and treated it as such; and that neither the wife nor her friends ever ascribed the paternity of the child to the husband. It was held that all these circumstances should go to the jury, and that they might therefrom infer the illegitimacy of the child. In that case it was held further that the presumption of legitimacy could be rebutted by proof tending to show the physical impossibility of the child being legitimate, and for that purpose it was held that the declarations of the husband or wife, while not admissible during their lifetime to bastardize the issue, were admissible after their death, especially when the declarations were explanatory of the conduct of the parents.

II. Antenuptial birth.

It has been held that marriage to the mother of an illegitimate child born before the marriage raises some presumption that the husband is the father of the child. Stein v. Stein (1908) 32 Ky. L. Rep. 664, 106 S. W. 860; Hall v. Gabbert (1904) 213 Ill. 208, 72 N. E. 806; Gardner v. Gardner (1877) L. R. 2 App. Cas. (Eng.) 723.

In Stein v. Stein (Ky.) supra, the question presented was whether the appellee was the legitimate heir of an intestate, and therefore entitled to his estate. It appeared that the appellee was born about one year previous to the marriage of his mother. In ruling on the question of presumption the court said: "The marriage of an unmarried man to an unmarried woman who has a child born out of lawful wedlock should create at least some presumption that it was his child, although the presumption is not as strong as when the child is born after marriage."

In Gardner v. Gardner (Eng.) supra, an appeal from the court of session to the House of Lords, the Lord Chancellor quoted with approval from the opinion of Lord Gifford as follows: "A certain presumption of paternity arises from the bare fact that a man knowingly marries the mother of an illegitimate child previously born. But this is a very weak presumption. In the absence of all other evidence, all that can be said is probably that it is more likely than not that he is the father."

In Hall v. Gabbert (1904) 213 Ill. 208, 72 N. E. 806, the question was presented as to the right of a bastard child to inherit from one who married the mother after the birth of the child. It appeared that the marriage took place after the intestate had been arrested on a bastardy complaint which charged him with the paternity of the child. The court said: "The courts will not indulge the presumption, in such case, that the marriage was entered into merely to avoid the possible consequences of the proceeding, but will rather assume that had the alleged father doubted his paternity of the child, he would have resisted the prosecution and refused the marriage."

But there is also authority to the effect that no presumption of legitimacy arises in such a case. Jane's Estate (1892) 147 Pa. 527, 23 Atl. 892. And see the reported case (STATE EX REL. BURKHART v. FERGUSON, ante, 426).

In Jane's Estate (Pa.) supra, the sole question for determination was the right of a child who was born before the marriage of his mother to share in the distribution of the husband's estate. In affirming the decision of the court below, denying the right, it was said: "There is no presumption that the man who marries the mother of a bastard child is the father of it."

In the reported case (STATE EX REL. BURKHART v. FERGUSON) it is held that there is no such presumption that a man marrying a woman who is nursing an illegitimate child is the father of the child as to bar a bastardy proceeding by the mother against another man, the rule laid down in State v. Shoemaker (Iowa) set out supra, I. a, 4, being held to be inapplicable to a case of antenuptial birth. W. F. F.

LEWIS J. MARSHALL, Plff. in Err.,
v.
WABASH RAILWAY COMPANY et al.

Michigan Supreme Court — March 28, 1918.

(201 Mich. 167, 167 N. W. 19.)

Receiver — effect of appointment on pending suit.

1. The appointment by a Federal court in one state of receivers pendente lite in a proceeding to foreclose a mortgage upon property of a railroad company does not affect a pending suit in a court of another state to recover damages for personal injuries caused by the negligence of the railroad company after the execution of the mortgage.

[See note on this question beginning on page 441.]

Mortgage — effect of statute.

2. A prior law imposing conditions and limitations upon mortgages determines their force and effect, whatever scope is attempted by the provisions they contain.

[See 19 R. C. L. 302.]

Statute — construction — implied exclusion.

3. In the construction of statutes the express mention of one thing implies the exclusion of other similar things.

[See 25 R. C. L. 981.]

Lien — priority over mortgage — statute.

4. The lien of a judgment against a railroad company for personal injuries does not have priority over a pre-existing mortgage under a statute giving such lien priority over judgments, executions, and attachments levied upon the property.

Equity — prayer for accounting — effect.

5. A prayer for accounting does not confer jurisdiction upon a court of equity of an action to collect an unsatisfied judgment the amount of which is not open to question.

— jurisdiction — enforcement of judgment.

6. Equity has no jurisdiction of a suit to enforce a judgment lien.

[See 10 R. C. L. 357; 15 R. C. L. 813, 902.]

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Lenawee County (Hart, J.) to review an order dismissing a bill filed to enforce payment of a judgment obtained by plaintiff against defendants for personal injuries. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. J. N. Sampson and Frank M. Sala for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. Baldwin, Alexander, & Russell, for defendants in error.

No lien attached to the property of the Wabash Railroad Company by reason of plaintiff's judgment.

Steere, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Plaintiff's bill of complaint is filed to have a judgment obtained by him against the Wabash Railroad Company for personal injuries declared a preferred lien upon the property of defendants, and that they be directed to pay the same, in default of which sufficient of their property found within the state be ordered sold to satisfy said judgment. His claim of right to such relief is based upon the provisions of Act No. 110, Public Acts of Michigan 1899 (2 Comp. Laws 1915, § 8340), which provides, so far as material here, as follows: "All claims arising out of the death or personal injury of any person, when such death or personal injury shall result from the negligence of any . . . steam railroad company, organized and doing business under the laws of this state, shall, after judgment is obtained therefor against any such corporation, constitute a lien upon all of the assets of said corporation, and all of the property thereof, and all of its rights and franchises, and over any and all other judgments, executions or attachments levied upon the said property, except such as may be issued in favor of persons having obtained judgments for personal work," etc.

Against this bill defendants filed a motion in the nature of a demurrer asking that the same be dismissed on various grounds, the substance of those calling for most serious consideration being that the statute relied upon and referred to in the bill of complaint does not, under the facts stated therein, give plaintiff's claimed lien priority over a previous mortgage, neither does it operate against or apply to foreclosure proceedings pending in the Federal court when all the property, rights, and franchises of the defendant railroad company were in possession and under control of receivers appointed by that court at the time plaintiff's judgment was rendered.

The history of this litigation between plaintiff and the Wabash Railroad Company, up to the time of securing the judgment to enforce which this bill is filed, will be found in Marshall v. Wabash R. Co. 163 Mich. 88, 127 N. W. 788, id., 171 Mich. 180, 137 N. W. 89, and id., 184 Mich. 593, 151 N. W. 696. Briefly summarized from the bill sufficiently for the questions involved, it appears that on February 2, 1908, plaintiff sustained serious injuries while a passenger on a train of the Wabash Railroad Company, in an accident which resulted from its negligence at a point on its line in Lenawee county, Michigan, and to recover compensatory damages for such tort he commenced an action in the circuit court for that county on September 15, 1908. The case was tried three times, resulting on each trial in a verdict and judgment in his favor, successively removed by the defendant to this court for review. The first two judgments were reversed and the case remanded for retrial. The third trial resulted in a verdict and judgment for plaintiff, on February 15, 1913, in the sum of $11,255.75, which was affirmed by this court on March 18, 1915. That judgment is yet in force with no part paid, no execution has been taken out to recover the same, and demand of plaintiff for payment has been refused. Whether it became a paramount lien upon the property of the Wabash Railroad Company on February 15, 1913, the date of final judgment in the circuit court, is the chief issue here.

On January 29, 1912, the Wabash Railroad Company went into the hands of receivers by order of the United States district court for the eastern district of Missouri, upon application of the Equitable Trust Company of New York, trustee, as complainant in a suit against said railroad company and James B. Forgan, defendants, to foreclose a first refunding and extension mortgage given by the Wabash Railroad Company on July 1, 1906. A decree foreclosing this mortgage and ordering sale of the property covered by it to satisfy the same was rendered by that court on January 30, 1914, and sale under said foreclosure was had on July 31, 1915, followed by confirmation of the same on August 20, 1915, about one year and a half after plaintiff's judgment was rendered in the circuit court of Lenawee county. Under said foreclosure proceedings the property of defendant Wabash Railroad Company was transferred to a company known as Wabash Railway Company, which now claims to own the property and operate the road. The bill makes special reference to the records and files in the foreclosure and receivership proceedings before the United States district court, of Missouri, designated as "consolidated cause No. 3,977," and asks leave to use any portion thereof deemed material on the hearing of this case, and avers that "notice of all files and papers in said cause, and all orders and decrees made in said court, were filed in the district court of the United States for the southern district of Michigan, eastern division, at Detroit," which includes within its jurisdiction a portion of the line and other assets of the Wabash Railroad Company, and that no notice was ever given to plaintiff or his attorneys to appear in those proceedings and present his claim. No copies of any of the files and records of said cause in the Federal court appear in this record, but it is stated in the opinion of the circuit judge who heard the motion, and not disputed, that the receivers in that case were discharged some time before this bill was filed, and that "plaintiff had knowledge of these proceedings in the district court."

Referring to dates, upon the question of priority of lien, it is shown that the act upon which plaintiff relies was passed in 1899, the mortgage in question was given in 1906, the accident in which plaintiff was injured occurred February 2, 1908, he began his action for damages September 15, 1908, and recovered the judgment under which he claims lien on February 15, 1913. Under the Act of 1899, "it is not until the judgment is obtained that the statutory lien attaches." Kaiser v. Detroit & N. W. R. Co. 169 Mich. 254, 135 N. W. 256.

Plaintiff contends that the fact the mortgage antedates his judgment is immaterial, because the statute antedates the mortgage, and its provisions must be read into and be regarded as a part of the mortgage—citing Southern R. Co. v. Bouknight, 30 L.R.A. 823, 17 C. C. A. 181, 25 U. S. App. 415, 70 Fed. 442; Guardian Trust & D. Co. v. Fisher, 200 U. S. 57, 50 L. ed. 367, 26 Sup. Ct. Rep. 186; Provident Inst. for Sav. v. Jersey City, 113 U. S. 506, 28 L. ed. 1102, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 612. These authorities and others which may be found of like import, sustain the rule that a prior law imposing conditions and limitations on mortgages Mortgage—effect of statute. determines their force and effect, whatever scope is attempted by the provisions they contain. To the extent such limiting statutes are applicable they are held to enter into and become a part of such contracts to the same extent as if so provided in the instruments themselves. In the Bouknight and Fisher Cases, statutes were under consideration which in express terms designated mortgages as subordinate to the liens sought to be enforced. In the Jersey City Case, an act making water rents a charge and prior lien upon land in a municipality, to the same extent and to be collected in like manner "as other taxes assessed on real estate, which by law took priority over any mortgage or other encumbrance," was held to be constitutional and to give preference to liens for water rent over subsequent mortgages. The construction and application of the act plaintiff urges requires that the court go further, and by inference read into the act itself priority of judgment liens for personal injuries over mortgages, and, thus amplified, read the act into mortgages given after the statute was enacted.

The provision relied on makes no mention of contract obligations, mortgages, or other securities voluntarily given by the corporation before such judgments are taken and become liens, but provides that, as against other liens established by adversary action, such judgment liens for personal injuries shall have preference "over any and all other judgments, executions, or attachments levied upon said property," and from those are excepted "such as may be issued" in favor of persons having judgments for personal labor. If it was the legislative intent to subordinate previously given mortgages to liens for torts, labor, or other claims against the delinquent corporation, there was no difficulty in so providing in plain words. Under the legal maxim of construction that express mention

Statute—
construction—implied ex-

of one thing implies the exclusion of other similar things, there is reason in the contention that, the act having expressly named certain liens made subordinate, it by implication excludes others not mentioned, upon the presumption that, having designated some, the legislature designated all it was intended the act should include. In other acts both preceding and following this the legislature of this state, in providing liens upon the property of corporations for labor in dangerous vocations, has made plain its intent to include mortgages amongst subordinated liens by expressly naming them. 3 Comp. Laws 1915, §§ 14,840, 14,841. The inference from a failure to mention mortgages in an intervening act of kindred import has persuasive significance.

No right of lien obtains under plaintiff's judgment except as expressly provided and to the extent prescribed by statute. It is not in recognition of the underlying principles nor enlargement of the scope of a common-law lien. It involves no claim for labor upon, material furnished for, or conservation of the property against which a lien is asserted. The legislation providing for it goes beyond liens previously recognized at common law or in equity. Its character and extent are fixed and limited by the terms of the statute creating it, which the court may not extend or add to, although the legislature might with equal or greater merit have done so.

Although the statute relied on makes plaintiff's judgment, when obtained, a lien on all assets of the defendant corporation, it gives the judgment lien in express terms priority only over other "judgments, executions, or attachments," and we think the learned circuit judge correctly held, when dismissing plaintiff's bill, that his judgment was not a prior lien to the previously given mortgage, and it could not be maintained upon that theory.

Lien—priority over mortgage—
statute.

We are impressed, however, that plaintiff's judgment is valid as it stands, and, under the statute, constitutes a lien on all the property of the defendant Wabash Railroad Company against which the action ran, subject to any valid prior mortgage upon any of such property. His action was legally begun in the circuit court of Lenawee county before the receivers were appointed or suit begun in the foreclosure case. When the Federal court of another state later took jurisdiction in the foreclosure proceedings and appointed receivers pendente lite, presumably to conserve the mortgaged property for the purpose of the decree of foreclosure as between the parties to that suit, the state court was not deprived thereby of its right to proceed with this distinct personal action in which it had first taken jurisdiction.

Receiver—effect of appointment on pending suit.

By permission of the court appointing them the receivers could have appeared in the case and defended had they seen fit to do so. Its progress did not interfere with their possession of the mortgaged property, or with the mortgage foreclosure. They did not represent the Wabash Railroad in its individual character, nor supersede it in the exercise of its corporate powers, beyond their temporary custody and control of its mortgaged property. The corporation was energetically and independently, so far as shown, pursuing an active defense of plaintiff's case to the court of last resort while the foreclosure proceedings were pending. There is nothing before us to indicate that the foreclosure suit in the Federal court was for the purpose of making equitable distribution of the assets of the corporation amongst its creditors, or had any object beyond the ordinary foreclosure of a mortgage and incidental conservation of the mortgaged property while the suit was in progress.

While authorities are cited by defendants sustaining extreme views as to the immunity afforded delinquent railroads from legal liability by appointment of receivers to conserve mortgaged property during foreclosure proceedings, we think there is respectable authority and better reason for the view that, so long as the presumably temporary possession by the receivers of the property they are appointed to conserve is not disturbed, other courts are not closed, by the foreclosure suit, to those desiring to pursue their legal remedies against the defaulting corporation.

"A receiver, says the Supreme Court of the United States, derives his authority from the act of the court appointing him, and not from the act of the parties at whose suggestion or by whose consent he is appointed; and the utmost effect of his appointment is to put the property from that time into his custody as an officer of the court, for the benefit of the party ultimately proved to be entitled, but not to change the title, or even the right of possession in the property. The ownership of the property is not changed by the appointment of a receiver. The possession of the receiver is merely that of the corporation." 5 Thomp. Corp. 2d ed., § 6373.

While not in all particulars analogous to the instant case, in Pittsburgh, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Long Island Loan & T. Co. 172 U. S. 493, 43 L. ed. 528, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 238, involving a contention between two lienors, the court said, referring to Wiswall v. Sampson, 14 How. 52, 14 L. ed. 322, upon which defendants rely: "If there had been any attempt by suit to enforce the lien given by the Parkhurst mortgage by an actual sale of the property in question pending the proceedings in the foreclosure suits, it may be that the principle announced in that case could have been invoked, and the sale would have been ineffectual to pass title to the purchaser. But nothing was done by Lynde, after the institution of the foreclosure suits and pending proceedings therein, which was inconsistent with or tended to defeat the object of those suits."

In Moore v. Southern States Land & Timber Co. (C. C.) 83 Fed. 399, the court said: "It has, however, been held that when a decree appointing a receiver and awarding an injunction, so far as disclosed upon its face, was to provide for the safe-keeping of the property of the corporation, and to prevent any transfers thereof, and such decree did not state that the ulterior intent of the court was to make an equitable distribution of the funds, and contained no direction to the receiver to give notice to the creditors to file their claims, the decree imposed no restrictions upon creditors in prosecuting their claims, either at law or in equity, and a judgment subsequently recovered by a creditor is as much a lien on the real estate of the corporation debtor as if the appointment of a receiver had never been made (citing authorities). I think this ruling is founded in reason, and my opinion is that until the court has made some decree showing that its ulterior intent is to make an equitable distribution of the funds, and giving notice to the creditors to file their claims, such creditors may sue at law, and acquire a priority. Up to that time the complainant is permitted to dismiss the case and discharge the receiver."

Vide, also Blair v. Walker (C. C.) 26 Fed. 73; Trust Co. v. Norfolk & S. R. Co. (C. C.) 183 Fed. 803.

Upon the authority of the state court to now entertain jurisdiction and grant any portion of the relief asked, it is to be noted the bill indicates that by ancillary steps jurisdiction of the Federal court was extended over the mortgaged property of the defendant corporation in this state, and it is said in plaintiff's brief that no attack is made upon the foreclosure decree of that court, the jurisdiction of which is conceded, it only being insisted that the sale under the decree was subject to his lien, and, inferentially, that court should have seen his rights were protected; and not having done so before that litigation was ended and the receivers discharged, the state court may and should deal with the property according to the rights of the respective parties. In denial of the application of this decree to him, counsel for plaintiff contend that his judgment became a lien upon the property of the Wabash Railroad Company in this state before it changed its name, if not its spots, to the Wabash Railway Company, and, by a court proceeding, only stated in outline, legal title to its assets went with the name, and he then had rights in the property which could not be cut off without his day in court; but he was not in any manner made a party to the foreclosure suit before final decree, served with notice, or given opportunity to be heard. Of his right to such notice, § 721 of the United States Revised Statutes (Comp. Stat. § 1538, 5 Fed. Stat. Anno. 2d ed. p. 1123) is cited, which provides that, in the absence of Federal statutes, constitutional provisions, etc., prohibiting, "the laws of the several states . . . shall be regarded as rules of decision in trials at common law, in the courts of the United States," which shall take judicial notice of them as taken by the state courts, and § 3 of said Act 110, Pub. Acts of Michigan 1899 (2 Comp. Laws 1915, § 8341), which provides that "it shall be the duty of all courts of this state, in which proceedings may be pending, for the foreclosure of any mortgage, trust deed or other lien upon any of the property of any . . . steam railroad company, doing business in this state, to cause said company, before final decree is entered in said cause, to file with said court, through the register thereof, a statement of all claims and demands made against said company by any and all persons for . . . damages resulting from death or personal injuries, and which claims shall have arisen within six years prior to the date of filing the same with said court. And it shall be the duty of said court, upon the filing of the same, to notify any and all persons interested in said claims, or their attorneys, to be and appear before said court upon a certain day to present their said claims, and the proof thereof, . . . and to inform said court in case of claims for personal injury or death, whether it is the desire of said claimants to prosecute the same to final judgment or not."

Reports of decisions by the Federal courts show that a "rule of decision," analogous in principle to this statute, has frequently been adopted when dealing with foreclosure of mortgages and enforcement of trust deeds given by railroads, as a fair and equitable measure irrespective of any statutory suggestion or requirement. While plaintiff's bill avers that the Federal court did not require a statement of claimants to be filed with it, and no notice of such proceeding was given to him or his attorneys, the details of the foreclosure suit are not in this record, and whether there was any substantial observance of that rule of decision, or general notice to claimants by publication or otherwise, we are not advised. The trial court stated plaintiff did have "knowledge of these proceedings in the district court." The statute makes it "the duty of all courts of this state" to pursue the course outlined, which defendants contend applies only to state courts. We are not prepared, nor required upon this record, to determine it mandatory upon Federal courts located within this state.

Plaintiff's bill shows that he has a judgment upon which execution might issue at any time, but no execution has been taken out. His bill is therefore not filed in aid of execution. His prayer for an accounting cannot confer equity jurisdiction when the bill shows its only purpose is to collect an unsatisfied judgment, the amount of which is not open to question. The palpable purpose of the bill is to have the chancery court declare and

for accounting
—effect.

enforce collection of a statutory lien. Although there is some confusion of the law upon that subject in some jurisdictions, it has been determined in this state that while the equity court, having acquired jurisdiction for other purposes, may, as an incident to general relief granted, order property sold to satisfy a lien, it has no jurisdiction to enforce a lien, either common-law or statutory, upon a bill filed solely for that purpose (Aldine Mfg. Co. v. Phillips, 118 Mich. 162, 42 L.R.A. 531, 74 Am. St. Rep. 380, 76 N. W. 371), and such, we conclude, is manifestly the sole object of this bill.

—jurisdiction—enforcement of judgment.

The order granting defendant's motion and dismissing plaintiff's bill is therefore affirmed, with costs, but without prejudice.

Petition for rehearing denied, June 20, 1918.

I. Where appointment does not destroy corporate existence.

a. General rule.

1. In general.

This note is confined to cases based upon the effect of the appointment of a receiver for a corporation or its property pending actions against the corporation, or the right to commence and prosecute actions against it. It does not include cases involving the right to sue the receiver, or the right of the receiver to intervene in pending actions or to make him a party thereto, nor does it include cases involving the right of the receiver, by proceedings in the court which appointed him, to enjoin or restrain the commencement or prosecution of actions against the corporation.

It is a general rule that a court which is administering property of a corporation in its custody through receivership proceedings may properly draw to itself all disputes as to liens and other rights to or pertaining to such property, and to this end it may restrain actions in other courts. The following cases sustain this rule, which, however, as pointed out, is beyond the scope of the note, and hence the note is not exhaustive of the cases on the subject: Morgan's L. & T. R. & S. S. Co. v. Texas C. R. Co. (1890) 137 U. S. 171, 34 L. ed. 625, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 61; Texas & P. R. Co. v. Cox (1892) 145 U. S. 593, 36 L. ed. 829, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 905; Porter v. Sabin (1892) 149 U. S. 473, 37 L. ed. 815, 13 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1008; Farmers' Loan & T. Co. v. Lake Street Elev. R. Co. (1899) 177 U. S. 51, 44 L. ed. 667, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 564; Wabash R. Co. v. Adelbert College (1907) 208 U. S. 38, 52 L. ed. 379, 28 Sup. Ct. Rep. 182.

In connection with the question as to the effect of the appointment of a receiver for a corporation on the rights of other creditors to commence or continue the prosecution of actions against the corporation, it is to be remembered that the appointment of a receiver for a corporation is generally either for the purpose of taking possession of the whole or a portion of the property of the corporation for some specific purpose, or as a step in dissolving and winding up the affairs of the corporation and administering its property. Where the appointment of a receiver is in effect merely to take possession of the whole or a portion of the property of the corporation for some specific purpose, the existence of the corporation as a body corporate is not thereby affected. On the other hand, where the receiver is appointed for an insolvent corporation for the purpose of winding up its affairs and administering its property by distributing the same among the creditors and stockholders, the effect may be to extinguish the existence of the corporation as a body corporate except as it may be represented by the receiver in actions necessary in winding up its affairs. This distinction serves to harmonize and explain the cases passing upon the question under consideration.

As suggested, where a receiver is appointed to take charge of the whole or a portion of the property of a corporation for some specific purpose, the corporate existence of the corporation is not thereby affected, and it remains subject to actions at law to the same extent as it would if no receiver had been appointed for its property. Such appointment does not affect the progress of pending actions or the commencement of actions against the corporation, except as such actions may be restrained or enjoined in the receivership proceedings, and with the further exception that no action can be maintained which will in any way affect or embarrass the receiver in the possession of the property of the corporation to which his receivership entitles him.

Butts v. Davis (1912) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 149 S. W. 741.

2. Pending actions.

The appointment of a receiver for a corporation does not abate or suspend the prosecution to judgment of actions pending at the time of the appointment. Mercantile Trust Co. v. Pittsburgh & W. R. Co. (1887) 29 Fed. 782; Alabama Terminal R. Co. v. Bennis (1914) 189 Ala. 590, 66 So. 589; Citizens' Bank v. Hubbard (1883) 70 Ga. 411; American Nat. Bank v. Robinson (1913) 141 Ga. 78, 80 S. G. &

Ft. S. R. Co. v. Holladay (1895) 131 Mo. 440, 33 S. W. 49; Cooper v. Philadelphia Worsted Co. (1904) — N. J. Eq. —, 57 Atl. 733; Tracy v. First Nat. Bank (1868) 37 N. Y. 523; Black v. Consolidated R. & Power Co. (1912) 158 N. C. 468, 74 S. E. 468; Wagner v. Keystone Nat. Ben. Asso. (1896) 8 Pa. Dist. R. 231.

In Mercantile Trust Co. v. Pittsburgh & W. R. Co. (Fed.) supra, it was held that the appointment of a receiver for a railroad corporation by one court did not prevent the continued prosecution of a pending action in another court for the assessment of damages against the corporation.

In Cooper v. Philadelphia Worsted Co. (1904) — N. J. Eq. —, 59 Atl. 733, it is held that a pending action against a corporation may be prosecuted to judgment, although, before the judgment is rendered, a receiver is appointed for the corporation in insolvency proceedings. The court said that this was true, even conceding that an action could not be brought against the corporation after the appointment of a receiver.

In Citizens' Bank v. Hubbard (1883) 70 Ga. 411, it appeared that a corporation had made an assignment of all of its effects for the benefit of its creditors, that assignees under creditors' bills had been appointed receivers and had taken possession of all the effects of the corporation, and these proceedings were still pending. These circumstances were held, however, not to preclude a creditor of the corporation from prosecuting an action against it to obtain judgment upon his claim against the corporation.

In St. Louis, C. G. & Ft. S. R. Co. v. Holladay (1895) 131 Mo. 440, 33 S. W. 49, it is pointed out that a receiver of a corporation is a stranger to proceedings instituted and in progress prior to his appointment, and this status remains until he has been made a party to the action by an order of the court; hence it follows that a receiver is a stranger to an action against a corporation pending at the time of his appointment, and there is no legal objection to the prosecution of the action in that form to final judgment, and the court in which such action is pending may properly refuse, at the instance of the corporation, to make the receiver a party thereto.

In Tracy v. First Nat. Bank (1868) 37 N. Y. 523, it appeared that an action was commenced against the bank before the appointment of a receiver for it. In denying the right of the receiver to intervene in this proceeding, the court said that there was no legal objection to the action continuing in its original form until final judgment was obtained.

In Wagner v. Keystone Nat. Ben. Asso. (1896) 8 Pa. Dist. R. 231, it is held that a pending action against an insurance company is not abated by the appointment of a receiver to take over and administer its assets, where the decree appointing the receiver does not dissolve the corporation.

In Patrick v. Eells (1883) 30 Kan. 680, 2 Pac. 116, the receiver of a corporation, appointed in insolvency proceedings against it, was denied the right to intervene in an action against the corporation by trustees in a mortgage executed by the corporation upon its property, for the foreclosure of the mortgage. The right to continue the prosecution of the foreclosure proceeding is recognized, although not considered by the court.

In Advance-Rumely Thresher Co. v. Moss (1919) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 213 S. W. 690, it is said that, where a judgment against a corporation has been appealed from and the appeal is pending at the time a receiver is appointed for the property of the corporation in a Federal court, the plaintiffs are not compelled to abandon the judgment on which they had elected to try their suit, and resort to the Federal court for the prosecution of their claim. "The state and Federal courts were courts of concurrent jurisdiction, and the suit had been instituted in the district court of Hamilton county and carried to the appellate court before the jurisdiction of the Indiana Federal court had attached, and we can see no invasion of the jurisdiction of the latter court or of the Federal court at Dallas in the state court's having permitted appellees to institute and maintain this suit against appellant, based upon the judgment obtained against Rumely Products Company for a moneyed demand. We do not think this proceeding in any wise impairs the judgments or decrees of the Federal courts, or in any respect denies full faith and credit to them."

It has been held to be within the discretion of the court in which a suit was pending at the time of the appointment of a receiver, to make the receiver a party, and that it may refuse to do so and permit the case to continue against the corporation, notwithstanding the appointment of the receiver. St. Louis, C. G. & Ft. S. R. Co. v. Holladay (1895) 131 Mo. 440, 33 S. W. 49.

3. Actions commenced subsequently to appointment.

It is a general rule that, where the appointment of a receiver for a corporation does not have the effect of terminating the legal existence of the corporation, the appointment does not preclude the commencement and prosecution to judgment of actions against the corporation, the purpose and effect not being to acquire a lien upon the property of the corporation, or interfere with the receiver's possession of the property.

Light & P. Co. (1895) 13 Wash. 307, 43 Pac. 55.

In Calhoun v. Lanaux (U. S.) supra, it was held that an action against a corporation to have canceled and discharged of record a mortgage running to the corporation, which the plaintiff had paid, could be maintained in the state court, notwithstanding a receiver had been appointed for the corporation in a Federal court. The court said that such proceeding would not have the effect of depriving the receiver of any property of the corporation in his possession.

In McDermott v. Crook (D. C.) supra, it is held that although the property of a city and suburban railway company is placed in the hands and control of a receiver, a suit may nevertheless be commenced against the company to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by its negligence, at a time prior to the appointment of the receiver.

In Ohio & M. R. Co. v. Russell (Ill.) supra, the facts were that a landowner brought an action against a railroad company to recover a statutory penalty for the failure of the company to erect and maintain a line fence along its right of way adjoining the plaintiff's land. The statute authorized the adjoining owner to recover the penalty, in these circumstances, either of the railroad company or the party actually occupying or using the railroad. Under this statute, it was held no defense to the action that at the time of the failure to build the fence the corporation was in the hands of a receiver.

In Kelley v. Union P. R. Co. (Kan.) supra, it is held that the fact that the assets of a railroad company have been placed in the hands of a receiver does not change or affect the liability of the company for torts previously committed by it, and does not bar an action against the company to recover damages for such torts.

In Spencer v. Welch (La.) supra, it is held that an action to enforce notes given by a corporation and to secure the recognition of a mortgage securing the payment of the same may be maintained in a state court, notwithstanding that the mortgaged property is in the hands of a receiver appointed by the Federal court, there being no dispute of the receiver's right of possession.

In Coy v. Title Guarantee & T. Co., (1919) 257 Fed. 571, it is held that proceedings to foreclose a tax lien upon real estate, upon which a corporation whose property is in the custody of a receiver has a lien, may be maintained, notwithstanding such receivership.

In Pringle v. Woolworth (1882) 90 N. Y. 502, the facts were that an insurance company, as a condition to the right to do business in a state other than that of its domicil, consented to the service of process upon it by service upon the local state insurance commissioner. Under these circumstances, it was held that the fact that a receiver was appointed for the corporation in the state of its domicil did not preclude an action against the corporation in such other state by service of process upon the insurance commissioner, and the judgment rendered in such action against the insurance company was conclusive upon the receiver as to the amount and validity of the claim.

In Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. v. Union P. R. Co. (1918) 165 C. C. A. 523, 254 Fed. 235, the facts that the property of a railway company is under receivership in another Federal court, and that the claim sued upon has been filed before a special master therein, have been held not to bar an action upon the claim in the Federal court having jurisdiction.

In City Water Co. v. State (1895) 88 Tex. 600, 32 S. W. 1038, it is held that the fact that the city waterworks system was in the custody of a receiver appointed by the Federal court does not preclude an action by the state in the state court to forfeit the charter of the company.

In Black v. New Orleans R. & L. Co. (1919) — La. —, 82 So. 81, it is held that an action by taxpayers, contesting the legality of an order permitting a street railway company to increase its fares, may be prosecuted, notwithstanding the appointment of a receiver for the railway company in a Federal court.

In Watson v. Jones (1871) 13 Wall. (U. S.) 679, 20 L. ed. 666, the jurisdiction of the Federal court is sustained to determine questions involving the disposal of church property, although the property has been placed in the hands of the master of the state court as a receiver. The court expressly holds, however, that the possession of the receiver cannot be interfered with.

In Mercantile Trust Co. v. Lamoille Valley R. Co. (1879) 16 Blatchf. 324, Fed. Cas. No. 9,432, it appeared that a receiver had been appointed for the property of a railway company in a mortgage foreclosure proceeding in the state court. This fact was urged as an objection to a proceeding in the Federal court for the foreclosure of another mortgage upon the same property. In overruling this objection, the Federal court stated that, while it would make no order which would disturb the receiver appointed by the state court in his possession of the property, it would nevertheless order and determine questions concerning rights to the property not affecting the possession.

b. Enforcement of judgment.

Even though actions may be commenced or pending actions may be prosecuted against a corporation while in the hands of a receiver, it does not follow that judgments rendered in such actions may be collected while the property is in the hands of the receiver.

For example, in Bank of Bethel v. Pahquioque Bank (1871) 14 Wall. (U. S.) 383, 20 L. ed. 840, affirming (1870) 36 Conn. 325, 4 Am. Rep. 80, it appeared that a receiver was appointed for a national bank on the ground that it had failed to redeem its circulating notes. A claim against the bank was presented to the receiver for allowance, and, upon the latter's disallowing it, proceedings were commenced against the corporation to place it in judgment. This action was held maintainable. The court said: "Claims presented by creditors may be proved before the receiver, or they may be put in suit in any court of competent jurisdiction, as a means of establishing their validity and to determine the amount owed by the association; but the judgment, when recovered, will not give the creditor any lien on the property of the delinquent association, nor secure to the judgment creditor any preference over other creditors whose claims are proven before the receiver. All alike must await the action of the Comptroller of the Currency, and be content with a just and legal distribution of the proceeds of the assets collected by the receiver and liquidated by the Comptroller, according to the act of Congress in such case made and provided."

In Blair v. St. Louis, H. & K. R. Co. (1885) 25 Fed. 2, it appeared that at the time a receiver was appointed in a Federal court to take charge of the property of a railroad company in a mortgage foreclosure proceeding, there was pending in the state court a suit to enforce against the railway company a statutory lien. This suit was prosecuted to judgment and a lien decreed upon the property without leave of the Federal court. Thereafter the judgment plaintiff petitioned the Federal court for the right to intervene in the suit in that court and enforce its lien. Upon denying this petition, Justice Taft said that the plaintiff had preferred to proceed in the state court without leave of the Federal court, and he must lie in the bed which he had made.

So, in Danforth v. National Chemical Co. (1897) 68 Minn. 308, 71 N. W. 274, it is held that, where the plaintiff in an action on a simple contract against a corporation prosecutes the action to default judgment after a receiver has been appointed for the corporation in insolvency proceedings against it, he cannot file a complaint in intervention in the receivership case, in which his only cause of action is alleged to be based upon that judgment.

Where judgments are rendered against a corporation while its property is in the hands of a receiver and the collection of the judgment is stayed or suspended on this ground, it has been held that the judgment creditor, in some instances at least, may proceed against the property of the corporation after the discharge of the receiver.

Thus, in Blair v. Walker (1886) 26 Fed. 73, it appeared that, where the creditor of a railroad company, the property of which was in the custody of a receiver undertook to intervene in the receivership proceedings, his petition for intervention was dismissed without prejudice and he was allowed to pursue his remedy in the state courts. He subsequently obtained judgment against the company, and, after its property had been sold in the receivership proceedings and turned over to the purchaser, he caused a levy to be made to enforce the judgment, and took steps to sell the property. The purchaser applied for an injunction restraining any proceeding under this levy. In denying the injunction, the court said: "The defendants in this case were not, under the proceedings had, parties to said suit, and consequently not bound thereby. They sought by intervention to become parties, to which objections were made, and the court dismissed their intervention without prejudice, thereby remitting their rights to the state court, wherein their judgment had been entered. The validity of said judgment is not assailed in this bill filed. On what ground, then, is an injunction sought against said judgment and the process issued thereon? Certainly it is a mistake to suppose that the decree of this court concluded the rights of those not parties thereto. The language of the decree cannot be construed to cover more than what the law permits. Besides, the records of this court show that, instead of passing upon the force and effect of the judgment in question, this court, under objections made, determined expressly that whatever was done in this tribunal should be subject to that outstanding controversy."

In Trust Co. of America v. Norfolk & S. R. Co. (1911) 183 Fed. 803, affirmed (1911) 111 C. C. A. 465, 190 Fed. 737, a creditor of a railroad company, whose judgment by statute took priority over the mortgages of the railroad company, was held entitled to prosecute to judgment his action against the company, although a receiver had been appointed for the property of the company in an action to foreclose a mortgage thereon, and the judgment rendered in favor of the creditor was held to be enforceable as against the purchaser of the property. The terms of the receiver's sale provided that the purchaser took subject to all claims and demands theretofore filed under the order of reference, or which had been or might thereafter be established thereunder as prior in lien to such mortgages. The court said: "It is well settled that when a court of equity undertakes to sell a perfect title to property and discharge all liens upon it, or pay off all existing claims entitled to share in the proceeds, it has the power, by appropriate process, to bring all such claimants before the court and adjudicate their validity and order of priority; but it is equally well settled that before claimants are thus barred and foreclosed they must be made parties or brought into the record, and a reasonable time given within which to present their claims and be heard. The claim of Talbott was for damages, triable by a jury in the state court, and under any aspect of the case he should have been given notice and a reasonable time after the rendition of his judgment to intervene. The judgment was rendered about one month before the decree for the sale of the property was made." And see intimation to the same effect in the reported case (MARSHALL v. WABASH R. Co. ante, 435).

In Mather v. Cincinnati R. Tunnel Co. (1888) 2 Ohio C. D. 161, it is held that the appointment of a receiver for the property of a railroad company does not suspend the right to prosecute an action pending against the company at the time of the appointment, and a judgment rendered in such action will become a lien on the land of the company within the county in which the judgment was rendered, and it may be enforced after the discharge of the receiver and the vesting of the property.

In Kansas City, M. & O. R. Co. v. State (1914) 106 Tex. 249, 163 S. W. 582, it is held that the appointment of a receiver in a Federal court for the property of a railroad company does not preclude the granting in a state court of a mandatory injunction requiring the railroad company to construct its line to and through a certain town, but the appointment of the receiver renders it legally impossible for the corporation to comply with the injunction; hence its enforcement will be suspended until conditions so change as to put it within the power of the corporation to obey.

The Federal court, in a receivership proceeding against a railroad company in behalf of bondholders, creditors, and stockholders, will not withdraw the property of the corporation indefinitely from the right of general creditors of the corporation to proceed against it to secure their indebtedness, and the judgment creditors of the corporation will be permitted to levy an execution upon the property unless paid by the receiver within a fixed time. Scott v. Farmers' Loan & T. Co. (1895) 16 C. C. A. 358, 32 U. S. App. 468, 69 Fed. 17.

Where, however, in a decree for the foreclosure and sale of the property of a corporation, in a proceeding in a Federal court, the court reserves the right to determine what liens or claims shall be charged upon the title conveyed by the court, and retains jurisdiction of the case to settle all claims against the property and to determine what burden shall be borne by the purchaser as a condition to holding the title conveyed, the decree amounts to a determination that exclusive jurisdiction of all claims against res, which had origin in the possession of the res in the judicial proceedings for the foreclosure of the mortgage, may be continued after sale and conveyance of the property, for the purpose of deciding what claims are legally chargeable against it; hence a state court is without power, in a case which was pending against the corporation at the time of the appointment of the receiver.

er, to decree a sale of the property upon satisfaction of the judgment. After the property has been turned over to the purchaser thereof in the foreclosure proceeding in such case, the judgment creditor must pursue his remedy in the Federal court, "which doubtless will consider the decisions of the state court, or questions of state law, with the respect which the decisions of this court require." Wabash R. Co. v. Adelbert College (1907) 208 U. S. 38, 52 L. ed. 379, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 182.

Of course, if the mortgage covers all of the property of the railroad company, including that subsequently to be acquired, and the property as a whole is sold in foreclosure proceedings and turned over by the receiver of the company to the purchaser, the rights of judgment creditors, whose claims were contracted subsequently to the execution and recording of the mortgages, are cut off by the foreclosure and sale, and they cannot interfere with the possession of the property by the purchaser. Bell v. Chicago, St. L. & N. O. R. Co. (1882) 84 La. Ann. 785; Re Immanuel Presby. Church (1904) 112 La. 348, 36 So. 408. This point really involves the question of priority of heirs, and cases of that character are not included herein.

II. When the appointment in effect destroys the corporate existence.

a. In general.

Where the effect of an appointment of a receiver for a corporation is to extinguish the existence of the corporation as a body corporate except as the receiver may have the right to use the corporate name in actions at law or in equity necessary in winding up the affairs of the corporation, the effect of the appointment of the receiver is to abate actions against the corporation pending at the time of the appointment, and likewise to preclude the commencement of actions against the corporation. As hereinafter pointed out, however, this does not mean that creditors who have obtained a lien on the property of the corporation by actions at law will be subjected to the abatement of their actions, to the loss of such lien.

In Cowan v. Pennsylvania Plate Glass Co. (1898) 184 Pa. 1, 38 Atl. 1075, conceding that there might be many cases in which the appointment of a receiver would not change the status of the corporation property, or suspend the ordinary remedy of creditors, it was held that there are many instances where, from the very nature of the case, the ordinary remedy of creditors is suspended when the receivership is established, as, for example, where the proceeding is for the appointment of a receiver for the distribution of the assets of an insolvent corporation.

In Read v. Frankfort Bank (1843) 23 Me. 318, it is held that where a bank ceases to exist upon the appointment of a receiver for it, except so far as the receiver may prosecute any actions pending in its name, and use its name in any suit necessary to enable him to collect its debts, the plaintiff in an action against the bank, pending at the time of the appointment of a receiver, cannot prosecute to judgment, nor take out execution against it, unless in a court of equity.

In Hunt v. Columbian Ins. Co. (1868) 55 Me. 290, 92 Am. Dec. 592, it is held that in order that the appointment of a receiver for an insolvent corporation in one state shall have the effect of precluding the prosecution to judgment of an action pending against the corporation in another state in which the corporation has an agency, it must appear that the effect of the appointment of the receiver is not merely to prohibit the corporation from the customary existence of its corporate functions, but that the corporation thereby actually becomes extinct. The court said that it is not merely the perpetual paralysis, but an unqualified dissolution of the corporation, that would defeat the plaintiff's right to take judgment.

In Berwind-White Coal Min. Co. v. Borinquen Sugar Co. (1913) 6 Porto Rico Fed. Rep. 259, it is held that the appointment of a receiver for a corporation in insolvency proceedings is in the nature of a sequestration, and claims cannot be enforced against it in any other court than that where the property is being administered. The court said that by such appointment there was a suspension of ordinary process proceedings.

In Morton v. Stone Harbor Improv. Co. (1899) — N. J. Eq. —, 44 Atl. 875, in holding that a receiver appointed for a corporation in another state, in whom was vested all the corporation assets, was entitled to restrain the prosecution of an action pending against the corporation at the time of his appointment, the court said that the prosecutor of a suit against a corporation before a common-law court, after a receiver has been appointed in chancery, can acquire no preference by such a suit, and the pendency of the suit before judgment does not advance his claim in any way beyond that of the other creditors of the corporation; hence, he can secure all of his rights by proof of his claim before the receiver, and that this is the proper and only mode of procedure. In this regard it is pointed out that "to permit a creditor to pursue a suit against a corporation while the corporation is (by the very terms of the order appointing a receiver and granting an injunction) restrained from doing any business, or raising or expending any money, whereby it might make a defense,—in short, while it is denuded of all its property,—is practically to leave the corporation standing before the common-law court absolutely stripped of all means of defense." Ordinarily, cases are not included herein which involve the right of the receiver to enjoin the prosecution of actions against the corporation.

A judgment of dissolution operates to bar the right to sue the corporation or to prosecute to judgment an action pending against it, unless an order of the court appointing the receiver, permitting such procedure, is obtained. People v. Troy Steel & I. Co. (1894) 82 Hun, 803, 31 N. Y. Supp. 337. In the foregoing case, it appeared that judgment was entered for the dissolution of a corporation and for the appointment of a receiver, in an action by the state under a statute authorizing such procedure. The court said that such a judgment ordinarily had the effect of preventing the maintenance of an action against the corporation, and that, if actions are pending at the time of the rendition of such judgment, they cannot be continued unless by order of the court at the time that the judgment of dissolution is rendered. In Merchants' Loan & T. Co. v. Clair (1887) 107 N. Y. 663, 14 N. E. 414, it is held that where a receiver is appointed for a corporation in the state of its domicile, after or upon its dissolution, no action can be maintained against the corporation in the courts of another state. In First Nat. Bank v. Colby (1874) 21 Wall. (U. S.) 609, 22 L. ed. 687, it is held that where a receiver is appointed for a bank in proceedings in which a decree is entered forfeiting the rights, privileges, and franchises of the bank, and adjudging its dissolution, the existence of the bank as a legal entity thereby ceases, and it becomes a defunct institution; hence, a judgment cannot be rendered against it in a suit pending at the time of the dissolution, and the receiver is entitled to an order dissolving the attachment upon the property of the corporation levied in such action.

But the fact that a foreign corporation has been dissolved and a receiver appointed for it in a court in the state of its creation does not bar the prosecution of a pending action against the corporation in another state. Hunt v. Columbia Ins. Co. (1867) 55 Me. 290, 92 Am. Dec. 592; Taylor v. Columbian Ins. Co. (1867) 14 Allen (Mass.) 358.

III. When effect of suit would be to interfere with the receiver's possession of the property.

Where the property of a corporation is placed in the possession of a receiver appointed for it, the property is in custodia legis, and hence no action or proceeding can be maintained against the corporation the effect of which would be to interfere with the receiver's possession of the property. Calhoun v. Lanaux (1887) 127 U. S. 634, 32 L. ed. 297, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1345; Dickinson v. Willis (1916) 239 Fed. 171; National Bank v. Richmond Factory (1892) 91 Ga. 284, 18 S. E. 160; Spencer v. Welch (1899) 51 La. Ann. 753, 25 So. 405; Rickman v. Rickman (1914) 180 Mich. 224, 146 N. W. 609, Ann. Cas. 1915C, 1237; Morton v. Stone Harbor Improv. Co. (1899) — N. J. Eq. —, 44 Atl. 875; City Water Co. v. State (1895) 88 Tex. 600, 32 S. W. 1033; French v. McCreedy (1900) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 57 S. W. 894.

A receiver appointed for a corporation may enjoin the further prosecution of an action at law pending against it at the time of his appointment, if such action may result in a preferential action against the corporation, which it is the duty of the receiver to prevent. Morton v. Stone Harbor Improv. Co. (1899) — N. J. Eq. —, 44 Atl. 875.

In Rickman v. Rickman (1914) 180 Mich. 224, 146 N. W. 609, Ann. Cas. 1915C, 1237, the court said that, "after the appointment of a receiver for an insolvent corporation, the right of a creditor to sequester its property by attachment, and thus gain a priority, is suspended."

In Dickinson v. Willis (1916) 239 Fed. 171, the appointment of a receiver for all of the property in possession of a railroad company, and enjoining all parties from in any manner whatsoever interfering with the receiver thus appointed in his operation, control, and management of the business or property of the railroad company, was held to operate as a bar to an action subsequently commenced for the specific enforcement of an executory contract with the railroad company and to restrain its violation, where the effect would be to interfere with the control and management of the railroad property by the receiver.

In French v. McCreedy (1900) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 57 S. W. 894, it is held that, after the appointment of a receiver to take charge of all of the property of the corporation, a judgment against the corporation upon a note executed by it is invalid, at least, in so far as it attempts to set aside a conveyance of property to the corporation which was included in the property turned over to the receiver.

In Brown v. Crawford (1918) 254 Fed. 146, it is held that the fact that a receiver had been appointed in a state court for the property of an insolvent corporation does not bar an action in a Federal court to foreclose a mortgage upon the property of the corporation. It is recognized that ordinarily the possession of a receiver, appointed by a court of concurrent jurisdiction, cannot be interfered with. In this case, however, after the appointment of the receiver by the Federal court, the corporation was adjudicated a bankrupt under the Federal Bankruptcy Act, and a trustee appointed who took possession of the property of the corporation. The right of the trustee to the possession of the property is sustained, but it is held that he should not have taken possession by summary process.

In National Bank v. Richmond Factory (1892) 91 Ga. 284, 18 S. E. 160, it appeared that a receiver had been appointed to take charge of the property of an insolvent corporation at the instance of a creditor stockholder. Under these circumstances, it was held that an action could not be maintained by another creditor for the appointment of another receiver for the whole or a portion of the property of such corporation.

But where a receiver is appointed in a state or Federal court, merely as a custodian of the property of the corporation and to carry out the special orders of the court with reference thereto, such appointment does not preclude the appointment of a receiver in a state court, under a state statute providing for the winding up of the affairs of the corporation under certain conditions. In such case the receiver in that proceeding will supersede the receiver appointed in another state court under a general statute or common-law proceeding, and such receiver will be authorized to intervene in the Federal court and deny the charge of the receiver appointed under the general equity powers. Morse v. Metropolitan S. S. Co. (1917) 87 N. J. Eq. 217, 100 Atl. 219, modified in (1917) 88 N. J. Eq. 325, 102 Atl. 524, as to vesting of the title to the corporate property in the receiver; Michel v. William Necker (1919) — N. J. Eq. —, 106 Atl. 449; People v. New York City R. Co. (1907) 57 Misc. 114, 107 N. Y. Supp. 247; People v. Hasbrouck (1907) 57 Misc. 130, 107 N. Y. Supp. 257.

In Hitchcock v. American Pipe & Constr. Co. (1918) 89 N. J. Eq. 440, 105 Atl. 655, upon this point the court said: "That the district court had no jurisdiction of the subject-matter I think is clear. The bill prayed for no specific relief other than the appointment of a receiver. It is conceded, of course, that a court of equity may take under its control assets of a corporation, foreign or domestic, with the view to ultimate distribution of such assets among creditors, and may appoint receivers of a solvent corporation in some instances where, for one reason or another, the board of directors ought not to be left in control. . . . But I have never, unless the instant case is an exception, heard of a case in which it was contended that a court of equity might by judicial fiat prescribe a moratorium in favor of a corporation. When a court takes under its control and puts in custodia legis assets of a corporation with a view to ultimate distribution, creditors and stockholders are provided with a remedy for the enforcement of their demands. But, where a court appoints a receiver merely to take the place of the management of the corporation to act for an indefinite time, creditors and stockholders are deprived of their ordinary legal remedies and no adequate substitute provided. There is a distinction between the power which is exercised by a court, where a bill is filed for the winding up of the affairs of a corporation, or charging that the directors of a corporation ought not to be left in control although the corporation may be solvent, in appointing receivers, and in refraining from directing immediate disposition of the assets pending rehabilitation or the election of a proper board, as the case may be, and the power which the Federal court sought to exercise in the instant case in appointing a receiver under a bill where no ultimate relief of any kind is asked." Reversed in (1919) — N. J. L. —, 107 Atl. 267, as to the allowance of attorneys' fees to attorneys for creditors of the corporation.

In Jones v. Lincoln Sav. & T. Co. (1908) 222 Pa. 325, 71 Atl. 209, it appeared that a receiver had been appointed for a banking corporation under a general statute of the state. This proceeding was held not superseded by the appointment of a receiver for the corporation by another court, at the instance of the attorney general of the state, acting under special banking laws of the state. The court pointed out that the two cases might both proceed harmoniously. It was said: "We have not been asked by the plaintiff to do anything which the statute referred to above authorizes. We are not asked to dissolve the corporation. We are not asked to give time for making good an impaired capital, or to make a decree based upon proofs of unsafe or improper conduct of business. On the contrary, we are asked only to give a relief which is customary and often afforded, and which has no reference whatever to the remedies of a public character that the statute affords. So far as we can see, there is nothing in any proper action which we have taken, or may hereafter take, in the case, that will interfere with the commonwealth's effecting all that ought to be done, in any interest which needs to be guarded, without impinging upon the previously acquired jurisdiction of this court. We have said that we do not find in the statute any grant of exclusive jurisdiction over the case to the court of Dauphin county. This might be owing to some want of perception on our part, but we may go further, and say that no such express grant has been pointed out to us by the attorney general. In the absence of that which would deprive us of the jurisdiction already taken of the case as it stands before us, we know of no rule of law or requirement of public policy, which demands that we should vacate the decree made by us. There is, besides, a certain amount of respect for our own tribunal that we are bound to recognize."

IV. Effect of collusion between the parties to the receivership proceedings.

A debtor corporation by fraudulent collusion with some of its creditors cannot, by receivership proceedings, so tie up its property as to preclude other creditors from taking steps to secure the liquidation of their claims. The Coliseum v. Inter-State Lumber Co. (1898) 123 Ala. 512, 26 So. 122.

So, where a receiver was appointed in the Federal court, for the property of a corporation and to conduct and carry on its business, at the instance of a stockholder, for the general benefit of the stockholders and creditors, but nothing was done toward winding up the affairs of the corporation, a lien creditor will be permitted to prosecute his lien by the sale of the property covered thereby, in the state court in which such lien was established. Cohen v. Gold Creek, Nevada Min. Co. (1899) 95 Fed. 580.

a. In general.

It is not entirely clear as to just what proceedings will amount to the extinguishment of the existence of a corporation as a corporate body. This must necessarily depend upon the statutes of different states and the construction placed thereon by the local courts. Upon this matter it can only be said that, if the effect of the appointment of a receiver under statutes of this character is to extinguish the legal existence of the corporation, the rule applies that actions cannot be commenced or prosecuted against it. But unless the appointment of a receiver has this effect, such appointment does not preclude the commencement or prosecution of actions against the corporation.

In New York v. Illinois Surety Co. (1917) 180 App. Div. 513, 167 N. Y. Supp. 752, it is held that a mere appointment of a chancery receiver for a corporation does not affect the corporate existence of the corporation, and hence does not prevent placing a claim against it.

In Paddack v. Staley (1899) 13 Colo. App. 363, 58 Pac. 363, it appeared that the general manager and an officer of a corporation secured the appointment of a receiver for the corporation, not for the purpose of winding up and dissolving the corporation, but simply to obtain an accounting between him and the company, and to place the possession of the property in the meantime in the officer of the corporation, for management and control pending a decree. It is pointed out that the action was not for the destruction of the corporate capacity or powers of the corporation, and hence that it did not affect the rights of those creditors to bring actions against the corporation for the enforcement of their claims.

b. Appointment of a receiver in a mortgage foreclosure proceeding.

It is clear that, where the property of a corporation is placed in the hands of a receiver in proceedings to foreclose a lien upon such property, the existence of the corporation is not thereby affected, and creditors may commence or continue the prosecution of actions against the corporation to the extent of placing their demand in judgment.

New York. — Decker v. Gardner (1891) 124 N. Y. 334, 11 L.R.A. 480, 26 N. E. 814.

In Pittsburgh, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Long Island Loan & T. Co. (1899) 172 U. S. 493, 43 L. ed. 528, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 238, it is held that pendency of a foreclosure suit in a Federal court, in which the decree entered therein saved rights secured by a prior mortgage, does not interfere with the negotiation of bonds secured by such mortgage, or in any degree impair the lien created thereby.

In Scott v. Farmers' Loan & T. Co. (1895) 16 C. C. A. 358, 32 U. S. App. 468, 69 Fed. 17, it is held that jurisdiction by a court of chancery to foreclose a mortgage upon the property of a corporation and appoint a receiver for the property pending the foreclosure gave to the court no jurisdiction or power to seize or take into its custody or control, through the receiver or otherwise, property of the corporation which was not covered by the mortgage, nor could the court in such a suit lawfully make any order that would prevent, hinder, or delay other creditors of the mortgagor from subjecting the property of the corporation not included in the mortgage to the payment of their debts.

In Moore v. Southern States Land & Timber Co. (1896) 83 Fed. 399, it is held that, notwithstanding a suit to foreclose a mortgage and to appoint a receiver to take charge of the assets of the corporation, creditors of the corporation may maintain actions against the corporation and obtain priority of lien on the lands of the corporation, except such as are covered by the mortgage, unless actions of this character are especially enjoined by the court appointing the receiver. See Buckhannon & N. R. Co. v. Davis (1905) 68 C. C. A. 345, 135 Fed. 707, holding that the Federal court appointing a receiver for a railroad company in a proceeding to foreclose a mortgage against the company, in granting permission to maintain a proceeding to condemn a right of way over the property of the company, may require that such proceeding shall be prosecuted in that court rather than in the state court.

In Toledo, W. & W. R. Co. v. Beggs (1877) 85 Ill. 80, 28 Am. Rep. 613, it is held that the fact that a railroad corporation has been placed under the control of a receiver in a proceeding to foreclose a mortgage upon its property does not have the effect to abate or continue a pending action against the railroad company to recover damages for the tort. The court said that the mere fact that the property of a railroad corporation has been placed in the hands of a receiver will not bar or suspend a suit theretofore commenced against the corporation to recover a demand against it. When, however, the successful party undertakes its collection, it may be that the receiver can interpose.

In Allen v. Central R. Co. (1876) 42 Iowa, 683, it is held that an action may be maintained against a railroad company to recover damages for injury due to the negligence of the company, without first obtaining the consent of the court appointing a receiver in the mortgage foreclosure proceeding against the company.

In O'Mara v. Newton & N. W. R. Co. (1912) 156 Iowa, 701, 137 N. W. 942, it is held that the mere fact that a receiver has been appointed of a railroad company, in an action to foreclose a mortgage against it, since an action was commenced against the company, furnishes no ground for the dismissal of the action.

In Merchants' & Mfrs. Nat. Bank v. Kent Circuit Judge (1880) 43 Mich. 292, 5 N. W. 627, it is held that a receiver appointed in a proceeding to foreclose a chattel mortgage executed upon its property by a corporation is not entitled to restrain the prosecution of the pending action against the corporation. In so holding, the court said: "The order appealed from by the bank was improper in that it forbade a person not a party to the suit from testing in the customary common-law method the title which is asserted to specific property, and in so doing stretched unnecessarily, improperly, and oppressively, the power of the court of equity in abridgment of the jurisdiction of the court of law. There may be cases in which it would be proper for a court of equity, by means of a receivership, to draw to itself the jurisdiction to try disputed titles to property; but the jurisdiction to do so is exceptional, and must be supported by circumstances which render the common-law remedies inadequate, or for some reason unfit and unsuitable in the particular case. No such circumstances appear or are suggested here. It was proper and just that the bank be allowed to go on with the suit in replevin, if that seemed most for its interest, and improper and unjust that it should be restricted to a suit in trover, which would be in effect for net proceeds only, after the costs of a receivership, which the bank did not desire or assent to, had been deducted. If the property belonged to the bank, the injustice of requiring the owner to submit to such management, manufacture, and sale of it as another person might think expedient, and to recover the net proceeds only after the costs of a re-ceivership in a suit between other parties had been wholly or in part deducted, would be too manifest to require more than mere mention." And see the reported case (MARSHALL v. WABASH R. Co. ante, 435), holding that the fact that the property of a railway company was in the hands of a receiver appointed in another state in a mortgage foreclosure proceeding does not bar the right to prosecute an action for personal injuries against the company, the possession of the property of the corporation by the receiver not being thereby interfered with.

In Heath v. Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. (1884) 83 Mo. 617, it is held that the fact that a receiver has been appointed for the property of a railroad company in a proceeding to foreclose a mortgage upon such property does not bar the right to prosecute an action to recover for an injury due to the negligence of the company. The court said: "The fact that the property and most of the franchises of defendant were held in custody by a court of equity, for the purpose of enforcing satisfaction of specific claims against them, does not work a dissolution of the defendant as a corporation, or a cessation of its franchises. The corporate existence of defendant continues, although its dominion over its road and property may be in a state of suspension until they shall be returned to it by the court taking them in charge. Consequently, the defendant may be sued upon all causes of action for which it may be or become liable, in personam; and no license from that court having charge of its property is necessary as a condition precedent to the bringing of such actions. No judgment thus obtained could be satisfied from its property in the hands of a receiver, except through the administering assistance of the court appointing him. After its property is returned to its custody by the court taking charge of it, such judgment could be enforced against it, in the usual way, on final process. There is nothing, therefore, impossible or illegal in the suit against the defendant, notwithstanding the receivership."

In Decker v. Gardner (1891) 124

N. Y. 334, 11 L.R.A. 480, 26 N. E. 814, it is held that, where a receiver is appointed in a proceeding to foreclose a mortgage upon the property of a railroad company, he is confined in his functions to the care and preservation of the mortgaged property. In the temporary management of the railroad under the direction of the court, his appointment does not affect a right of action against the corporation, which does not interfere with his possession and control of the corporate property.

Where a receiver was appointed by the Federal court of one state in a proceeding to foreclose bonds issued by the corporation and in ancillary receivership proceedings, and such receiver was also appointed for the property of the corporation by the Federal court in another state, the latter court will entertain a petition by a creditor of the corporation resident in the state where the ancillary receivership proceedings was had, to determine the amount of his claim, and he will not be required to resort to the court where the primary receivership proceedings were pending. New York Secur. & T. Co. v. Equitable Mortg. Co. (1896) 71 Fed. 556.

The mere fact that a receiver is appointed for a corporation under state insolvency laws for the purpose of administering the assets of the corporation, or for the purpose of winding up its affairs, does not have the effect of precluding actions against the corporation unless, as a result of such proceeding, the legal existence of the corporation is virtually extinguished except as it may be represented by the receiver.

Washington.—Allen v. Olympia Light & P. Co. (1895) 13 Wash. 307, 43 Pac. 55.

In Central Nat. Bank v. Connecticut Mut. L. Ins. Co. (1881) 104 U. S. 54, 26 L. ed. 693, it appeared that an action was commenced against a national bank to enforce a trust in a deposit in the bank by the agent of the complainant. A few days after the commencement of this action a receiver was appointed for the bank in a voluntary dissolution proceeding. It was held that the appointment of a receiver did not affect the right to prosecute the action to final judgment. The court said: "The very purpose of the liquidation provided for is to pay the debts of the corporation, that the remainder of the assets, being reduced to money, may be distributed among the stockholders. That distribution cannot take place with any show of justice, and according to the intent of the law, until all liabilities to creditors have been honestly met and paid. If there are claims made which the directors of the association are not willing to acknowledge as just debts, there is nothing in the statute which is inconsistent with the right of the claimant to obtain a judicial determination of the controversy by process against the association, nor with that of the association to collect by suit debts due to it. It is clearly, we think, the intention of the law that it should continue to exist as a person in law capable of suing and being sued until its affairs and business are completely settled. The proceeding prescribed by the law seems to resemble not the technical dissolution of the corporation, without any saving as to the common-law consequences, but rather that of the dissolution of a copartnership, which nevertheless continues to subsist for the purpose of liquidation and winding up its business."

In Weigen v. Council Bluffs Ins. Co.

(1898) 104 Iowa, 410, 73 N. W. 862, in holding that the appointment of a receiver for an insurance company did not preclude the commencement and prosecution against it of actions upon insurance policies, the court said: "It will be observed that there is no allegation that the corporation had been dissolved, or that the court, in appointing the receiver, enjoined it from exercising any of its corporate powers. No statute of this state limits the powers of a corporation upon the appointment of a receiver, and those of the defendant were restrained only by depriving it of its property. The right to sue and be sued, conferred by the statute, was retained. No relief was asked against the receiver, and he was not a necessary party, though he might, in the discretion of the court, be permitted, by intervening, to interpose any proper defense to the action."

In Coyle v. Taunton Safe Deposit & T. Co. (1911) 207 Mass. 441, 93 N. E. 791, it is held that although a receiver has been appointed for a corporation in a proceeding to wind up its affairs, and its assets have been in part collected, a creditor may nevertheless bring an action at law against the corporation for the purpose of securing a judgment as a basis for enforcing the personal liability of stockholders of the corporation.

In People v. Commercial Alliance L. Ins. Co. (1896) 5 App. Div. 273, 39 N. Y. Supp. 117, affirmed in (1896) 151 N. Y. 640, 45 N. E. 1133, it is held that the appointment of a receiver for a life insurance company, in an action to dissolve the company, will not affect an action against the company pending in another court. The court said: "Such corporation could only be dissolved by the final judgment of the court, and the order appointing the temporary receiver had no effect upon the life of the corporation or its ability to sue or liability to be sued. Until such corporation was actually dissolved by a judgment, it continued in existence with the same powers and subject to the same liability as before the appointment of the temporary receiver, except so far as a court could, in the exercise of its equitable jurisdiction, restrain the corporation in the exercise of such power. There was nothing to prevent a creditor who had an action pending against the corporation from proceeding in that action, unless he was restrained by an order of the court from doing so; and such a restraining order would not affect him until it was served upon him. Upon the entry of final judgment dissolving the corporation, however, it is clear that all actions or proceedings against the corporation abated, and all subsequent proceedings in such actions were void, but as this judgment was regularly entered prior to the dissolution of the corporation, it was a valid and subsisting judgment, and was conclusive as against the corporation."

In Auburn Button Co. v. Sylvester (1893) 68 Hun, 401, 22 N. Y. Supp. 891, it is held that, by a judgment of sequestration against a corporation under which a receiver was appointed, the legal existence of the corporation is not extinguished, although by the judgment of sequestration the property and effects of the corporation were vested in the receiver, with power to sell and dispose of the same and pay the debts.

In Knauer v. Globe Mut. L. Ins. Co. (1880) 14 Jones & S. (N. Y.) 370, it is held that the appointment of a receiver pendente lite for an insurance company, at the instance of an attorney general, on the ground of the insolvency of the company, does not operate to suspend pending actions against the company, and such actions may be prosecuted to judgment without making the receiver a party thereto. The court said that a receiver pendente lite does not absolutely and in all respects supersede a corporation in extremis; that it is not dead until it is dissolved, hence that a suit against it can be prosecuted to judgment.

In Mickels v. Rochester City Bank (1844) 11 Paige (N. Y.) 113, 42 Am. Dec. 103, it is held that the appointment of a receiver for a bank does not affect the right of creditors to sue the bank, unless such actions are enjoined. The court said that until a judgment quo warranto, or a decree of the court declaring the surrender of the corporate franchises and the dissolution of the corporation, any creditor is at liberty to proceed with a suit against the corporation and obtain satisfaction of his debt in the same manner as if that surrender by insolvency or a nonuser had not occurred, and that if any creditors wish to prevent other creditors from obtaining a preference they must file a bill for the purpose of obtaining a judicial declaration of the court that the corporation has surrendered its corporate rights and franchises, according to the statute, together with a decree declaring the corporation dissolved, and directing the application of its property and effects to the payment of its creditors.

The appointment of a receiver for a corporation does not ipso facto dissolve the corporation and put an end to its individual capacity of suing and being sued by creditors. Kincaid v. Dwinelle (1875) 59 N. Y. 548; Del Valle v. Navarro (1887) 21 Abb. N. C. (N. Y.) 136; Allen v. Olympia Light & P. Co. (1895) 13 Wash. 307, 43 Pac. 55.

And the appointment of a receiver for a national bank does not terminate the legal existence of the corporation, and hence such appointment does not preclude the rendition against it of a judgment for rental, accruing under a lease subsequently to the time the bank was placed in the hands of a receiver. Chemical Nat. Bank v. Hartford Deposit Co. (1895) 161 U. S. 1, 40 L. ed. 595, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 439, affirming (1895) 156 Ill. 522, 41 N. E. 225.

And in Allen v. Olympia Light & P. Co. (1895) 13 Wash. 307, 43 Pac. 55, it is held that the appointment of a receiver does not work the dissolution of the corporation, and hence does not preclude an action against it upon its note.

In some jurisdictions the general plan of statutes providing for the appointment of a receiver for insolvent persons, or in proceedings to wind up the affairs of a corporation, contemplate the allowance and payment of claims against the corporation in the court in which the receivership proceedings are pending. In such case there is no advantage to a creditor in further prosecuting an individual action against the corporation, and there may be a disadvantage in not being in a position to secure dividends paid by the receiver. Where the court appointing a receiver thus draws to itself the administering of the property of the corporation and closing its affairs, it may be plausibly argued that in effect the legal existence of the corporation has been extinguished in so far as concerns maintaining against it actions at law in the usual case,—at least, where the claim is not contested,—and hence the court does not require that the issue be tried in an action at law. Berwind-White Coal Min. Co. v. Borinquen Sugar Co. (1913) 6 Porto Rico Fed. Rep. 59; Read v. Frankfort Bank (1843) 23 Me. 318; Hunt v. Columbian Ins. Co. (1867) 55 Me. 290, 92 Am. Dec. 592; Morton v. Stone Harbor Improv. Co. (1899) — N. J. Eq. —, 44 Atl. 875; Cowan v. Pennsylvania Plate Glass Co. (1898) 184 Pa. 1, 38 Atl. 1075.

In Carter, C. & M. Co. v. Stewart Drug Co. (1916) 115 Me. 289, 98 Atl. 809, it is held that where a receiver is appointed in a proceeding to dissolve a corporation and wind up its affairs, or the corporation is dissolved by a surrender of its charter, and a receiver is appointed to wind up its affairs, it ceases to exist as a body corporate, and the plaintiff in proceedings then pending against it has no standing in court to make any motion regarding the prosecution or disposal of the case.

In this regard it has been held that after the appointment of a receiver for a corporation in a proceeding which contemplates the administration of its property for the benefit of its creditors, no creditor will be permitted to acquire a lien on any property of the corporation by attachment, judgment, or otherwise. Guaranty State Bank & T. Co. v. Thompson (1917) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 195 S. W. 960, disapproving, in this regard, Central Coal & Coke Co. v. Southern Nat. Bank (1896) 12 Tex. Civ. App. 334, 34 S. W. 383, and following Ellis v. Vernon Ice, Light &

Water Co. (1893) 86 Tex. 109, 23 S. W. 858.

In Steinhauer v. Colmar (1898) 11 Colo. App. 494, 55 Pac. 291, it is held that the appointment of a receiver and even the dissolution of the corporation does not affect the validity of the order of affirmance in the appellate court of a judgment rendered against the corporation in the trial court. In this state, however, it is expressly provided by law that the dissolution of a corporation, for any cause whatever, shall not take away or impair any remedy given against such corporation for liabilities incurred prior to its dissolution.

VI. Effect of appointment upon enforcement of existing liens.

a. Judgment, attachment, garnishment, or execution liens.

After the appointment of a receiver for a corporation, judgments rendered against the corporation are not liens upon its real estate. Fidelity Ins. Trust & S. D. Co. v. Roanoke Iron Co. (1896) 81 Fed. 439; Clyde v. Richmond & D. R. Co. (1893) 56 Fed. 539. And this is true although such a judgment was entered between the time of entering an order appointing the receiver and the approval of the receivership bonds. Temple v. Glasgow (1897) 25 C. C. A. 540, 42 U. S. App. 417, 80 Fed. 441.

It has been held that the appointment of a receiver for a beneficiary association does not dissolve valid attachments of the property of the corporation levied before the filing of the bill of complaint under which the receiver was appointed, and where the funds attached have been paid over to the receiver upon order of the court, without prejudice to the rights of the attaching parties, the receiver takes the property subject to all valid attachments, and the claims of the attaching plaintiffs, when proved, are to be treated as preferred. Kittredge v. Osgood (1894) 161 Mass. 384, 37 N. E. 369.

That the dissolution of a foreign corporation in insolvency proceedings against it does not affect the validity of an attachment lien upon its property is the holding of Life Asso. of America v. Fassett (1882) 102 Ill. 315. Upon this point the court said: "When the attachment in this case was sued out, there was no legal impediment in the way of enforcing the plaintiff's claim. It was rightfully levied upon the company's lands, and became an existing lien upon them and a security for the attaching creditor's claim. If the company were a domestic corporation, it is clear this lien could not be defeated by a decree of dissolution under insolvency proceedings here. The company would be regarded, notwithstanding such decree, as still existing, for the purpose of enforcing the attachment lien by proceeding to judgment and execution in the usual way, and we see no sufficient reason why foreign corporations owning property and doing business here should not be regarded in the same way, and placed upon an equal footing in this respect, with domestic corporations. Whatever may be the effect of a decree of dissolution in the state creating the corporation, it may nevertheless be regarded as at least a de facto corporation here, for the purpose of enabling creditors to reach its effects in this state."

In Buswell v. Supreme Sitting, O. I. H. (1894) 161 Mass. 224, 23 L.R.A. 846, 36 N. E. 1065, it is held that the appointment of a receiver for an insolvent corporation does not affect attachment liens existing against the property of the corporation before the appointment.

It is pointed out in Cramer v. Iler (1901) 68 Kan. 579, 66 Pac. 617, that the statute gives to the custody of a receiver of the property of a bank no such effect as to make it equivalent to the levy of an execution upon the property and deprive a creditor of his priority and preference to the same extent as if a judgment had been rendered against the bank, and it is said that the general rule of law is to the contrary: "That is, that liens are not lost or affected by the appointment of a receiver; that he merely holds the property intact until the relative rights of parties can be determined; and that when the property rightfully passes into the custody of the law it is not subject to execution or interference without permission of the court, and any attempt to seize or sell it by a third party, without permission, would be a contempt of the court having it in custody."

In J. W. Dann Mfg. Co. v. Parkhurst (1890) 125 Ind. 317, 25 N. E. 847, it was held that an appointment of a receiver in an action to foreclose an employee's lien did not have the effect of divesting an execution lien acquired upon the property of the corporation by other creditors, prior to the appointment of the receiver, since a court did not acquire jurisdiction over the parties holding such liens, even though, during the time that such property was in the hands of the receiver, the right to enforce the liens was suspended, the property being in the hands and subject to the control of the court.

In Rickman v. Rickman (1914) 180 Mich. 224, 146 N. W. 609, Ann. Cas. 1915C, 1237, it is held that an action in one state against a corporation, to secure a judgment and lien upon its property, is not suspended by the appointment of a receiver for the corporation in another state, and the receiver is not entitled to have the prosecution of such suit enjoined where the creditor, by garnishment process, has secured a lien upon the funds of the corporation kept within the state.

In Second Nat. Bank v. New York Silk Mfg. Co. (1882) 11 Fed. 532, it is held that the appointment in a state court of a receiver for an insolvent corporation does not preclude the corporation from removing to the Federal court an attachment action, where attachment has been levied upon the property of the corporation prior to the appointment of the receiver.

In Willink v. Morris Canal & Bkg. Co. (1840) 4 N. J. Eq. 377, it is held that where, in a foreclosure proceeding, a decree was entered against a corporation before the appointment of a receiver for it, the proceeding may be prosecuted without delaying the same in order to make the receiver a party thereto.

In Metropolitan Trust Co. v. Lake Cities Electric R. Co. (1900) 100 Fed. 897, it is held that where a receiver of a railroad company is appointed in a state court at the instance of a creditor of the corporation, on the ground that it is insolvent, the appointment of the receiver will not preclude an action in the Federal court to foreclose a mortgage on the railroad property. The receiver's possession of such property, however, will not be interfered with in such suit.

In Re French (1918) 181 App. Div. 719, 168 N. Y. Supp. 988, affirmed without opinion in (1918) 224 N. Y. 555, 120 N. E. 863, it was apparently assumed that the holder of a mortgage upon property of an insolvent corporation in the hands of a receiver, appointed in proceedings to dissolve the corporation and wind up its affairs, would ordinarily be entitled to continue the prosecution of an action to foreclose the mortgage. It was, however, held that it was within the power of the court appointing the receiver to stay such foreclosure proceeding in order to enable the receiver to sell the equity of the corporation in the property covered by the mortgage.

In Re Binghamton General Electric Co. (1894) 143 N. Y. 261, 38 N. E. 297, it is held that under statutory proceedings for the dissolution of a corporation, to wind up its affairs, and appoint a receiver, it is within the power of the court appointing the receiver to restrain a creditor of the corporation from foreclosing his lien upon the collateral deposited by the corporation with him, prior to the insolvency proceeding, to secure a loan.

And it has been held that where a judgment has been obtained against the corporation, and an attachment execution issued thereon and levied upon the property of the corporation, before the dissolution of the corporation and the appointment of a receiver for it, the lien will not be set aside. Hays v. Lycoming Fire Ins. Co. (1882) 99 Pa. 621; Pickersgill v. Myers (1882) 99 Pa. 602. A. G. S.

(264 Pa. 406, 107 Atl. 783.)

Public accountant — liability to one relying on audit in purchasing stock.

A public accountant is not, merely because of negligence in making an audit of the books of the corporation, under contract with it, liable for losses sustained by one who purchases corporate stock in reliance upon the audit.

[See note on this question beginning on page 462.]

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Court of Common Pleas for Philadelphia County in favor of defendants in an action brought to hold them liable for losses alleged to have been sustained by plaintiff in purchasing stock of a corporation in reliance upon an audit made by them of its books. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. William T. Cooper and John W. Jennings for appellant.

Messrs. Yale L. Schekter, Ira Jewell Williams, and Francis Shunk Brown, for appellees:

In the absence of contract or privity between the parties, no action can be sustained upon contract or upon the case for negligence.

Per Curiam:

Appellees, defendants below, are certified public accountants, and, as such, audited the books and accounts of the Employers' Indemnity Company for the year 1911. The appellant, plaintiff below, averred in his statement of claim that he had been induced to buy eleven shares of the capital stock of that company, at the price of $200 per share, on the strength of the report made by the appellees as to its assets and liabilities at the close of the year 1911; the report having been shown to him by someone who suggested that he purchase the stock. A further averment was that the report was false and untrue, that the stock purchased by him on the strength of it is valueless, and for the loss he sustained he averred the defendants were liable. To enforce this liability an action in trespass was brought against them. In their affidavit of defense they averred that the statement of claim disclosed no cause of action, and asked that this be disposed of by the court below as a matter of law, under the provisions of § 20 of the Practice Act of May 14, 1915 (P. L. 483). It was so disposed of by the court below in entering judgment for the defendants.

There were no contractual relations between the plaintiff and defendants, and, if there is any liability from them to him, it must arise out of some breach of duty, for there is no averment that they made the report with intent to deceive him. The averment in the statement of claim is that the defendants were careless and negligent in making their report; but the plaintiff was a stranger to them and to it, and, as no duty rested upon them to him, they cannot be guilty of any negligence of which he can complain. Schiffer v. Sauer Co. 238 Pa. 550, 86 Atl. 479. This was the correct view of the court below, and the judgment is accordingly affirmed.

Public accountant—liability to one relying on audit in purchasing stock.

ANNOTATION.

Liability of public accountant.

The only cases other than the reported case (LANDELL v. LYBRAND, ante, 461) which have been found involving the question of the liability of public accountants are those where contractual relations existed between them and the plaintiffs.

Thus, the duties and liabilities of expert accountants are considered in East Grand Forks v. Steele (1913) 121 Minn. 296, 45 L.R.A.(N.S.) 205, 141 N. W. 181, Ann. Cas. 1914C, 720, and Smith v. London Assur. Corp. (1905) 109 App. Div. 882, 96 N. Y. Supp. 820, which involved contractual relations between the accountants and the parties seeking to hold them liable. In the former case, it is stated in the syllabus by the court that one who holds himself out as an expert accountant and accepts employment as such impliedly represents that he possesses the ability and skill of the average person engaged in that branch of skilled labor; and that an action to recover damages arising from negligence of an expert employed to audit accounts is founded on breach of contract, and not on tort.

In Smith v. London Assur. Corp. (N. Y.) supra, the court, after stating that public accountants now constitute a skilled professional class; and are subject generally to the same rules of liability for negligence in the practice of their profession as are members of other skilled professions, quoted Coolsey's statement of the rule governing the measure of such liability, as follows: "Every man who offers his services to another and is employed assumes the duty to exercise in the employment such skill as he possesses with reasonable care and diligence. In all those employments where peculiar skill is requisite, if one offers his services, he is understood as holding himself out to the public as possessing the degree of skill commonly possessed by others in the same employment, and, if his pretensions are unfounded, he commits a species of fraud upon every man who employs him in reliance on his public profession. But no man, whether skilled or unskilled, undertakes that the task he assumes shall be performed successfully, and without fault or error. He undertakes for good faith and integrity, but not infallibility, and he is liable to his employer for negligence, bad faith, or dishonesty, but not for losses consequent upon mere errors of judgment." Cooley, Torts, 2d ed. p. 277.

And it was held in Smith v. London Assur. Corp. (N. Y.) supra, that public accountants who were employed on an express agreement frequently to check a company's cash account in one branch of its business, and verify items thereon, were liable for sums embezzled by an agent of the company, because of their wilful and negligent failure to perform their undertaking. The action was by the accountants to recover for their services, and the company filed a counterclaim for the sums embezzled.

Fox v. Morrish (1918) 35 Times L. R. (Eng.) 126, involves the question of the duty and liability of an accountant to a manufacturer who employed him to examine the books of the concern, it being held that the accountant was negligent in failing to verify the bank balance as shown on the books.

In Mead v. Ball (1911) 106 L. T. N. S. (Eng.) 197, 28 Times L. R. 81, it was held that an accountant employed by the plaintiff to investigate the financial condition of a certain business was not liable for losses sustained by the plaintiff through an additional investment in the business, since it was not shown that the defendant's negligence had caused the damage.

Several cases of a nature somewhat analogous to the reported case (LANDELL v. LYBRAND, ante, 461) support the doctrine of that case.

Thus, in Le Lievre v. Gould [1893] 1 Q. B. (Eng.) 491, 62 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 353, 4 Reports, 274, 68 L. T. N. S. 626, 41 Week. Rep. 468, 57 J. P. 484, it was held that a mortgagee of a builder's interest in land and in buildings to be erected thereon, the mortgage money to be paid in instalments as the building progressed, could not recover from a surveyor and architect who had been procured by the owner of the property, and who had no contractual relations with the mortgagee, for negligence in giving certificates as to the progress of the building, on the faith of which the mortgagee advanced money; since the surveyor owed no duty to the mortgagee. It was held that, in the absence of fraud, there could be no recovery even for gross negligence. It appears that the surveyor, who was employed by the owner of the land prior to the giving of the mortgage, was not aware of the contents of the mortgage contract. But it was contended that he owed a duty to the mortgagee to exercise care in giving the certificates because he knew that the mortgagee would or might act upon them in advancing money. Instances were cited in which a duty exists, irrespective of contractual relations, as where, by reason of proximity to another, one may owe a duty not to cause a personal injury, or where an owner of premises which are in a dangerous condition owes a duty to invitees, or where an owner of a chattel of a dangerous nature owes a duty to use care that it may not injure others. But it was said that the law did not go to the extent of holding one responsible for what he stated in a certificate to any person to whom he might have reason to suppose that the certificate would be shown; that the law did not consider that what one wrote on paper was like a gun or other dangerous instrument, and, unless he intended to deceive, did not, in the absence of contract, hold him responsible for drawing his certificate carelessly.

According to Le Lievre v. Gould (Eng.) supra, fraud in making untrue statements in a certificate under the circumstances stated above could not arise from gross negligence alone, although that might be an element tending to prove fraud; but, for the misstatement to be fraudulently made, it must be made either with knowledge by the one making it that it was untrue, or, if he did not know that the statement was untrue, it must be made by him deliberately, intending that it should be acted upon, and not knowing and not caring whether it was true or false.

Le Lievre v. Gould (Eng.) supra, and other cases therein cited, were held to have overruled the case of Cann v. Willson (1888) L. R. 39 Ch. Div. (Eng.) 39, 57 L. J. Ch. N. S. 1034, 59 L. T. N. S. 723, 37 Week. Rep. 28.

which held that a valuer of property, employed by the owner, who was desirous of obtaining a mortgage on it, was liable to the mortgagee for damages for negligence in making a false valuation, although there were no contractual relations between him and the mortgagee, where the valuation was made directly to the agent of the mortgagee, with knowledge of the purpose for which it was to be used.

And in Love v. Mack (1905) 93 L. T. N. S. (Eng.) 352, affirming (1905) 92 L. T. N. S. 345, it was held that a valuer of property who had made the valuation for an insurance society which had been requested to guarantee a proposed loan on the property was not liable to the mortgagee for negligence in making the valuation, since it was not made for his use, but for that of the guaranty company, although, with the consent of the latter, the valuer had given the agent of the mortgagee a copy of the valuation, and knew that the mortgagee would not make an independent valuation.

A case which appears to be of value on the subject under annotation is Scholes v. Brook (1891) 63 L. T. N. S. (Eng.) 837, in which, although it was held that a valuer of property was liable to a mortgagee for negligence in making the valuation, because of contractual relations between them, the valuation having been made for the mortgagee, the court was of the opinion that had the evidence not showed such contractual relations, there could have been no recovery. It was said: "Fraud in this case has not been pleaded, and is not established; but it is said on behalf of the plaintiff that, even if fraud has not been established, and although there might not be what has been called by counsel a contractual relationship between the plaintiff and the valuers, there was nevertheless an obligation or duty on the part of the valuers towards the plaintiff, which would make them liable on the ground that they had invited the plaintiff to act on their valuation, in case it was not accurate or was not made with reasonable care apart from fraud. In my judgment that point would not avail the plaintiff. Cases have been cited which, it is said, establish such a liability. But, apart from Cann v. Willson (Eng.) supra, it appears to me that the authorities may be divided into two classes. One of those classes is when one person invites another to come upon his premises, in which case the person giving the invitation must use reasonable care to insure that the condition of the premises does not subject the person invited to danger. Another class is where a person becomes liable for using or leaving about, in such a way as to cause danger, an instrument which is dangerous in itself. Beyond those two classes, I am not aware, for the moment, of any circumstances under which a person can be held liable in a case such as that which has been argued before me. But the present case falls within neither of these two classes. An invitation to advance money or take shares on a valuation or on a prospectus does not, I think, come within the first class, nor can a valuation or a prospectus be considered a dangerous instrument within the meaning of that term as used above by me; and that being so, I think that, if the plaintiff had not established a contract, this action must have failed unless I followed Cann v. Willson." And this decision the court regarded, as in the cases previously cited, as overruled.

The principle relied on in the reported case (LANDELL v. LYBRAND, ante, 461) is supported by such cases as National Sav. Bank v. Ward (1880) 100 U. S. 195, 25 L. ed. 621, and the decisions therein cited. That was an action against an attorney by a lender of money on real-estate security for negligence in examination of the title. The attorney had been employed by the borrower, had made the examination prior to any negotiations for the loan, without knowledge of the use to which his search was to be put, and without any contractual relations or communications of any kind with the plaintiff. It was held that, in the absence of fraud or collusion, the attorney was not liable, as his duty was only to his client.

The principles involved in the present subject appear to be somewhat analogous to those on the question of the liability of a title abstractor to one not in contractual relations with him. Without attempting to exhaust the cases on this latter subject, attention is called to several cases involving title abstractors because of their bearing on the present question.

In Anderson v. Spriestersbach (1912) 69 Wash. 393, 42 L.R.A. (N.S.) 176, 125 Pac. 166, it was held that one preparing an abstract of title to real estate at the instance of the owner of property, which, at his instance, is delivered to a stranger whom the abstractor knows will rely upon it in dealing with the property, is liable to him for losses resulting from a material error or omission in the abstract. The court refers to the rule laid down in 1 Cyc. 215, that "by the weight of authority, an abstractor is liable only to the person ordering and paying for the abstract; and, where this view obtains, the fact that an abstractor has knowledge that his abstract is to be used in a sale or loan to advise a purchaser, or person about to lend money, does not affect the rule as to his liability." But the court stated that while this rule was sustained by the weight, considered in numbers, of authority, it was not willing to apply it, unless it was plain that there was no duty on the part of the abstractor to the party injured; and that in the case before it the abstractor not only knew the purpose of the abstract, but became the agent of the other party to the transaction out of which the loss resulted, to deliver it to the defendant.

The general rule, it is stated in Thomas v. Guarantee Title & T. Co. (1910) 81 Ohio St. 432, 26 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1210, 91 N. E. 183, 2 N. C. C. A. 80, is that an abstractor can be held liable for negligence in making or certifying an abstract of title only to the person who employed him.

It appears that the liability of an abstractor for negligence, in the absence of statute, depends generally on privity of contract; so that an abstractor furnishing an abstract of title to one person is not liable to another party using the same for omissions or negligence; at least, where the abstractor had no notice or knowledge that the abstract was furnished for his use. See, among other cases to this effect: Talpey v. Wright (1895) 61 Ark. 275, 54 Am. St. Rep. 206, 32 S. W. 1072; Schade v. Gehner (1896) 133 Mo. 282, 34 S. W. 576; Zweigardt v. Birdseye (1894) 57 Mo. App. 462; Glawatz v. People's Guaranty Search Co. (1900) 49 App. Div. 465, 63 N. Y. Supp. 691; Lockwood v. Title Ins. Co. (1911) 73 Misc. 296, 130 N. Y. Supp. 824; Equitable Bldg. & Life Asso. v. Bank of Commerce & T. Co. (1907) 118 Tenn. 678, 12 L.R.A. (N.S.) 449, 102 S. W. 901, 12 Ann. Cas. 407.

But a different rule has sometimes been applied where the abstractor has notice that the abstract is procured for a particular person or use, it being held that he is liable to such person for damages caused by his negligence or omission in the examination of the records. See, for example, Denton v. Nashville Title Co. (1903) 112 Tenn. 320, 79 S. W. 799; and Brown v. Simms (1899) 22 Ind. App. 317, 72 Am. St. Rep. 308, 53 N. E. 779. Some of the cases in which the abstractor was held liable to a third party proceed, it appears, on the ground that there was privity of contract, the party dealing with the abstractor being regarded as the agent of the one for whose use the abstract was intended. Thus, an abstractor who furnished an abstract to the owner of property was held liable in Dickle v. Nashville Abstract Co. (1890) 89 Tenn. 431, 24 Am. St. Rep. 616, 14 S. W. 896, to the purchaser who relied upon it, on the theory that there was privity of contract between them. And that an abstractor may be liable for negligence to an undisclosed principal, see, for example, Young v. Lohr (1902) 118 Iowa, 624, 92 N. W. 684.

PUBLIC SERVICE COMPANY OF NORTHERN ILLINOIS

v.

WILLIAM RECKTENWALD et al., Appts.

Illinois Supreme Court — December 17, 1919.

(290 Ill. 314, 125 N. E. 271.)

Eminent domain — sufficiency of effort to agree.

1. Sufficient effort to agree with the property owner as to compensation to be awarded for property sought by a public service corporation, to warrant the institution of condemnation proceedings, is effected by making in writing a cash offer for an acreage rate, to which no reply is made.

[See note on this question beginning on page 471.]

— failure to agree with one joint owner — effect.

2. Upon failure to agree with one joint owner of property sought by a public service corporation as to the compensation to be made for it, no attempt to negotiate with the other joint owner is necessary.

— General Corporation Law.

3. The General Corporation Act of Illinois does not confer the right to acquire property by eminent domain.

— delegation of power.

4. The legislature may lawfully delegate to the Public Utilities Commission the right and power to compel an exercise of the power of eminent domain to secure the public safety.

Constitutional law — subject of statute — construction.

5. The constitutional provision that no act shall embrace more than one subject, which shall be expressed in the title, prohibits the passage of an act containing provisions not fairly embraced in the title, and it also prohibits the passage of an act relating to different subjects embraced in the title.

[See 25 R. C. L. 841 et seq.]

Statute — sufficiency of title.

6. An act having a single general subject, indicated by its title, may contain any number of provisions, no matter how diverse they may be, so long as they are not inconsistent with or foreign to the general subject.

[See 25 R. C. L. 842.]

Eminent domain — conferring power upon light and power company.

7. The power of eminent domain may be conferred upon a corporation organized to serve the public by supplying the people with gas, electricity, heat, and water.

[See 9 R. C. L. 1194; 10 R. C. L. 195; 12 R. C. L. 885.]

Statute — title — sufficiency.

8. A provision conferring upon a commission power to require additions, extensions, repairs, or improvements to or changes in the existing plant, equipment, apparatus, facilities, or other physical property of a public utility is covered by a title, "An Act to Provide for the Regulation of Public Utilities."

— conferring power of eminent domain.

9. A provision conferring upon public service corporations the power to secure property necessary to carry out an order of the Public Utilities Commission, by an exercise of the right of eminent domain, is covered by a title, "An Act to Provide for the Regulation of Public Utilities."

[See 25 R. C. L. 860.]

APPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the Lake County Court (Persons, J.) denying motions to dismiss and in arrest of judgment, in a proceeding brought to condemn certain real estate belonging to defendants for the purpose of constructing an extension of petitioner's electric transmission line. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. E. V. Orris and R. J. Dady for appellants.

Messrs. Isham, Lincoln, & Beale, William A. Morrow and Cyrus H. Adams, Jr., for appellee:

The inability to agree of the parties to a condemnation proceeding will be sufficiently established by proving an offer to purchase made by letter, duly mailed to a property owner, to which offer the company received no reply.

Pittsburg, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Gage, 286 Ill. 213, 121 N. E. 582; Re Metropolitan Elev. R. Co. 18 N. Y. S. R. 134, 2 N. Y. Supp. 278.

If one of two owners in common of land will not agree to sell to the corporation seeking to condemn, it is unnecessary to negotiate with the other.

Rogers v. Cosgrave, 98 Neb. 608, 153 N. W. 569.

Where it appears that the property owners filed a cross petition for damages to their land not taken, consented to the impaneling of a jury, and vigorously contested the case, the allegation of the petition of inability to agree need not be supported by any other evidence, and the point has been waived.

Ward v. Minnesota & N. W. R. Co. 119 Ill. 287, 10 N. E. 365; Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. v. Baltimore & O. & C. R. Co. 149 Ill. 272, 37 N. E. 91; West Skokie Drainage Dist. v. Dawson, 243 Ill. 175, 90 N. E. 377, 17 Ann. Cas. 776; Alton & S. R. Co. v. Vandalia R. Co. 271 Ill. 558, 111 N. E. 531.

The requirement of article 4, § 13, of the Constitution of the state of Illinois is complied with when the statute has but one general subject, fairly indicated by its title. The constitutional provision must be liberally construed, and every presumption exercised in favor of the validity of a statute.

People ex rel. Longenecker v. Nelson, 133 Ill. 565, 27 N. E. 217; Manaster v. Kioebge, 257 Ill. 431, 100 N. E. 989; People ex rel. Fitzgerald v. Stitt, 280 Ill. 553, 117 N. E. 784; People v. Sayer, 246 Ill. 382, 92 N. E. 900.

The comprehensiveness of the title of an act is no objection, provided it is not deceptive or misleading.

People v. McBride, 234 Ill. 146, 123 Am. St. Rep. 82, 84 N. E. 865, 14 Ann. Cas. 994; Perkins v. Cook County, 271 Ill. 449, 111 N. E. 580, Ann. Cas. 1917A, 27; Milne v. People, 224 Ill. 125, 79 N. E. 631.

An act embracing one general subject is not unconstitutional as containing more than one subject, because it is comprehensive and contains numerous provisions, if these provisions are pertinent to the general subject of the act.

Sutter v. People's Gaslight & Coke Co. 284 Ill. 634, 120 N. E. 562; People v. Braun, 246 Ill. 428, 92 N. E. 917, 20 Ann. Cas. 448; People ex rel. Davis v. Nellis, 249 Ill. 12, 94 N. E. 165.

The title, "An Act to Provide for the Regulation of Public Utilities," will embrace a provision granting the power of eminent domain to these utilities, and the grant of the power of eminent domain is germane to the provisions of the act with respect to regulation, and does not constitute a separate or different subject.

The right of the legislature to delegate to the Public Utilities Commission control over the exercise by corporations of the power of eminent domain, and the constitutionality of the Public Utilities Act and of this provision, have been upheld by the supreme court of Illinois.

State Public Utilities Commission v. Monarch Refrigerating Co. 267 Ill. 528, P.U.R.1915D, 119, 108 N. E. 716, Ann. Cas. 1916A, 528; Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Cavanagh, 278 Ill. 609, 116 N. E. 128.

Cartwright, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellee, the Public Service Company of Northern Illinois, filed in the county court of Lake county its petition, setting forth that it was a corporation organized under the Act of 1872 (Laws 1871-72, p. 296), entitled, "An Act Concerning Corporations," to manufacture, produce, distribute, and sell gas and electricity, to distribute water, and to distribute heat, and was a public utility within the meaning of the act entitled, "An Act to Provide for the Regulation of Public Utilities" (Laws 1913, p. 459); that the Public Utilities Commission, after hearing upon complaint, entered an order finding that the construction, operation, and maintenance of an extension of petitioner's electric transmission line ought to be made, and was necessary to promote the convenience of the public and to secure adequate service or facilities, and directing the petitioner to construct, operate, and maintain such extension from its substation No. 82 in the city of Evanston, northwesterly, and in general along the eastern side of and adjoining the existing right of way of the Chicago & Northwestern Railway Company to a point specified in the petition; that said transmission line would consist first of a single row, and later, when conditions might warrant, a double row, of steel towers supporting high-tension wires; and that it was unable to agree with the various owners and persons interested in the tracts of land therein described as to the amount of compensation to be paid them for the taking and use thereof; and the petition prayed the court to cause such compensation to be ascertained according to law. Among the tracts of land described in the petition was "a strip of land eighty-five (85) feet wide east of and immediately adjoining the right of way of the Chicago & Northwestern Railway Company, in and through the south half of the northeast quarter of the northeast quarter of section thirty-four (34), township forty-three (43) north, range twelve (12) east of the third principal meridian, in Lake county, Illinois," and the appellants, William Recktenwald and Charlotte Recktenwald, were named as owners. The appellants entered their special appearance, and, alleging that they were the owners in fee simple of the tract of land, moved the court to dismiss the petition. After a hearing the motion was denied, and appellants then entered their general appearance and filed a cross petition, alleging damage to land not taken, and engaged in a trial, which resulted in a verdict fixing the compensation. The appellants made a motion in arrest of judgment, which was denied, and judgment was entered, from which this appeal was prosecuted.

Nine grounds of the motion to dismiss were stated therein, but those which are now relied upon by the appellants are that the petitioner had not made an effort to agree with the appellants upon the compensation to be paid to them before filing the petition, and that the petitioner had no right to exercise the power of eminent domain.

The tract of land was owned jointly by the appellants, and the petitioner, by a letter addressed to the appellant William Recktenwald, inclosing a copy of the order of the Public Utilities Commission and a description of the property, offered him in cash at the rate of $350 per acre. No reply was made to the letter, and there was a sufficient effort on the part of the petitioner to agree with William Recktenwald. Pittsburg, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Gage, 286 Ill. 213, 121 N. E. 582. The appellants were joint owners of the land, and the offer was for the whole title, perhaps in the belief that the interest of Charlotte Recktenwald was an inchcate right of dower. The offer was, in substance, to the owners of the tract; but in any view of the matter, if the petitioner could not agree with William Recktenwald for his undivided interest, no further attempt to negotiate was necessary.

The principal argument in support of the errors assigned is that the petitioner had no right to exercise the power of eminent domain, and this is based upon the following propositions: "(1) That the act under which the petitioner was organized did not confer the right; (2) that §§ 50 and 59 of the Act effect.

Providing for the Regulation of Public Utilities are obnoxious to and in contravention of § 13 of article 4 of the Constitution, which provides that 'no act hereafter passed shall embrace more than one subject, and that shall be expressed in the title;' (3) that the provision of § 59 for the exercise of the power of eminent domain is not expressed in or covered by the title of the act or, if so expressed, the title embraces more than one subject; (4) if the provisions of §§ 50 and 59 are expressed in the title, they violate the Constitution by delegating to the Public Utilities Commission the power to delegate to a public utility the right to exercise the power of eminent domain; (5) if those sections are constitutional, they do not confer upon corporations created prior to the passage of the act the right to exercise the power of eminent domain, but simply regulate the exercise of such power by a corporation already having it."

The General Corporation Act, under which the appellee is organized, does not confer the right to acquire private property by the exercise of the power of eminent domain. Harvey v. Aurora & G. R. Co. 174 Ill. 295, 51 N. E. 163. The existence of the right depends upon the provisions and validity of the act for the regulation of public utilities.

Aside from the question of the constitutionality of §§ 50 and 59, which was not raised or considered in the case of Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Cavanagh, 278 Ill. 609, 116 N. E. 128, the questions whether the Public Utilities Commission has power to require a public utility to do some act which will require the exercise of the power of eminent domain, and whether the Public Utilities Act simply regulates the exercise of the power by a corporation already having it, were settled in that case. The Chicago, Burlington, & Quincy Railroad Company had been invested with power to take private property by eminent domain for the original construction of its railroad, but the power had been exhausted by the original location and no longer existed. If the company had power to relocate its railroad, and to take private property for the relocation, it was derived from the Public Utilities Act under the order of the Public Utilities Commission. It was said that the general assembly might lawfully delegate to the Public Utilities Commission the right and duty to exercise or compel the exercise of the power of eminent domain to secure the public safety, and the right and duty were necessarily implied, because, if the petitioner had no right to take property for the proposed change, it would be powerless to comply with the order, and, the Commission having been empowered to make the order, everything essential to require and assure compliance with it was necessarily included.

The constitutional provision that no act shall embrace more than one subject, which shall be expressed in the title, prohibits the passage of an act containing provisions not fairly embraced in the title, and any such provisions are void, and it also prohibits the passage of an act relating to different subjects expressed in the title, in which case the whole act is void. Milne v. People, 224 Ill. 125, 79 N. E. 631; Rouse v. Thompson, 228 Ill. 522, 81 N. E. 1109; Sutter v. People's Gaslight & Coke Co. 284 Ill. 634, 120 N. E. 562. The general purpose of the constitutional provision, however, is accomplished when a law has but one general subject, which is fairly indicated by its title. The title is not required to be an index to the body of the act, or as comprehensive in matters of detail, but if it fairly indicates the general subject, and reasonably covers all the provisions of the act, and is not calculated to mislead the general assembly or the people, it is a sufficient compliance with the constitutional requirement. Unless the act contains matters having no proper connection or relation to the title, or the title itself contains subjects having no proper relation to each other, the constitutional provision is not violated. An act having a single general subject, indicated in the title, may contain any number of provisions, no matter how diverse they may be, so long as they are not inconsistent with or foreign to the general subject, and may be considered in furtherance of such subject by providing for the method and means of carrying out the general object. People ex rel. Longenecker v. Nelson, 133 Ill. 565, 27 N. E. 217; People v. McBride, 234 Ill. 146, 123 Am. St. Rep. 82, 84 N. E. 865, 14 Ann. Cas. 994; Manaster v. Kioebge, 257 Ill. 431, 100 N. E. 989; Perkins v. Cook County, 271 Ill. 449, 111 N. E. 580, Ann. Cas. 1917A, 27; Sutter v. People's Gaslight & Coke Co. 284 Ill. 634, 120 N. E. 562.

It cannot be doubted that power may be conferred upon a corporation, organized under authority of the general assembly to serve the public by supplying the people with gas, electricity, heat, and water, which can best be produced and distributed by such a corporation acting under state control, to take private property for the public uses of such corporation by the power of eminent domain. The question here is whether that has been accomplished by the act entitled, "An Act to Provide for the Regulation of Public Utilities." The regulation of such corporations performing a public service includes their control, direction, and government, and subjects them to rules and restrictions for their management or government, in order that the public may be efficiently served on equal terms, and for reasonable compensation, with services and commodities furnished by the corporations. To that end it is within the general purview of the title to provide that if the Commission, after hearing, shall find that the service is inadequate and that additions, extensions, repairs, or improvements to or changes in the existing plant, equipment, apparatus, facilities, or other physical property of any public utility ought reasonably to be made, or that a new structure or structures should be erected to promote the security or convenience of the public, or in any other way to secure adequate service or facility, the Commission may require the same to be made. That has been done by § 50 of the act, and it is free from constitutional objection.

For the purpose of rendering the provision of § 50 effective, and providing the method and means of requiring the improvement, changes, or new structures, § 59 provides that, when necessary for the construction of any alterations, additions, extensions, or improvements ordered or authorized under § 50, any public utility may enter upon, take, or damage private property in the manner provided for by the law of eminent domain. This is only a provision for making effective an order lawfully made, and comes within the established rule that any provision in furtherance of the title, or to render the provisions of an act effective, is not in violation of the constitutional restriction. Without the power of eminent domain, a lawful order for securing the public safety and convenience would be an idle ceremony, because private property could not be taken and appropriated to the required use.

No reason is suggested why the act for the regulation of public utilities should be held to apply only to corporations organized after the passage of the act, and none is apparent.

The act does not embrace more than one subject, and that subject is expressed in the title. The court did not err in denying the motions to dismiss and in arrest of judgment.

The judgment is affirmed.

a. General principles.

Of course, no attempt to agree on compensation is necessary unless required by Constitution or statutes, and this note presupposes such requirement.

The effort to agree must be a bona fide one, showing an attempt to purchase by treaty between the parties. Mahoney v. San Francisco (1879) 53 Cal. 383; Toledo, A. A. & N. M. R. Co. v. Detroit, L. & N. R. Co. (1886) 62 Mich. 564, 4 Am. St. Rep. 875, 29 N. W. 500; Re Prospect Park & C. I. R. Co. (1876) 67 N. Y. 371; Schenectady R. Co. v. Lyon (1908) 41 Misc. 506, 85 N. Y. Supp. 40; Big Cuyahoga Light, Heat & P. Co. v. Turner, V. & T. Co. (1913) 17 Ohio C. C. N. S. 34.

A reasonable bona fide attempt to agree is sufficient. Todd v. Austin (1867) 34 Conn. 78; Bridwell v. Gate City Terminal Co. (1907) 127 Ga. 520, 10 L.R.A. (N.S.) 909, 56 S. E. 624; *Volberg v. Supp. 983.

The "law does not mean that it must be impossible to buy . . . at any price, however large; it means that the owner must be either unwilling to sell at all, or willing to sell only at a price so large as, in the good judgment of the agents of the corporation, is excessive." Re Prospect Park & C. I. R. Co. (1876) 67 N. Y. 371.

To refuse to admit proof of value was error where the petition alleged that "your petitioner has not been able to acquire title thereto by agreement with the owner for the purchase thereof, for the reason that such owner asks for the same what your petitioner considers an unreasonable price, and refuses to accept the reasonable sum which your petitioner has offered therefor," and the allegation was controverted. The court said: "It was only by showing the value that the question whether an effort to acquire the title by agreement, or whether the owner asked or demanded an unjust, unreasonable, and exorbitant price for his land, could be determined." Grand Rapids, L. & D. R. Co. v. Weiden (1888) 69 Mich. 572, 37 N. W. 872.

But it is not sufficient, but a mere conclusion, to state "upon information and belief, that your petitioner has not been able to acquire title to the real estate so taken as aforesaid, and is unable to agree for the purchase thereof with the persons who own, or have, or claim to own or have, estates or interests in the said real estate, and the reason of such inability is that they will not sell the same to your petitioner for a reasonable compensation." Re Metropolitan Elev. R. Co. v. Dominick (1889) 55 Hun, 198, 8 N. Y. Supp. 151.

No attempt need be shown to agree upon a sale with one who cannot convey his title. Davis v. Northwestern Elev. R. Co. (1897) 170 Ill. 595, 48 N. E. 1058; Indiana C. R. Co. v. Oakes (1862) 20 Ind. 9; Balch v. Essex County (1869) 103 Mass. 106; Stillwater & M. Street R. Co. v. Slade (1899) 36 App. Div. 587, 55 N. Y. Supp. 966.

So, an offer need not be made to an infant. Davis v. Northwestern Elev. R. Co. (Ill.) supra; Indiana C. R. Co. v. Oakes (1862) 20 Ind. 9; Stillwater & M. Street R. Co. v. Slade (N. Y.) supra.

In Davis v. Northwestern Elev. R. Co. (1897) 170 Ill. 595, the court said: "The pleadings show that defendants were nonresidents, and that certain of them were minors. In such case it is not necessary to show by proof that the compensation and damage could not be agreed upon. The minors could not make an agreement."

It has been held that it is sufficient to show a failure of negotiations as to an undivided part of the land. Rogers v. Cosgrave (1915) 98 Neb. 608, 153 N. W. 569.

So, failure with a lessor makes it unnecessary to show failure with a lessee. Re Rochester, H. & L. R. Co. (1888) 110 N. Y. 119, 17 N. E. 678. And if the property is in the hands of a lessee on a long lease, and he will not agree, it is not required to show an attempt to agree with the lessor. State, Pennsylvania R. Co. Prosecutor, v. National Docks & N. J. Junction Connecting R. Co. (1894) 57 N. J. L. 86, 30 Atl. 183.

One owner may not object to a lack of evidence of the failure of the condemnor to agree with another owner. Eddleman v. Union County Traction & P. Co. (1905) 217 Ill. 409, 75 N. E. 510; Mercer County v. Wolff (1908) 237 Ill. 74, 86 N. E. 708.

It is not necessary to show an attempt to agree with the holder of a vendor's lien. Thomas v. St. Louis, B. & S. R. Co. (1897) 164 Ill. 634, 46 N. E. 8.

Where an adult claimed all, infants claimed some, and there were liens, the plaintiff might properly say that it was unable to agree with the owners. Stillwater & M. Street R. Co. v. Slade (1899) 36 App. Div. 587, 55 N. Y. Supp. 966.

Where the owner contests on the merits he waives the objection of failure to attempt to agree on compensation. Ward v. Minnesota & N. W. R. Co. (1887) 119 Ill. 287, 10 N. E. 365; West Skokie Drainage Dist. v. Dawson (1909) 243 Ill. 175, 90 N. E. 377, 17 Ann. Cas. 776; Alton & S. R. Co. v. Vandalia R. Co. (1916) 271 Ill. 558, 111 N. E. 531; Mississippi & M. R. Co. v. Rosseau (1859) 8 Iowa, 373; Schuylkill & S. Navigation v. Diffebach (1794) 1 Yeates (Pa.) 367; State ex rel. Skamania Boom Co. v. Superior Ct. (1907) 47 Wash. 166, 91 Pac. 637; State ex rel. Wilson v. Superior Ct. (1907) 47 Wash. 397, 92 Pac. 269.

In Ward v. Minnesota & N. W. R. Co. (1887) 119 Ill. 287, 10 N. E. 365, supra, where there was a cross petition asking damages for lands not taken, the court said: "It is true no direct testimony was offered, but the fact there is a vigorous contest between the landowner and the corporation, both on the original as well as upon the cross petition, makes it evident the parties were unable to agree as to the compensation to be paid for the land to be condemned. It would have been idle to offer direct testimony on a point in the case that both parties conceded."

Courts will not set aside inquisitions on writs on the ground that the owners of the lands have not been offered terms of agreement, when it appears that they combined in a body against the work itself, attended the striking of the jury, showed their lines to the jury, and made preparations for their coming. Schuylkill & S. Navigation v. Diffebach (1794) 1 Yeates (Pa.) 367, supra.

One who has enjoined a public service corporation from interfering with his property cannot, in the condemnation proceeding, raise the objection that, prior to the proceeding, no endeavor was made to obtain the rights by purchase. State ex rel. Burrows v. Superior Ct. (1908) 48 Wash. 277, 17 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1005, 125 Am. St. Rep. 927, 93 Pac. 423.

Where the plaintiffs insisted that a school board sought to appropriate the land without trying to purchase it at a reasonable price, or to procure it by donation or otherwise, the court said: "The evidence shows that the plaintiffs stated positively that they would not sell the land unless compelled so to do. Invoking the principle often announced in the law of tender that where it is useless to make a tender none is required, it was not necessary for the defendants to attempt to purchase this land, or to secure it by donation or otherwise, before instituting condemnation proceedings." Nelson v. School Dist. (1917) 100 Kan. 612, 164 Pac. 1075.

It may be noted that it has been held that where the owner appears and makes no objection as to failure to show lack of agreement, the matter is waived. Doughty v. Somerville & E. R. Co. (1848) 21 N. J. L. 442. So, where the owner offers no evidence against the report of a village board of its unavailing efforts to agree with parties interested, he may not object to the finding to this effect. Depue v. Danschbach (1916) 273 Ill. 574, 113 N. E. 156.

II. Illustrations of sufficient attempts.

"A bona fide offer of an amount which the petitioner considered a fair price, and the refusal to accept it, are sufficient negotiations, within the statute. It is of no consequence that petitioner's agent had no expectation that the offer would be accepted." Fort-street Union Depot Co. v. Jones (1890) 83 Mich. 415, 47 S. W. 349.

Where the statute provides for condemnation proceedings if the company "shall not agree" with owners, a failure to reply to the overtures of a telegraph company by the owning railroad company in a reasonable time is sufficient. Louisville, N. O. & T. R.

Co. v. Postal Teleg.-Cable Co. (1891) 68 Miss. 806, 10 So. 74.

In Mercer County v. Wolff (1908) 287 Ill. 74, 86 N. E. 708, where an owner had declined to accept the offer of the county, the court said: "While it is true that he stated that he could not give an answer within a week, the county board was not compelled to wait that length of time. If he would not accept the offer, that was a failure to agree."

A ten days' offer is sufficient, though the directors of the owning corporation had no meeting within that time. Re New York (1892) 18 N. Y. Supp. 536, affirmed in (1892) 185 N. Y. 253, 31 Am. St. Rep. 825, 81 N. E. 1043.

Where fair written offers were made, to be answered within forty-eight hours, the court said: "The shortness of time given to answer might present a serious question, were it not for the fact that the running of the railroad for ten years in front of the property must have presented the question of the extent of damages to the parties frequently, and it is not unreasonable that, with fixed ideas on the subject, they were in a position within forty-eight hours to determine whether they would or would not accept." Re Metropolitan Elev. R. Co. (1889) 12 N. Y. Supp. 502.

Making no answer to a request for terms, or naming so large a sum that the proposition is rejected, sufficiently shows that the parties are unable to agree in relation to damages. Todd v. Austin (1867) 34 Conn. 78.

If a real estate agent, representing a railroad company, informed a lot owner that the company desired her lot for the purpose of the right of way and freight yard, and made her an offer which he testified was a fair price for the property desired, and which she refused to accept, this would be a sufficient negotiation for purchase, within the meaning of the statute, before the commencement by the company of condemnation proceedings. Bridwell v. Gate City Terminal Co. (1907) 127 Ga. 520, 10 L.R.A. (N. S.) 909, 56 S. E. 624; Volberg v. Gate City Terminal Co. (1907) 127 Ga. 537, 56 S. E. 991.

In Chicago & W. I. R. Co. v. Heidenreich (1912) 254 Ill. 231, 98 N. E. 567, Ann. Cas. 1913C, 266, the court said: "It was proved that the agent of the appellee offered the appellant $1,000 a front foot for his property, which was the valuation put upon the property, with great unanimity, by the witnesses for appellee on the trial. The evidence justifies the belief that the offer was bona fide, and that there was a sufficient attempt to agree on the compensation."

A request that the owner name a price, and his naming a price nearly twice what is later allowed by appraisers, show that the property could not be obtained by purchase or otherwise at a reasonable or satisfactory price. Jockheck v. Shawnee County (1894) 53 Kan. 780, 37 Pac. 621.

It was held to be sufficient when, as to one owner, the petition of village trustees alleged that when called on to fix a price he named $8,000, a sum which the trustees claimed to be more than ten times the value of his right, and, as to another, that when applied to to name a sum he declined, and that his property was so encumbered by mortgages and judgments as to make it difficult, if not impossible, to fix a price. Re Middletown (1880) 82 N. Y. 196.

The "law does not mean that it must be impossible to buy the right of way at any price, however large; it means that the owner must be either unwilling to sell at all, or willing to sell only at a price so large as, in the good judgment of the agents of the corporation, is excessive. That appears here. Though the price offered to the owners was nominal, they refused to name any price, or that asked by them was so much beyond the view of value held by the president, that there seemed no likelihood of agreement." Re Prospect Park & C. I. R. Co. (1876) 67 N. Y. 371.

In Waverly v. Waverly Water Co. (1908) 127 App. Div. 440, 111 N. Y. Supp. 541, affirmed in (1909) 194 N. Y. 545, 87 N. E. 1129, it was held that an unanswered substantial offer by a village to buy the plant and property of a water company, two unanswered requests for a price of sale, and neglect and refusal by the company to enter into negotiations, are, when alleged, sufficient to assert endeavor and inability to agree.

The refusal of many offers, including an offer to pay the highest price that had been paid by the company to the owners of adjoining land, is sufficient. Re New York, W. & B. R. Co. (1912) 151 App. Div. 50, 135 N. Y. Supp. 234.

An offer of $4,000 and a counter offer of $25,000, followed by another offer for slightly differing land of $5,000, followed by a counter offer, with certain reservations, of $15,000, shows inability to purchase. Erie & J. R. Co. v. Brown (1907) 57 Misc. 164, 107 N. Y. Supp. 983.

In West Virginia Transp. Co. v. Volcanic Oil & Coal Co. (1892) 5 W. Va. 382, 5 Mor. Min. Rep. 389, it was held that sufficient effort to agree was shown, where the company sent its agents to the agents of the owner at its principal office in the state, its president and directors then residing out of the state, and that two propositions were made and not accepted.

In Evansville, S. & N. R. Co. v. Evansville Terminal R. Co. (1910) 175 Ind. 21, 93 N. E. 282, an agent of the condemning railway company called upon the agent of the owning railway company to see if they could agree upon a crossing by the plaintiff company of the defendant company, and the owner's agent was to call the next morning early at the condemnor's office and examine blue prints of the proposed crossing. He omitted to do so and could not be reached by telephone, but during the forenoon sent a letter, requiring a copy of such blue prints before going further. The court said, in affirming a judgment holding that a bona fide attempt to agree had been made: "It is true that events followed each other rapidly after the matter of agreement was taken up, but the conduct of Mulhausen in failing to keep his promise to call and examine the blue prints, or send any explanation of his conduct, and the spirit of the letter he subsequently sent to Funkhouser, considered together, may reasonably be construed as indicating a feeling of hostility to any further discussion of the crossing question, and we think the court was warranted in arriving at that conclusion."

In New York, C. & H. R. R. Co. v. Yonkers (1907) 103 N. Y. Supp. 252, the court said, in holding the effort to agree as to a boat club's land sufficient: "The evidence indicates that the agent of the plaintiff, in negotiating with the representatives of the club, misunderstood the exact location of the description of the parcel which the plaintiff was seeking to purchase from the club, in that he did not understand that such description included a portion of the land under the boathouse. It cannot be doubted, of course, that an offer to purchase one distinct parcel will not warrant proceedings to condemn an entirely different parcel; but I do not think that a mistake of this character, in an attempt to locate the exact description given, should be held to vitiate the effect of the negotiation. It, moreover, is quite apparent in this case that the negotiations would not have been successful had not this error been made, because the plaintiff's offer for the land at a certain rate per square foot was in effect rejected by the club, even with the explanation that it did not take any part of the premises under the boathouse. Much more would it have been rejected if it had been well understood that the parcel described did go for a space under the boathouse, so that the removal of that structure would likely be necessary."

It seems that, in Pennsylvania, the filing of the company's bond is in itself evidence of the inability of the parties to agree. Bland v. Tipton Water Co. (1908) 222 Pa. 285, 71 Atl. 101; Burkhard v. Pennsylvania Water Co. (1914) 243 Pa. 369, 90 Atl. 157.

In Trinity College v. Hartford (1865) 32 Conn. 452, it seems to have been held sufficient to show an attempt to agree, that city authorities applied to officers of the owner, who claimed they were not authorized.

In Fulton v. Methow Trading Co. (1906) 45 Wash. 136, 88 Pac. 117, it was held that sufficient was shown by the allegation that the plaintiffs had been and still were unable to agree as to compensation to be paid the said owners, "for the reason that said owners will not make to plaintiffs a stated demand for any given sum of money in compensation to them and it for said right of way, and that such of said owners of said parcels of land over which it is desired to extend said ditch, hereinafter described, have refused, and still refuse, to grant to these plaintiffs the use thereof for purposes aforesaid, and plaintiffs have been wholly unable to obtain from such owners any right in or upon or to the use of said premises for the purposes aforesaid."

If the landowner claims to stand by an alleged previous agreement, it is useless to make him an offer. Re Rochester (1913) 82 Misc. 598, 144 N. Y. Supp. 1086.

III. Illustrations of insufficient attempts.

It was held insufficient where the propositions made by plaintiff to several defendants were all alike, offering $1,000 to each, though their properties were of different values, and were mailed about 4 o'clock one evening, and the petition filed shortly after 7 o'clock the next morning, before the defendants had any opportunity to consider them, or make counter propositions. Big Cuyahoga Light, Heat & P. Co. v. Turner, V. & T. Co. (1913) 17 Ohio C. C. N. S. 84.

Where a board agreed to pay $73,000 for land, subject to approval of two boards not in control of it, one of which omitted to approve the agreement, and some time later the first board made an offer of $56,000, dated December 29, served on December 30, and dated and verified a petition on December 31, stating failure to agree, which was served on January 3 following, it was held that no bona fide effort to agree was shown. Re Bronx Parkway Commission (1917) 176 App. Div. 717, 163 N. Y. Supp. 882.

It was held that there had not been a sufficient attempt shown where negotiations ceased without notice when both parties regarded them as still pending, and nothing afterwards occurred to indicate their termination.

Chambers v. Carteret & S. R. Co. (1891) 54 N. J. L. 85, 22 Atl. 995.

Where the statute required a board to "enter into negotiation" with owners for the purchase before taking any step towards condemnation, it was held that a petition for a mandamus in condemnation proceedings was insufficient which did not show that petitioners ever offered to sell at any price, or that they refused to name a price, and showed affirmatively that the commissioners never determined on a price to offer for the lands and waters of petitioners. Mahoney v. San Francisco (1879) 53 Cal. 383.

An offer by the owner, and its laying on the table by a city, are not a sufficient treaty with the owner. Laue v. Saginaw (1884) 53 Mich. 442, 19 N. W. 137.

A fruitless casual inquiry of a neighbor as to the residence of a nonresident landowner is not sufficient to excuse the lack of effort to negotiate with him. McCotter v. New Shoreham (1898) 21 R. I. 43, 41 Atl. 572.

It has been held that a railroad company shows no attempt to agree if its only evidence is that it tried by agreement to obtain the property for steamboat purposes (New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. v. Long (1897) 69 Conn. 424, 37 Atl. 1070); that an effort to agree with the mayor is not sufficient where the water commissioners were the proper authority (Jersey City v. Bayonne (1910) 80 N. J. L. 131, 76 Atl. 1010); that a refusal to give a school trustee a price cannot be held to be a refusal to give the district a price, and does not show that the owner could not have agreed with the district, the trustee having no authority to represent the district (Howland v. School Dist. (1888) 16 R. I. 257, 15 Atl. 74); and that the owner must be informed of the identity of the offerer and of the purpose for which the property is wanted (Pittsburgh, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Gage (1917) 280 Ill. 639, 117 N. E. 726).

Where the owner was ill and the agent of the plaintiff negotiated with the owner's son, there being nothing to show that the son was informed that the other party was agent for the plaintiff, or that the son had authority to act for the owner, it was held that the evidence of failure to agree was insufficient. Connecticut College v. Alexander (1912) 85 Conn. 602, 84 Atl. 365.

Where the authority of a railroad company's agent in acquiring property for a station was limited to agree upon a price and to secure a right for a trust company to buy, this was held not to be sufficient to prove any attempt to purchase. Michigan C. R. Co. v. Ferguson (1910) 162 Mich. 220, 127 N. W. 320.

Sufficient effort to purchase was not shown where a city addressed a letter to an executor and legatee of the late owner, as follows: "It is the intention of the city to agree with you, if possible, as to the price to be paid, before instituting condemnation proceedings in court. I understand that you own a one-twenty-seventh interest in this property, subject to an estate for the life of your mother, and that you are one of the executors of the estate of Alfred Austell, deceased. The city asks that you make an offer as to what you will take for your interest. Kindly write me what price you would be willing to accept for the interest you hold,"—as the letter was to be construed as a proposition to the addressee personally. Atlanta v. Austell (1916) 146 Ga. 456, 91 S. E. 478.

A recital, as to a desired mining right of way for water, that there was never any agreement, is not sufficient. Glass v. Basin Min. & Concentrating Co. (1899) 22 Mont. 151, 55 Pac. 1047, where the court said: "The allegation of the plaintiffs is that there never was any agreement, and, fearing 'lost defendant might be deprived of certain water, they made an 'offer' by which, if defendant would grant plaintiffs a right of way across its mining claims, plaintiffs, in consideration thereof, would give defendant any water it might need for certain of its purposes. This is not an averment of a past attempt to agree upon compensation for a right of way. It is merely a recital of what plaintiffs were willing to do to allay the apprehensions which they understood defendant had, in case it should allow plaintiffs to build a flume across its property."

Where a company which was not trying to acquire anything but the right of operating not as a railroad corporation, but as a street railway, offered a nominal amount not for land to be taken, but for a waiver of objection to their so operating in place of another company, it was held that this was not the attempt to agree on a price of property to be taken that is contemplated by the law. Specht v. Atlantic City & S. R. Co. (1911) 81 N. J. L. 108, 78 Atl. 1049.

Correspondence by a city board before deciding on a street improvement is not an effort to agree upon terms of purchase. Core v. Norfolk (1901) 99 Va. 190, 37 S. E. 845.

IV. Miscellaneous.

Proof of inability to agree may be shown by the owner's own evidence. De Buol v. Freeport & M. River R. Co. (1884) 111 Ill. 499.

The inability of the parties to agree as to the amount of damages "may be shown by any testimony evincive of the fact." Williams v. Hartford & N. H. R. Co. (1840) 13 Conn. 397.

Evidence of negotiations with the treasurer of the owning corporation is admissible. Stafford Springs Street R. Co. v. Middle River Mfg. Co. (1907) 80 Conn. 37, 66 Atl. 775.

To mail a letter is not sufficient evidence of an attempt to purchase, without evidence that the letter reached its destination. Re Rochester (1918) 82 Misc. 598, 144 N. Y. Supp. 1086.

"The averments in the petition to condemn land for a public use need not be in the language of the statute, but any allegations showing affirmatively that the petitioner has been unable to agree with the owner in respect to the compensation to be paid will suffice." St. Louis & C. R. Co. v. Postal Tele. Co. (1898) 173 Ill. 508, 51 N. E. 382.

A statement in an affidavit by an agent that he was unable to agree upon compensation or upon assessors, with the persons named in the petition, implies an effort to agree before the petition was presented. Tucker v. Erie & N. E. R. Co. (1856) 27 Pa. 281.

Where the statute provides for the condemnation of property, "the title to which he cannot otherwise acquire," all that is meant is a failure to agree. Westfield Cemetery Asso. v. Danielson (1892) 62 Conn. 319, 26 Atl. 345.

Sometimes the statute requires that it should appear as a jurisdictional fact that the petitioner "has not been able to acquire title thereto, and the reason of such inability." Re Marsh (1877) 71 N. Y. 315.

Where the intention of the statute is that, before any agreement made by the commissioner shall be binding, the price to be paid shall be approved by the board of estimate and apportionment, it is not necessary that an offer should be made. It is sufficient if the price asked by the property owners is unsatisfactory to the city. Re Rochester (1917) 100 Misc. 421, 165 N. Y. Supp. 1026, reversed on other grounds in (1918) 184 App. Div. 925, 170 N. Y. Supp. 1072, 184 App. Div. 369, 171 N. Y. Supp. 12, which are respectively affirmed in (1918) 224 N. Y. 386, 659, 121 N. E. 102, 859.

Under a statute providing that if the owner of property taken, or person sustaining damages, "shall not agree on the damages to be paid therefor," he may file a petition for the assessment of his damages, it is not a condition precedent to the right to file such petition that it should appear that the parties did not agree upon the damages to be paid; the filing of the petition shows the petitioner's election not to agree, and no previous attempt is necessary. Ætna Mills v. Waltham (1879) 126 Mass. 422.

In United States v. Oregon R. & Nav. Co. (1883) 9 Sawy. 61, 16 Fed. 524, where the statute in substance provided that the proceeding to compel a sale should not be resorted to until the owner had refused to sell for a reasonable price, and this fact was alleged in the complaint, it was objected that the allegation was a general one, neither stating when the offer to purchase was made and refused, nor what was the price offered. The court said: "However, this at most is only a defective statement of a material fact, for which the only remedy provided by the Code of Civil Procedure (§ 84) is a motion to make more definite and certain. As the allegation stands, proof may be made under it of all the particulars implied in it. It is sufficient to support a verdict. . . . Nor is it necessary that the complaint should contain a distinct allegation as to the value of the premises. Whether they are of much or little or no value is not material to the plaintiff's right to the relief sought. But it may be that the defendant can tender the plaintiff an issue upon this point in its answer, which the latter must meet in his replication, or the fact as pleaded will, for the purposes of the action, be admitted." In Colorado Fuel & I. Co. v. Four Mile R. Co. (1901) 29 Colo. 90, 66 Pac. 902, the court overruled an attack made for the first time on appeal, upon an allegation in the petition as insufficient, which alleged "that the petitioner has endeavored to agree with the respondents upon the compensation to be paid in respect to the property herein sought to be taken, but has been unable to acquire the right of way herein described by purchase or voluntary grant from the said respondents."

v.

KANSAS FREE FAIR ASSOCIATION.

Kansas Supreme Court — December 6, 1910.

(105 Kan. 600, 185 Pac. 893.)

Corporation — report to directors — effect.

1. Although a board of directors of a corporation hears the reading of a financial report of the corporation's liabilities and approves the report, the corporation is not thereby precluded from afterward denying its liability on specific items set out in the report.

[See note on this question beginning on page 484.]

Master and servant — contract of employment.

2. The facts in dispute touching the duration and terms of a contract of employment examined, and no error discerned in the trial court's determination thereof.

Corporation — president's promise to pay debt.

3. Where a president of a corporation is not shown to have authority to obligate the corporation, and a letter written by him, endeavoring to pacify an insistent creditor and promising to make a desperate effort to raise money to take up the corporate debts, included the promise, "Your account is among the others of which I am fully aware, and if we can raise this money it will be one of the first taken care of," it is held, that such promise is subject to explanation and is not necessarily binding on the corporation.

Headnotes by DAWSON, J.

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the District Court for Shawnee County (Whitcomb, J.) in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover a balance alleged to be due for services performed by plaintiff under a contract of employment. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Mr. James A. Troutman for appellant.

Mr. W. E. Atchison, for appellee:

Even if the letter written by the president was an admission that the association was indebted to plaintiff, it would be only an admission by an officer of the corporation who was not advised of the facts, and would be subject to be disproved or explained.

Robins Min. Co. v. Murdock, 69 Kan. 596, 77 Pac. 596; 1 Enc. Ev. 396; Arkansas City v. Payne, 80 Kan. 355, 102 Pac. 781, 18 Ann. Cas. 82.

A new trial should not be granted because of newly discovered evidence which is merely cumulative.

Daly v. Gregg, 91 Kan. 506, 138 Pac. 614.

Dawson, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action for a balance alleged to be due as wages for services performed in 1915. The plaintiff is an accountant. The defendant is an incorporated association which conducts an annual fair in Topeka. Plaintiff alleged that in December, 1914, he was hired by the defendant for a term of ten months at $100 per month; but, owing to the financial difficulties of the defendant, he was induced to agree to a change in his compensation, whereby the defendant was to pay him $50 per month from January 1, 1915, until June 1st, and $150 per month thereafter, and that he had received $250 on this contract, and that there was due to him a balance of $750 and interest.

The defendant denied plaintiff's allegations and alleged that plaintiff's services for the first few months of 1915 were gratuitous—like those of many other public-spirited citizens of Topeka who were endeavoring to conduct and maintain a successful fair—that a public election was held in May to authorize the granting of county aid to the fair, and after that election the defendant employed the plaintiff at $50 per month, as from May 1, 1915, with a further understanding that if the fair in the autumn of 1915 was a financial success plaintiff should be paid on the basis of $100 per month; that owing to rainy weather the fair was financially a failure and had a large deficit; and, accordingly, that defendant owed plaintiff nothing.

A jury was waived, and the defendant prevailed. Plaintiff appeals.

Plaintiff's evidence tended to support the allegations of his petition. Defendant's evidence tended to support the facts set up in its answer. Master and servant—contract of employment.

The trial court's judgment on that disputed issue is final. Bruington v. Wagoner, 100 Kan. 439, 164 Pac. 1060.

It is argued that the defendant admitted its obligation to plaintiff in a report of the financial affairs which was made to the board of directors of the defendant. One item of the statement of current liabilities read: "W. J. Stagg, balance of ten months, $750."

This report was approved and filed. At another time, in answer to a demand for payment, the president of the association wrote to plaintiff:

Dear Stagg:—Replying to yours of March 11th, will say, I am fully aware of the conditions of the state fair association as you quote them. . . . We have got to create a sentiment in favor of boosting things, if we ever get anywhere. And you can't do it by giving it a black eye.

I have had several meetings, and have impressed on their minds that we must raise the money to pay off the indebtedness. Your account is among the others of which I am fully aware also. And if we can raise this money it will be one of the first taken care of. . . .

I have no fault to find with your services. . . . They will receive full commendation from me. . . .

If we have got to start in and have another fight among ourselves, as well as to try to raise this shortage, as for me, I will soon be done with it forever. So I say again let everybody boost. If you feel called upon to have an interview, let it be a boosting interview, and not a knocking one.

A report of an officer to his association is not an "account stated." It is a mere tabulation of facts and figures for the information of the corporation. The approval of such a report does not estop the corporation to deny its accuracy. The president of the association was not shown to have authority to bind the corporation (Robins Min. Co. v. Murdock, 69 Kan. 596, 77 Pac. 596); and the president testified (1 Enc. Ev. 396) that about the time he wrote plaintiff he was struggling with the financial troubles of the fair and trying to pacify its most insistent creditors and avoid lawsuits.

You didn't have a stereotyped letter ready to send?

A. No, but I just wrote to Mr. Stagg without any intention of acknowledging his claim or anything of the kind, any more than at that time I would make a desperate effort to raise the money to take care of these back accounts, and Mr. Eastman and I had laid awake nights. . . .

Q. As a matter of fact, did you know about his claim at that time?

A. No, I didn't know about his claim at that time. . . .

Q. Then you didn't say you were going to pay him any $750?

A. No, sir.

On the motion for a new trial, affidavits were offered to show that the financial report of the corporate liabilities was read to the board of directors—a matter which had been in dispute at the trial. We can assume that plaintiff's contention on that subject was true, but it does not change the net result.

Even if the president were shown to have authority to bind the corporation by his promise, that would be unavailing here, since there was no consideration given for such promise.

The judgment discloses no error, and the judgment is affirmed.

Petition for rehearing denied.

NOTE.

No case other than the reported case (STAGG v. KANSAS FREE FAIR ASSO. ante, 478) has been found which passes upon the effect of a report made by an officer to his company as an account stated which precludes the corporation from denying its accuracy. As appears from the reported case, the view is there taken that such a report is not an account stated, but is a mere tabulation of facts and figures for the information of the corporation, and that the approval of such a report does not estop the corporation to deny its accuracy.

New York Court of Appeals—November 25, 1919.

(227 N. Y. 291, 125 N. E. 244.)

Master and servant — liability of one hiring automobile for negligence of chauffeur.

One who hires the use of an automobile furnished with a chauffeur from a garage keeper for a number of months is not liable for injuries caused by the negligent driving of the chauffeur, where he merely directs the chauffeur as to when and where to go, while the garage keeper hires and pays him and contracts to furnish the fuel and upkeep of the car and procure insurance against accident.

[See note on this question beginning on page 484.]

APPEAL by defendant Leipzig from an order of the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court, First Department, affirming an order of a Trial Term, Part IV., for New York County (Dugro, J.) in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for the death of his intestate alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Mr. Joseph Force Crater with Mr. Alfred W. Meldon, for appellant:

The trial court erred in denying the defendant's motion to dismiss the complaint, made at the close of the evidence upon the ground that the plaintiff had failed to establish that the driver of the automobile was the servant of the defendant at the time of the accident, and in submitting that question to the jury over defendant's objection and exception.

Collin, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The action is to recover damages for the alleged negligence of the defendant by which the death of plaintiff's intestate was caused. Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1902-1905. The judgment of the trial term consequent upon the verdict in favor of the plaintiff was affirmed by the nonunanimous decision of the appellate division.

Under the exceptions and the briefs of counsel the appeal presents the single question whether or not the evidence tended to prove the liability of the defendant for the negligence of the chauffeur in so driving the automobile in which the defendant was, against the plaintiff's intestate, as to cause his death. The evidence concerning the question is harmonious and without contradiction. The defendant was in the automobile under the conditions: An agreement in writing existed between the Concord Garage Company, the owner, or the representative of the owner, of the automobile, and the defendant, whereby the company rented the automobile and the service of the chauffeur to the defendant for the term of three months, to be used by him during the term at any hour of the day or night he desired; the company agreed "to engage and furnish a chauffeur to operate and run said automobile during said period at its own cost and expense," and "to pay all expenses for gasoline used in propelling said automobile, together with any and all expenses for repairs or supplies used in said automobile," also to procure insurance covering the defendant from all liability by reason of accidents, injuries of any kind, or from any cause whatsoever; the defendant agreed "to pay for the use of the aforesaid automobile and services of a chauffeur during the period," a designated sum. The performance of the agreement had been entered upon and was being carried out at the time of the accident. In the performance the defendant exercised no control in the selection of the chauffeur, or over him, his wages, or the car, other than to direct him when and where to come with the car for the defendant, and where to transport him. The car, when not in the use of the defendant, was kept in the garage of the company, was there cared for and supplied with the necessities by the company, and there the chauffeur received calls of the defendant for the use of the car and the chauffeur. In the matters of coming to and leaving the defendant, and of taking him to the places directed by him, the chauffeur was under his directions. The defendant paid for the chauffeur's luncheon when using him at luncheon time, and paid the cost of having the car watched when in the defendant's use, and it was necessary for the chauffeur as well as defendant to leave it unattended. The accident happened upon a street specifically designated by defendant to be taken by the chauffeur.

In virtue of those facts this case falls into a class concerning which established legal principles are applicable and decisive. The defendant was not liable for the death of the intestate unless the facts tended to prove that the negligent chauffeur in driving was in a legal sense a servant of the defendant. There is not evidence that the defendant actively interfered with and caused the manner of driving, or had knowledge or notice that the chauffeur was incompetent or careless. It was essential, therefore, in order to establish a liability against the defendant, that the relation of principal and agent, or that of master and servant, should exist. King v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 66 N. Y. 181, 23 Am. Rep. 37; Stevens v. Armstrong, 6 N. Y. 435. The relation of principal and agent obviously did not exist. The liability of the defendant depends on the doctrine of the liability of a master for the acts of his servant done in the course of his employment. The relation of master and servant is created by contract, express or implied. Of the elements which may constitute it, those that the servant must, in the course of the employment, be doing the work of the master under the will, direction, and control of the master throughout all the details of the work, are essential. Schmedes v. Deffaa, 214 N. Y. 675, 108 N. E. 1107, decided upon the dissenting opinion of Miller, J., in the court below, 153 App. Div. 819, 138 N. Y. Supp. 931; Higgins v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 156 N. Y. 75, 66 Am. St. Rep. 537, 50 N. E. 500; Scribner's Case, 231 Mass. 132, 3 A.L.R. 1178, 120 N. E. 350; Butler v. Townsend, 126 N. Y. 105, 26 N. E. 1017. A servant may, with his consent, through the agreement of his master, become for the occasion and time, and to the extent agreed upon, the servant of another. A master may loan or let to another a servant in his general employment, with the consent of the servant, as he may his implements, in such manner that the servant does the work of the other under the other's exclusive control, and therefore is, for the occasion and time, the servant of the other. On the other hand, the master may agree with another that the master shall himself perform the work of the other through his own servant, the master retaining the service, direction, and control of the servant. To determine whether a given case falls within the one class or the other we must inquire whose is the work being performed. Schmedes v. Deffaa, 214 N. Y. 675, 108 N. E. 1107; Hartell v. T. H. Simonson & Son Co. 218 N. Y. 345, 113 N. E. 255; Standard Oil Co. v. Anderson, 212 U. S. 215, 53 L. ed. 480, 29 Sup. Ct. Rep. 252; Donovan v. Laing [1893] 1 Q. B. 629, 63 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 25, 4 Reports, 317, 68 L. T. N. S. 512, 41 Week. Rep. 455, 57 J. P. 583. In the Hartell Case Judge Cuddeback said: "A servant in the general employment of one person, who is temporarily loaned to another person to do the latter's work, becomes, for the time being, the servant of the borrower, who is liable for his negligence. But if the general employer enters into a contract to do the work of another, as an independent contractor, his servants do not become the servants of the person with whom he thus contracts, and the latter is not liable for their negligence." 218 N. Y. 349.

A servant lent or let by his master to another does not become the servant of the other because the other directs what work is to be done or in what way it is to be done. If the servant remains subject to the general orders of the person who hires and pays him, he is still his servant, although specific directions may be given him by the other from time to time as to the work to be done. The other person has the right to exercise the degree of control of the servant essential to secure the fulfilment of the agreement between the master and himself. Johnson v. Netherlands American Steam Nav. Co. 132 N. Y. 576, 30 N. E. 505; Standard Oil Co. v. Anderson, 212 U. S. 215, 226, 53 L. ed. 480, 485, 29 Sup. Ct. Rep. 252; W. S. Quinby Co. v. Estey, 221 Mass. 56, 108 N. E. 908.

Those principles have been frequently applied to the letting or hiring of a carriage or wagon with horses and a driver to be used for the conveyance of the hirer or his property from place to place. The judicial decisions hold clearly and almost uniformly that in the care and management of the horses and vehicle the driver does not become the servant of the hirer, but remains subject to the control of the general employer, and that therefore the hirer is not liable for his negligence in driving. Kellogg v. Church Charity Foundation, 203 N. Y. 191, 38 L.R.A. (N.S.) 481, 96 N. E. 406, Ann. Cas. 1913A, 883, 3 N. C. C. A. 444; Little v. Hackett, 116 U. S. 366, 379, 29 L. ed. 652, 656, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 391; Quarman v. Burnett, 6 Mees. & W. 499, 151 Eng. Reprint, 509, 9 L. J. Exch. N. S. 308, 4 Jur. 969; Hussey v. Franey, 205 Mass. 413, 137 Am. St. Rep. 460, 91 N. E. 391; Corliss v. Keown, 207 Mass. 149, 93 N. E. 143; Peach v. Bruno, 224 Mass. 447, 113 N. E. 279; Driscoll v. Towle, 181 Mass. 416, 63 N. E. 922; Fenner v. Crips Bros. 109 Iowa, 455, 80 N. W. 526, 6 Am. Neg. The vehicles, with the horses and driver, are let with the implied understanding that the driver remained the servant of the owner, and as such had the management of the property and exercised care and control over it. The driver and the property are engaged in the owner's business and subject to his management, direction, and control. It is inherent in and a part of that business that the person being transported should have the power of direction as to where and when he should be taken.

The same rule is applied to the letting of an automobile and a chauffeur. Shepard v. Jacobs, 204 Mass. 110, 26 L.R.A. (N.S.) 442, 134 Am. St. Rep. 648, 90 N. E. 392; Wallace v. Keystone Auto Co. 239 Pa. 110, 86 Atl. 699; Gerretson v. Rambler Garage Co. 149 Wis. 528, 40 L.R.A. (N.S.) 457, 136 N. W. 186.

In the present case the written agreement defines the relation and liabilities of the parties. It gave for a consideration to the defendant the use, at demand, of the automobile and a chauffeur to operate and run it for a certain period. The company possessed, managed, cared for, and supplied the automobile and selected, employed, and controlled the chauffeur who operated the car for it. The extent of the defendant's control was to direct the chauffeur when and where to come with the automobile, where to go, and where to stop. In obeying those directions the chauffeur was carrying out the company's work under the agreement. The defendant had no authority, management, or care over the automobile, or as to the manner in which it should be treated or driven. The chauffeur did the company's business in his own way, and the orders given him by the defendant merely stated to him the work which the company had arranged to do.

The judgment should be reversed, and the complaint dismissed, with costs in all the courts.

ANNOTATION.

Liability for negligence of chauffeur furnished with a car hired for an extended period.

The cases on this subject seem hardly susceptible of classification, except as to their results. It will be observed that the underlying question is whether the owner or the hirer of the machine is, for the purposes of the case, the master of the chauffeur. Cases where a car is hired for particular occasions are excluded.

It will be seen that it is held in the reported case (MCNAMARA v. LEIPZIG, ante, 480) that the hirer of an automobile with the service of a chauffeur, for three months, to be used at any hour of the day or night he desires, the owner to pay all expenses for gasoline, repairs, and supplies, and to procure insurance covering the hirer from liability in case of accident, is not liable for the negligence of the chauffeur in running down plaintiff's intestate while driving the defendant.

A motion to set aside a judgment for the defendant was denied in a case where the defendant hired the auto truck which did the damage for which a recovery was sought, at a certain amount per week, from a motor-renting company which supplied the chauffeur and paid his wages, and paid for all repairs, oil, gasoline, etc., used, and the defendant had no power of selection of chauffeurs, and exercised no authority or control over the one furnished except to indicate to him where he was to go, and the chauffeur had no duties except the operation of the truck, the loading and unloading of goods being performed by two employees of the defendant furnished for that purpose alone. The court remarked, however, that the decisions under such conditions were extremely close. Waldman v. Picker Bros. (1912) 140 N. Y. Supp. 1019.

Where an express company hires an electric van with a chauffeur, by the month or day (it not clearly appearing which), and the chauffeur has nothing to do with the putting of the parcels into the vehicle or delivering them, a servant of the express company performing these duties, it was held not liable for an injury resulting from the operation of the van, it appearing that at the time all of the packages had been delivered and the machine had returned to the express company's office, where the employee of that company had been left, and the chauffeur was, at the time of the accident, on his way either to lunch or to have the vehicle repaired, as the chauffeur was not ad hoc the hirer's servant. Bohan v. Metropolitan Exp. Co. (1907) 122 App. Div. 590, 107 N. Y. Supp. 530. The court said: "In the present case, if the accident had actually occurred while the express packages were being delivered, it might be that the defendant would be liable under the rule laid down in the last two cases [cases involving liability for injuries occurring while goods were being delivered by hired van]; but even then it might be doubtful, inasmuch as the chauffeur had nothing whatever to do with the handling of the goods of the defendant or making collections. All he did was to obey the directions as to where he should take the vehicle. Lewis v. Long Island R. Co. (1900) 162 N. Y. 52, 56 N. E. 548, 7 Am. Neg. Rep. 299; Johnson v. Netherlands American Steam Nav. Co. (1892) 132 N. Y. 576, 30 N. E. 505. But, as we have already seen, at the time of the accident he had delivered all the packages for the defendant, and was not then engaged in doing any work for it; he was then either taking the vehicle to the transportation company's office to have it repaired, or else was engaged in his personal business, and in neither case can it be said that he was acting as the servant of the defendant or engaged in its business. The defendant did not own the vehicle, had no right to inspect it, or give directions as to repairs. Under such circumstances I know of no rule of law under which defendant can be held liable. When the chauffeur left the defendant's office for the purpose of going back to the transportation company's office to have the vehicle repaired, or to get his lunch, he ceased to be the servant of the express company, because he was not then engaged in doing its business, and for his negligence in operating the vehicle while thus engaged the express company is not liable."

In Macale v. Lynch (1920) — Wash. —, 188 Pac. 517, it was held that the owner of a truck was liable for the negligence of the chauffeur as he was not in the exclusive control of the hirer, where the hirer engaged a truck and driver for so much per hour to be used in delivering potatoes from car to warehouse to various retail dealers, the hirer meeting the truck and driver, giving the latter instructions as to where to go and going with him. Judgment for the plaintiff, however, was reversed on another ground.

It may be noted that a general contractor who receives a day ahead, from a customer, notice of the deliveries it is ready to make and who assigns the trucks and the drivers and the route, is liable for the negligence of the chauffeur, and the customer is not liable. Grastataro v. Brodie (1919) 189 App. Div. 779, 179 N. Y. Supp. 324.

On the other hand, judgment in favor of one injured by the negligence of the driver of a truck, against the hirer of the truck, was affirmed, where the owner of the truck had agreed with such hirer, who was a seller of paint, that he would furnish a truck and driver for the purpose of delivering goods for such seller at so much per week, the owner to keep the truck in repair and supply the oil and gasoline. The only direction the owner gave to the driver was to report to such seller. The arrangement had been in force about three years at the time of the accident, during all of which time the same driver drove the truck except when, for short intervals, the owner would send another driver. The court said: "The true test in determining who the master is, in a case of this character, is not who actually did control the actions and movements of the servant in doing the work, but who had the right to control. . . . We hold that under the evidence the question as to whether the driver of the truck was, at the time of the injury to appellee, the servant of appellant, was properly submitted to the jury, and that the verdict is sustained by the evidence." Sargent Paint Co. v. Petrovitzky (1919) — Ind. App. —, 124 N. E. 881.

In Burns v. Southern P. Co. (1919) — Cal. App. —, 185 Pac. 875, the court reversed a judgment of nonsuit in favor of the hirer of a motor truck where the death of one riding on the truck had occurred through the negligence of the chauffeur, and affirmed a judgment of nonsuit in favor of the owner of the truck. The hirer conducted a ranch and fruit farm, and all that is reported as to the length of the hiring is the statement that "the defendant Prinderville was a chauffeur engaged in the driving of a truck belonging to the defendant Diggs, and was in the general employ of said defendant, but at the time in question both chauffeur and truck had been hired by defendant Diggs to defendant Jackson, and were under the exclusive control and direction of the latter."

Where a truck owner let trucks and furnished chauffeurs to a company, with which such company made its own deliveries, the chauffeurs reporting night and morning to the truckman's garage, it was held that the hirer was liable for damages for personal injuries resulting from the negligence of the chauffeur furnished to it by the truck owner, although the contract provided that the relation of master and servant should not exist between the hirer and the employees of the truck owner to the end that no claim should be made against such hirer for the negligence of such employees, that the truck owner should indemnify the hirer in that behalf, and take out indemnity insurance in its favor. Finegan v. H. C. & A. I. Piercy Contracting Co. (1919) 189 App. Div. 699, 178 N. Y. Supp. 785.

In Braxton v. Mendelson (1920) 190 App. Div. 278, 179 N. Y. Supp. 845, it was held that the owner of trucks who employed and paid the chauffeurs was not liable for the negligence of the chauffeur of one of them, where, under a yearly contract, such owner furnished the trucks to work for the day for a dairy company, the trucks being continuously in possession of the dairy company and under its sole control, except when being repaired at the owner's expense. The chauffeurs were hired and paid by the truck owner, but took their orders from the dairy company, and the truck in question was engaged in the dairy company's business when the accident occurred. The court said: "Under these conditions the rules laid down in McNamara v. Leipzig, 227 N. Y. 291, 125 N. E. 244 (November 25, 1919), become applicable. Here the work being performed was that of the dairy company, to which the services of defendant's chauffeur had been let, with the sole use of the truck, and the chauffeur was doing the work of the dairy company, under its exclusive control, and therefore for the occasion and time was the servant of the dairy company. It follows that the implied finding of the jury that the chauffeur was the servant of defendant is without evidence to support it."

In Baum v. Link (1920) 110 Misc. 297, 180 N. Y. Supp. 468, it was held to be error to dismiss a complaint against the hirer of an automobile based on the negligence of the chauffeur, where the contract between the owner and the hirer provided that the hiring should be of the car with the driver for one year "to do such labor and perform such services at such time and in such place" as the hirer should from time to time reasonably direct, the hirer to have the privilege of paying the chauffeur and to charge the amount to the sum to be paid by him under the contract; although the owner testified that the chauffeur was under his direction and that he never took any orders from the hirer. The court distinguished the reported case (McNAMARA v. LEIPZIG, ante, 480) as follows: "In the McNAMARA CASE it was, however, shown that the owner of the automobile agreed to pay the expenses for gasoline used in propelling said automobile, together with all expenses for repairs and supplies used for said automobiles; whereas, in the present case, the owner of the automobile did not agree to pay for any expenses or supplies used in said automobile, except that he agreed that the automobile 'at all times shall be in good serviceable condition, and that he will procure the necessary insurance, compensation, and otherwise.' Moreover in the McNamara Case the chauffeur was under the defendant's direction only in the matter of coming to and leaving the defendant, and of taking him to the place directed by him, while in the present case the contract provides that the 'automobile wagon and driver will be fit for the purposes of the said A. Langstadter's business, . . . and that they will obey the reasonable directions of the said A. Langstadter and perform such labor as he shall from time to time direct.'"

Where the board of county commissioners made a contract for the use of an automobile on occasions of visits to the county asylum by its members, the county agreeing to pay for the upkeep of the machine and pay the wages of the chauffeur, in consideration of which its board of commissioners were to have the exclusive use of the automobile when called for by them, and on a trip for the commissioners an accident occurred from the negligence of the chauffeur, who served the owner as dining room boy and driver of the car, it was held that at the time of the accident the car was, in legal contemplation, in the possession of the chauffeur as the servant of the board of commissioners, and not of the owner. Core v. Resha (1917) 140 Tenn. 408, 204 S. W. 1149.

A logging contractor was held liable for an accident caused by the negligence of the driver of a truck, where its owners were to furnish it and the driver, and the contractor was to furnish oil and gas and any repairs, and the truck's time was to be with the driver's time; if the driver worked more than eight hours, the truck was to be more than eight hours; that price was to be an eight-hour price, and over that the truck was to draw the same ratio. The court said: "To our minds, the question of control of operation is the determining factor in this case. The respondents in the course of business had transferred the vehicle and driver to the control of the hirer, who alone could say where and in what the work of the truck should thereafter consist, and if this effected a transfer of control it must, ipso facto, have effected a transfer of responsibility. If such be the fact, we feel that respondent's contention that the hirer stood, in relation to the law of this case, as if he had purchased the truck and hired the driver, must logically follow. There being no disputed facts to go to the jury, the trial court did not err in so deciding as a matter of law." Olson v. Veness (1919) 105 Wash. 599, 178 Pac. 822.

Judgment for the plaintiff was reversed where he sued for personal injuries caused by an automobile truck, and the evidence showed, without contradiction, that the truck was owned by the defendant, which paid the wages of the chauffeur; that the truck, however, was rented out to another concern, the Turner Company, which was engaged in snow removal; that the chauffeur took his instructions from that company; and that, in point of fact, although his wages were, under the agreement, to be paid by the defendant, he, personally, had been hired for this job by the Turner Company. The court said: "Under the circumstances, if there is any liability, it is that of the Turner Company and not of the defendant." Diamond v. Sternberg Motor Truck Co. (1914) 87 Misc. 805, 149 N. Y. Supp. 1000.

Though the nonresponsibility of a motor company for the negligence of a chauffeur was held in De Perri v. Motor Haulage Co. (1918) 185 App. Div. 384, 173 N. Y. Supp. 189, not to be a necessary legal inference from the terms of an agreement, purporting in its introductory part to be for the hauling of material from the plant of a road contractor to a job on which it was engaged, by which the motor company was to furnish several trucks with drivers, gasoline, and oil at a specified sum per day, "to carry on your (road contractor's) work,"—the court observing that the contract was susceptible of either construction, and that the course of dealing under it was a helpful guide in reaching a correct conclusion—a judgment against the motor company in favor of an employee of the road contractor, injured while riding home in a truck after his day's work, was reversed, it appearing that no control over the driver was exercised by anyone except the road contractor; and that the motor company, upon learning that the road contractor's men were riding on the trucks, instructed the drivers not to haul any more of them without specific orders from the road contractor, and that a representative of the latter told, or at least requested, the drivers to carry the men during a street railway strike. The court said that the uncontradicted testimony that the trucks were used for everything that the road contractor directed was inconsistent with the plaintiff's claim that the motor company had merely undertaken, as independent contractor, to haul the material from the plant to the job; and that a provision of the contract for the payment of the motor company, whether the trucks were in use or not, furnished strong evidence against the plaintiff's view. The instructions which the motor company gave with reference to carrying the men were regarded as rather emphasizing its understanding that the drivers were subject to the orders of the road contractor. Finally, the court said that, assuming that the contract was for the transportation of material from the plant to the job, the hauling of the workmen was in the interest of the road contractor, not of the motor company.

In Neuschaefer v. Colonial Sand & Stone Co. (1920) 180 N. Y. Supp. 413, it does not appear that the hiring was for more than a day.

CLARA BERG, Appt.,

v.

W. A. JOHNSON.

Arkansas Supreme Court — June 23, 1919.

(— Ark. —, 213 S. W. 393.)

Deed — to partnership — effect.

1. Conveyance of real estate to a partnership, in the name of which only the surname of one partner is mentioned, vests the legal title in him.

[See note on this question beginning on page 500.]

Courts — transfer to equity — reformation of deed — absence of pleading.

2. An action to recover possession of real estate should not be transferred to equity on the ground that reformation of a deed so as to show the true date of the execution sale under which it was executed was necessary, if the pleadings do not show any defect in the deed and there is no prayer for equitable relief.

Reformation of instrument — necessity.

3. An action to recover real property need not be transferred to equity to reform a deed in plaintiff's chain of title, which runs to a partnership in which the surname of only one partner appears, if there is no prayer for reformation and a partition suit has settled the rights of all parties claiming equitable interests in the property.

Tax — sale — defect in certificate of acknowledgment — effect.

4. The use of a portion of the name of the grantee as part of the name of the clerk in the certificate of acknowledgment by the clerk of court to a tax deed does not defeat the deed or require reformation, if it is clear from the deed and acknowledgment that the deed was executed and acknowledged by the clerk.

Laches — as defense to action to recover real estate.

5. The plea of laches is not available in an action to recover possession of real estate where no equitable relief is sought in the complaint.

[See 9 R. C. L. 882.]

Adverse possession — sufficiency of showing of title.

6. Possession of real estate under tax deed for a period sufficient to give title by adverse possession is not shown by an affidavit filed in support of a petition to recover possession of the land, which merely alleges that defendant claims the land under a tax sale, without showing the date of sale or how long defendant had been in possession.

Pleading — effect of allegation.

7. An allegation in a complaint to recover possession of real estate as to the time of defendant's possession is not binding upon plaintiff so far as it relates to defendant's plea of the Statute of Limitations.

Jury — right to — action to recover real estate.

8. A plea of the Statute of Limitations in an action to recover possession of real estate raises an issue upon which plaintiff is entitled to trial by jury.

[See 9 R. C. L. 916, 917; 16 R. C. L. 215.]

McCulloch, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Appellant instituted this action against appellee in the circuit court of Clay county to recover possession of a tract of land containing 80 acres in that county, alleged to be in the unlawful possession of appellee. The cause was transferred to the chancery court over the objection of appellant, and proceeded to a final decree in favor of appellee.

Appellant's chain of title runs as follows: The land was purchased from the state of Arkansas in July, 1872, by a copartnership composed of P. H. Young, James Surridge, and Joseph T. Fisher, and was, in the year 1877, sold under execution against said purchaser, and at the execution sale was purchased by Hecht & Brother, a copartnership composed of Levi Hecht and Samuel Hecht. Upon the expiration of the statutory time for redemption, the sheriff of Clay county executed a deed pursuant to the sale, which purported to convey the land to the copartnership by that name without specifying the individual names of either of the partners. Samuel Hecht died intestate, leaving appellant and other children as his heirs at law, and in a partition suit between said heirs and Levi Hecht the tract in controversy was allotted to the heirs of Samuel Hecht. The other heirs of Samuel Hecht conveyed their interest to appellant.

Appellee claims title under a tax sale in the year 1889, at which sale J. M. Stephens became the purchaser. Stephens conveyed the land in the year 1893 to H. H. Williams, and Williams conveyed to appellee by deed dated November 28, 1913. This action was begun on December 15, 1915.

The first question presented is whether or not the circuit court erred in transferring the cause to the chancery court. The ruling of the court in transferring the cause is defended by learned counsel for appellee, first, on the ground that there is a defect in the sheriff's deed under the execution sale, in that it recites the sale to have been made by the officer after the return day of the writ, and that a reformation of the deed so as to show the true date of the sale is essential to appellant's cause of action for the recovery of the land. The answer to this contention is that the pleadings do not show any defect in the sale with respect to the sale being made after the return day of the writ, and there is no prayer for equitable relief. There was an amendment to the complaint, substituting a new copy of the sheriff's deed and alleging that the copy originally exhibited contained the wrong date; but it is not alleged that there was any error in the recitals of the deed concerning the date of sale, nor is there any prayer for reformation.

Courts—transfer to equity—reformation of deed—absence of pleading.

Next, it is urged that the sheriff's deed of conveyance to the copartnership under that name (Hecht & Brother), without specifying the individual names of either of the partners, conveyed only the equitable title, and that it was essential to appellant's cause of action for the case to be transferred to equity so that the deed could be reformed. Again, it may be said in answer to this contention that there was no prayer for a reformation, nor was that essential to appellant's right of action, for the reason that the deed conveyed the legal title to the copartner whose surname was stated, and the subsequent partition suit settled the rights of all other parties who had an equitable interest. In Percifull v. Platt, 36 Ark. 456, it was decided that a deed to a partnership under the firm name, which expressed the surname and initials of one of the copartners, operated as a conveyance of the legal title to the copartner so named, and in Cole v. Mette, 65 Ark. 503, 67 Am. St. Rep. 945, 47 S. W. 407, it was held that a conveyance to a copartnership under the firm name, which expressed the surnames, but not the Christian names, nor initials, of the copartners, was sufficient to convey the legal title to both of the copartners. In disposing of that question in the case of Cole v. Mette, the court approved the case of Fletcher v. Mansur, 5 Ind. 267, where it was held that "a deed to one person, describing him by his surname only, is not for that reason void."

Reformation of instrument—necessity.

In the present case only the surname of one of the partners was stated in the conveyance, and, under the doctrine of the cases just referred to, that was sufficient to convey the legal title to him. It became just a question of identification, and the only difference between this case and the case of Cole v. Mette is a matter of degree of proof of identification; it being said in the opinion in that case that the fact that the surnames of both of the partners being mentioned afforded better means of identification than where the name of only one of them was mentioned. It is clear, therefore, that appellant showed in her pleadings a legal title to the land and the right to immediate possession, and was entitled to sue at law.

It is further contended that appellee set up sufficient grounds in his answer to justify the transfer of the cause to equity, in that the original tax deed under which he claimed was imperfect, because the name of the clerk of the court was not specified in the certificate of acknowledgment. W. E. Spence was the county clerk who executed the deed, and J. M. Stephens was, as before stated, the purchaser. The deed was in the form specified by statute and mentioned the name of the grantee and the name of the officer who made the conveyance. The certificate of acknowledgment followed the form specified in the statute, but erroneously mentioned the name of the clerk as "W. E. Stephens." It was certified, however, that the party who appeared and executed the conveyance was the clerk of the county court, who was personally known to the officer, and acknowledged that he executed the conveyance "as clerk of the county court of said county." The only error in the certificate of acknowledgment was in stating the name of the clerk, and this was an obvious clerical error, which did not defeat the conveyance; for it is clear from the deed and acknowledgment that the deed was executed by W. E. Spence as clerk of the county, and was duly acknowledged by him before the officer.

There were no grounds for transferring the cause to the chancery court, as appellant had based her right of action on a legal title to the land, and sought only a legal remedy, and appellee offered no equitable defense, except the plea of laches, but that plea was not available where no equitable relief was sought in the complaint. Rowland v. McGuire, 67 Ark. 320, 55 S. W. 16.

It is insisted that the complaint and one of the exhibits show affirmatively that appellant's right of action was barred by limitation, and that for that reason the error in transferring the cause to chancery was harmless. An examination of the record, however, does not sustain that contention. The complaint sets out appellant's chain of title, and contains an allegation that appellee "is in the unlawful possession of said lands, and has been for two years past." The complaint contains no allegation with respect to the character of appellee's possession, except that it is unlawful. It is not alleged that the possession was adverse, or that it was held under any claim of ownership under a tax deed, or otherwise. It is true there was an affidavit filed with the complaint which was made by appellant's attorney, stating that "she is informed and believes" that appellee claims the land in controversy "by reason of a sale of said land for the taxes on the same," and that appellant had tendered to appellee "a sum of money equal to the amount of taxes and costs first paid for said land, with interest thereon from the date of payment thereof, and the amount of taxes paid thereon by the purchaser subsequent to such sale, with interest thereon, and the value of improvements made on such land." The affidavit does not recite the date of the tax sale or deed, nor does it contain any allegation that appellee was in possession under a tax deed. The affidavit does not constitute a part of the pleadings in the case; but, even if it were so treated, it is not sufficient to show on its face, either by itself or in connection with the allegations of the complaint, that appellee occupied the premises adversely for two years under a tax deed. Adverse possession—sufficiency of showing of title. For that reason it is not correct to say that the complaint shows affirmatively that appellant's right of action is barred. It is undisputed that appellee claims the land under a tax deed, but the testimony does not show beyond controversy that there was an adverse holding under that deed for two years before the commencement of this action.

The allegation in the complaint with respect to the unlawful possession of appellee for two years before the commencement of the action was not necessary, so far as the length of time of said possession was concerned, to a statement of appellant's cause of action for the recovery of the land, and was included merely for the purpose of setting forth the facts upon which a recovery of the rents and profits could be based. On the trial of the action it would operate as an admission on the part of appellant as to the length of time appellee had been in possession, but she was not conclusively bound by the allegation so far as it related to appellee's plea of the Statute of Limitations. Appellant was entitled to a trial by jury in a court of law on the issue raised by appellee's plea of the Statute of Limitations, and this privilege was denied by the transfer to equity.

The decree is, therefore, reversed, and the cause is remanded, with directions to remand the cause to the Circuit Court for further proceedings not inconsistent with this opinion.

NOTE.

The question considered in the reported case (BERG v. JOHNSON, ante, 489), whether a deed in which a partnership is named as grantee, without specifying the individual names of the partners, is effectual to pass the legal title, is discussed in a note in 1 A.L.R. 564, on "Effect of designating grantee in deed or mortgage by firm name," in which it appears that while the authorities agree that a partnership, as such, cannot take or hold the legal title to real estate, there is a difference of opinion as to whether or not the legal title passes to the members of the firm, or, if it does pass, whether it vests in all the partners, or only in those whose surnames appear in the partnership title.

Since the compilation of such note, no other decisions have been reported.

(— Ark. —, 216 S. W. 11.)

Explosion — "res ipsa loquitur" — wrecking of building to injury of employee.

1. The maxim "res ipsa loquitur" is applicable to the wrecking of a building to the injury of an employee of a tenant by an explosion from unknown cause, where all of the fixtures and appliances containing the gas and ammonia in the building, which alone might have caused the explosion, are exclusively under the control of the owner of the property, against whom the action is brought.

No negligence was charged in the complaint.

One of the essential elements of the rule "res ipsa" is that the accident could or would not have occurred under ordinary circumstances except through the negligence of the defendant.

Smith, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Appellants are the widow and children of J. C. Chiles, and brought this suit as such to compensate the loss sustained by them in the death of their intestate. For their cause of action the following facts are alleged: That the defendants were conducting a mercantile business at No. 119 Rogers avenue, in the city of Fort Smith, in a four-story brick building, of which they had joint control and management. Other allegations of the complaint are as follows:

"That said defendants were in joint control of all of the pipes, pumps, tanks, machinery, and all other appliances that were used by defendants in their businesses in furnishing the gas and ammonia that were used for the various purposes of the defendants in said building.

"That there were large amounts of ammonia used by said defendants in said building, and by reason thereof they had large amounts or quantities of ammonia stored in pipes, tanks, and vats in the basement of said building, and they also had large amounts and quantities of natural gas circulating through and into said building by means of large pipes.

"That on or about 1:50 P. M., on the 22d day of October, 1918, through the negligence of the defendants, their agents, servants, and employees, in some manner unknown and unexplained to plaintiffs, the gas and ammonia that were being used by said defendants in said building were exploded, and were set on fire, and said building was wrecked and burned up and demolished, and the said J. C. Chiles, deceased, who was in said building at the time of said explosion, and when said gas and ammonia were set on fire, was killed by reason of said explosion and fire by the gas, ammonia, and by fire which suddenly filled said building, before he was able to make his escape from the fourth floor of said building, where he was at work as an employee of the W. J. Echols Company, wholesale grocers.

"That at the time of the said explosion and fire the said J. C. Chiles, deceased, was in the employ of the W. J. Echols Company, wholesale grocers, and when the explosion and fire occurred he was in a room or on the fourth floor of the said building of the defendants aforesaid, which room or floor the said W. J. Echols Company, wholesale grocers, had rented or reserved from the defendants, and into which the said W. J. Echols Company, wholesale grocers, had the right, under its contract with the defendants, to enter with its employees to transact its business on said fourth floor of said building, and it also had the right of ingress and egress to said building, and the said defendants, by reason of their said contract with the said W. J. Echols Company, wholesale grocers, owed it and its employees a contractual duty and ordinary care not to injure or kill them by reason of an explosion of the said gas and ammonia, or the burning of the gas and ammonia in said building, which were used in their building, by their negligence or by the negligence of either of them.

"That at the time that said J. C. Chiles, deceased, was killed by said explosion and by the burning of said gas and ammonia in said building, he was at work for the said W. J. Echols Company, wholesale grocers, and was in the due scope or course of his employment, and was using due and proper care and caution for his own safety and protection at the time he was killed, and that it was through no fault of his that said explosion occurred, or that said gas and ammonia were set on fire, or that he was killed.

"That the defendants owed the said J. C. Chiles, deceased, a contractual duty, as aforesaid, not to injure or kill him by their negligence in the manner as aforesaid.

"That plaintiffs do not know the exact act or acts of negligence of the defendants that caused said explosion and caused said gas and ammonia to be set on fire, and they are unobtainable by these plaintiffs, as said building, pipes, pumps, tanks, vats, machinery, and appliances in and being used in said building were in the sole and exclusive control and management of the defendants, their agents, servants, and employees, as were also the gas and ammonia that were in said building, and that were being used

"That it was through the negligence of the defendants that said explosion occurred, and said gas and ammonia were set on fire, and that said building was wrecked and burned up and demolished, and that said J. C. Chiles, deceased, was killed.

"That said explosion would not have occurred, and said gas and ammonia been set on fire, and said building would not have been wrecked and burned up and demolished, and the said J. C. Chiles, deceased, been killed, if the defendants had used due and proper care in the management and control of the pipes, pumps, tanks, vats, machinery, and appliances that were used by said defendants in their business in furnishing the gas and ammonia that were used for the various purposes of the defendants in said building, and if they had used due and proper care in the storing and handling of the said gas and ammonia that were used by said defendants in said building.

"That the act or acts of negligence upon the part of the defendants that caused said explosion, and caused said gas and ammonia to be set on fire, and said building to be wrecked, burned up, and demolished, and caused the said J. C. Chiles, deceased, to be killed, were and are known to the defendants."

A demurrer was filed on the ground that the complaint did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action against the defendants or either of them. The demurrer was sustained and the complaint dismissed, and this appeal has been prosecuted to review that action.

Appellants first insist that negligence on the part of the defendants is sufficiently charged to constitute a cause of action; and the second contention is made that, if this be not true, sufficient facts are alleged to make applicable the maxim "res ipsa loquitur."

We do not agree with the first contention. The allegations in regard to negligence are in effect conclusions of law, and if the maxim "res ipsa loquitur" is not applicable the complaint is demurrable. <sup>Pleading—negligence—conclusions of law.</sup>

Drainage Dist. 110 Ark. 416, 161 S. W. 1057; Southern Orchard Planting Co. v. Gore, 83 Ark. 78, 102 S. W. 709.

So far from alleging the cause of the explosion or the particular act or acts of negligence which occasioned it, the complaint contains the affirmative recital that the plaintiffs do not know the cause of the injury, consequently there could be no specific allegations concerning it. When analyzed, the complaint is found to contain substantially the following allegations: That a four-story business house was blown up and plaintiff's intestate killed; that the building, and all gas and ammonia fixtures and appliances therein, were in the exclusive control of the defendants; that the intestate was rightfully in the building at the time of the explosion, but had no duty to perform in connection with the instrumentalities which occasioned the injury; and that the cause of the explosion was unknown to plaintiffs. The concurrence of these conditions <sup>Explosion—"res ipsa loquitur"—wrecking of building to injury of employee.</sup> makes applicable the doctrine of "res ipsa loquitur."

This doctrine does not dispense with the requirement that the party who alleges negligence must prove the fact, but relates only to the mode of proving it. Stewart v. Van De- <sup>Negligence—effect of maxim "res ipsa loquitur."</sup> venter Carpet Co. 138 N. C. 60, 50 S. E. 562.

As applied to railroads, the rule is stated in 4 Elliott on Railroads, § 1644, as follows: "The true rule would seem to be that when the injury and circumstances attending it are so unusual and of such a nature that it could not well have happened without the company being negligent, or when it is caused by something connected with the equipment or operation of the road over which the company has entire control, . . . a presumption of negligence on the part of the company usually arises from proof of such facts, in the absence of anything to the contrary, and the burden . . . is then cast upon the company to show that its negligence did not cause the injury."

We quoted and approved this statement of the law in the case of Biddle v. Riley, 118 Ark. 218, L.R.A. 1915F, 992, 176 S. W. 134; Choctaw, O. & G. R. Co. v. Doughty, 77 Ark. 9, 91 S. W. 768; Price v. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. 75 Ark. 491, 112 Am. St. Rep. 79, 88 S. W. 575; and St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Armbrust, 121 Ark. 351, 181 S. W. 131, Ann. Cas. 1917D, 537.

In the Riley and Price Cases the persons injured were passengers upon trains; and in the Doughty Case a fireman on a freight train; while in the Armbrust Case the party injured was a traveler at a railroad crossing, who was hit by a piece of coal falling from the train. But there is nothing in the opinion in any one of the cases which makes the doctrine applicable only to railroads. There are cases which apparently treat the doctrine as applicable only against carriers, and it is no doubt true that the doctrine has been more frequently applied in cases against carriers of passengers than in any other class of cases. But there appears to be no valid reason for thus limiting the doctrine. A leading case on the subject, and one well considered, is that of Judson v. Giant Powder Co. 107 Cal. 549, 29 L.R.A. 718, 48 Am. 8 A.L.R.—32.

St. Rep. 146, 40 Pac. 1020. That was a case where property was destroyed by an explosion of nitroglycerin in process of manufacture into dynamite, and Mr. Justice Garoute, speaking for the supreme court of California, said: "All courts agree that where contractual relations exist between the parties, as in cases of common carriers, proof of the accident carries with it the presumption of negligence and makes a prima facie case. This proposition is elementary and uncontradicted. Therefore the citation of authority is unnecessary. Yet we know of no sound reason, and have found none stated in the books, why this principle of presumptions should be applicable to cases involving contractual relations, and inapplicable to cases where no contractual relations exist. It is intimated in some Indiana case that the presumption arises upon proof of the accident, by reason of the carrier's contract to safely deliver the passenger at his destination, but there is no such contract. The carrier is not an insurer of his passenger. If he were, this presumption of negligence arising from the accident, aside from the act of God, would be conclusive and irrebuttable; but such is not the fact, for it is only prima facie, and always disputable. As was well said by the court in Rose v. Stephens & C. Transp. Co. [C. C.] 20 Blatchf. 411, 11 Fed. 438: 'Undoubtedly, the presumption has been more frequently applied in cases against carriers of passengers than in any other class, but there is no foundation, in authority or reason, for any such limitation of the rule of evidence. The presumption originates from the nature of the act, not from the nature of the relations between the parties.' The carrier's contract with his passenger is simply to exercise a certain degree of care in his transportation. It is a duty which the law enjoins upon him; but the law also enjoins the duty upon this appellant and all others, in the conduct of their business, to exercise a certain degree of care towards this respondent and all mankind. The duty which the law enjoins in the two cases only differs in the degree of care to be exercised. The principle of law involved is wholly the same; and, as has been said, the reason of the rule is not found in the relations existing between the party injuring and the party injured. The presumption arises from the inherent nature and character of the act causing the injury. Presumptions arise from the doctrine of probabilities. The future is measured and weighed by the past, and presumptions are created from the experience of the past. What has happened in the past under the same conditions will probably happen in the future, and ordinary and probable results will be presumed to take place until the contrary is shown. Based upon the foregoing principles, a rule of law has been formulated, bearing upon a certain class of cases, where damages either to person or property form the foundation of the action. This rule is well declared in Shearman & Redfield on Negligence (§ 60): 'When a thing which causes injury is shown to be under the management of the defendant, and the accident is such as in the ordinary course of things does not happen if those who have the management use proper care, it affords reasonable evidence, in the absence of explanation by the defendant, that the accident arose from a want of care.' Tested by this rule, no question of contractual relation could ever form an element in the case. With the same reason it might as well be said that cases of contract were excluded from the effect of the rule as that cases of pure tort were excluded; but, upon the contrary, it is plainly evident that both classes of actions come equally within its provisions. In speaking to this question, it is said in Cooley on Torts (p. 799): 'The rule applied to carriers of passengers is not a special rule, to govern only their conduct, but is a general rule which may be applied wherever the circumstances impose upon one party alone the obligation of special care.' The author then cites the case of a householder engaged in repairing his roof. A piece of slate falls therefrom, and injures a traveler upon the street. He then says: 'True, the act of God, or some excusable accident, may have caused the slate to fall, but the explanation should come from the party charged with the special duty of protection.'

In support of the statement of the law thus quoted a large number of cases are there cited and reviewed. There is also an extended case note.

In the article on Negligence in 20 R. C. L. § 156, it is said: "More precisely, the doctrine 'res ipsa loquitur' asserts that whenever a thing which produced an injury is shown to have been under the control and management of the defendant, and the occurrence is such as in the ordinary course of events does not happen if due care has been exercised, the fact of injury itself will be deemed to afford sufficient evidence to support a recovery, in the absence of any explanation by the defendant tending to show that the injury was not due to his want of care. . . . The presumption of negligence herein considered is, of course, a rebuttable presumption. It imports merely that the plaintiff has made out a prima facie case, which entitles him to a favorable finding, unless the defendant introduces evidence to meet and offset its effect. And, of course, where all the facts attending the injury are disclosed by the evidence, and nothing is left to inference, no presumption can be indulged—the doctrine 'res ipsa loquitur' has no application."

And in § 157 of the same article it is said: "It has been held in some cases that the maxim applies only where the relation of carrier and passenger exists, or where there is a contractual relation between the parties to the transaction producing the injury; but the prevailing view is that a presumption of negligence may be indulged in many other cases, and independently of the existence of any contractual relation between the person injured and him who is charged with responsibility for the injury."

At § 158 of the same article it is said that this doctrine has found frequent application in cases of injuries from falling objects and substances, and that the rule has been applied in many instances to injuries produced by the fall of awnings, signs, walls, buildings, parts of buildings, building materials, tools, electric wires, and many other objects. Annotated cases are cited in the notes to the text, which collect a very large number of cases. Among the annotated cases there cited are our own cases of St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Hopkins, 54 Ark. 209, 15 S. W. 610, annotated in 12 L.R.A. 189, and the case of Hall v. Gage, 116 Ark. 50, 172 S. W. 833, annotated in L.R.A. 1915C, 704.

The litigation in the case of Hall v. Gage, supra, arose from the falling of a wall which had been left standing after a fire, and in holding that the trial court had erred in refusing to charge the jury that the falling wall was prima facie evidence of negligence, which imposed upon the owner the burden of showing that the accident happened without his negligence, we said: "In the case of Earl v. Reid, 21 Ont. L. Rep. 545, 18 Ann. Cas. 1, Teetzel, J., said: 'I think it is the plain duty of every owner of land to keep the buildings or structures thereon in such a condition that they shall not, by falling or otherwise, cause injury to persons lawfully on adjoining lands. In other words, every owner of a building is under a legal obligation to take reasonable care that his building shall not fall in the street or upon his neighbor's land and injure persons lawfully there. While the owner cannot be charged for injuries caused by inevitable accident, the result of vis major, or of the wilful act or negligence of someone for whom he is not responsible, he is liable for injuries caused by the failure on his part to exercise reasonable care.' The fact that the wall fell is prima facie evidence of negligence, in conformity with the maxim 'res ipsa loquitur.' 1 Thomp. Neg. ¶ 1213. See also ¶ 1060 of the same volume. To the same effect, see Earl v. Reid, supra."

In the case of Gurdon & Ft. S. R. Co. v. Calhoun, 86 Ark. 76, 109 S. W. 1017, an employee working on the railroad track was injured by the falling of a tie jack weighing 300 pounds, from a work car, and it was there contended by the railway company that the injury complained of was not caused by the running of a train, in the sense of the Constitution and statute, making railroads liable for damage done by the running of trains; but the court expressly pretermitted the decision of that question for the reason, there stated, that the uncontradicted facts raised the presumption of negligence, and in so holding the court said: "Appellee was in a place, where he had a right to be. It was a safe place until made dangerous by the presence and operation of the train over which appellant railway company had the exclusive management and control. The falling of a 'tie jack,' weighing 300 pounds, from the car, could not well have happened in the usual course, unless there had been some negligence in loading it on the car in the first place, or in the manner in which the train was operated and the car was moved, in the second place. Such an implement, if handled with ordinary care, could not fall from the car in the usual and ordinary method of its use, as shown by the proof. The fact, then, that it did fall, raises the presumption of negligence."

In the case of Southwestern Teleg. & Teleph. Co. v. Bruce, 89 Ark. 581, 117 S. W. 564, the telephone company strung a wire across a vacant lot, which broke and left the end on the foundation of a house where the plaintiff was working. Plaintiff picked up the wire to throw it aside, and was shocked and burned.

The court applied the doctrine of "res ipsa loquitur" in fact, but not eo nomine, and in doing so said: "And where the defendant owes a duty to plaintiff to use care, and an accident happens causing injury, and the accident is caused by the thing or instrumentality that is under the control or management of the defendant, and the accident is such that in the ordinary course of things it would not occur if those who have control and management use proper care, then, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, this would be evidence that the accident occurred from the lack of that proper care. In such case the happening of the accident from which the injury results is prima facie evidence of negligence, and shifts to the defendant the burden of proving that it was not caused through any lack of care on its part."

Another case which applied the doctrine in fact, but not eo nomine, is that of Jacks v. Reeves, 78 Ark. 426, 95 S. W. 781. The complaint there alleged that as plaintiff was driving along the road the top of her carriage was caught by defendant's telephone wire and torn off, causing the horse to become frightened and run away and injure the plaintiff. The court charged the jury "that the plaintiff, in order to entitle her to recover damages under this action, is required to prove that the accident occurred through the negligence of W. D. Reeves." Discussing that instruction, the court said it was abstractly correct; that no liability rested upon the defendant except through negligence; but that the instruction was misleading, under the facts of that case, in not being qualified or coupled with another one, explaining that the evidence of the accident and injury following therefrom, when the occurrence was not out of the usual course, was prima facie evidence of negligence, and shifted the burden onto the defendant to prove that it was not caused by any want of care on his part.

See also Arkansas Teleph. Co. v. Ratteree, 57 Ark. 429, 21 S. W. 1059; St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Steele, 129 Ark. 532, 197 S. W. 288, 15 N. C. C. A. 49; Thomp. Neg. § 1213.

In the case of Barnowsky v. Helson, 89 Mich. 523, 15 L.R.A. 33, 50 N. W. 989, the facts were that the roof of a house slipped and tipped to one side, and fell, while being raised by jackscrews. There was no showing that the house had been sufficiently braced, nor other explanatory proof offered, and the supreme court of Michigan held there was a presumption of negligence which entitled the plaintiff to go to the jury. Appended to this case is an extended note, in which a large number of cases are collected.

We conclude, therefore, that a cause of action was stated in the complaint, and, if testimony is offered which supports these allegations, a case will be made entitling plaintiffs to go to the jury to have decided whether such testimony, considered together with any other testimony which may be offered, discharges the burden of proof resting upon the plaintiff.

The judgment of the court below sustaining the demurrer is therefore reversed, and the cause will be remanded, with directions to overrule the same.

ANNOTATION.

Applicability of "res ipsa loquitur" to explosion of gases or chemicals.

This note is not concerned with explosions of illuminating gas, nor with explosions of gunpowder, dynamite, and the like. Cases of injuries to employees are also excluded, as they involve considerations peculiar to the relation of master and servant. In G. A. Duerler Mfg. Co. v. Dullnig (1904) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 83 S. W. 889, affirmed in (1905) — Tex

—, 87 S. W. 332, for example, denying the application of the doctrine, where an employee of a bottling works was injured by the explosion of a bottle of carbonated water, the court observed that the rule is rarely applied in any cases between master and servant, except where the injury to the servant is caused by falling objects. That, perhaps, is open to question; but suggests the objection to including master and servant cases, which present considerations not peculiar to the physical cause of the injury.

The reported case (CHILES v. FT. SMITH COMMISSION Co., ante, 498) has substantial support in its holding that, where a building in exclusive control of one is blown up by an explosion, the cause of which is unknown to the parties injured, there is presented a case for the application of the doctrine of "res ipsa loquitur."

Thus, in Kearner v. Charles S. Tanner Co. (1910) 31 R. I. 203, 29 L.R.A. (N.S.) 537, 76 Atl. 833, the doctrine of "res ipsa loquitur" was held to obtain where an explosion in a starch factory threw the wall of the building outward on a person passing upon the adjoining highway. The court said that, "as well-regulated starch manufactories do not ordinarily explode while the business therein is conducted with a reasonable degree of care, it would seem as though, after such an explosion has taken place and has caused the death of a person lawfully using the highway while ignorant of the danger to which he was exposed, it is not asking too much to require the proprietor to explain, for the benefit of the representatives of the deceased, the cause of such explosion. As the business is entirely within the control of the defendant, and its methods of manufacturing starch may be good, bad, or indifferent, it is called upon to explain when a fatal explosion occurs within its premises. In our opinion, the case is included within the doctrine aforesaid."

And see also Warn v. Davis Oil Co. (1894) 61 Fed. 681, where, in an action for damages due to an explosion in a building used for the refining of grease, the court affirmed that it was a case for the application of the doctrine of "res ipsa loquitur."

But since the principle only applies to cases where, on proof of the occurrence and injury, the existence of negligent default is the more reasonable probability, it should not be allowed to prevail where on proof of the occurrence, without more, the matter still rests only in conjecture. Dail v. Taylor (1909) 151 N. C. 284, 28 L.R.A. (N.S.) 949, 66 S. E. 135. When we come to the consideration of cases of explosion of bottles containing carbonated drink, we find the general rule to be that the doctrine of "res ipsa loquitur" is not applicable.

So, the mere explosion of a bottle of coca-cola to the injury of a purchaser was held in Dail v. Taylor (N. C.) supra, not sufficient to carry to the jury the question of the negligence of the one who bottled it, under the doctrine of "res ipsa loquitur."

The court stated that, while coca-cola seems to be a recognized article of merchandise not usually or necessarily dangerous under ordinary conditions, the evidence showed that it was put up in glass bottles charged with gas to a pressure of not less than 60 pounds to the square inch, and in this instance shipped in cases or crates for quite a distance, and handled in various ways and by different parties, and that such facts presented a case where it would be entirely unsafe to permit the application of the principle contended for, or to hold that the explosion of one single bottle of such an article, under such circumstances, should of itself rise to the dignity of legal evidence, sufficient, without more, to carry a case to the jury.

And the mere fact that a bottle containing a carbonated drink, which had been placed on ice, burst when the lid of the ice chest was lifted, was held in Wheeler v. Laurel Bottling Works (1916) 111 Miss. 442, L.R.A. 1916E, 1074, 17 So. 743, not to be a case for the application of the doctrine of "res ipsa loquitur" in an action against the bottlers, as the bottle, at the time of the injury, was not under the control or management of the manufacturer.

So too, in Stone v. Van Noy R. News Co. (1913) 153 Ky. 240, 154 S. W. 1092, an action for personal injuries to a news agent, due to the explosion of a bottle filled with soft drink as he lifted the lid of an ice box in order to get some bottles for the purpose of vending same, it was held that a verdict for defendant was properly directed, where the only evidence against the bottling company was the mere fact of the explosion of the bottle.

So also, in Glaser v. Seitz (1901) 35 Misc. 341, 71 N. Y. Supp. 942, an action by a vendee against the vendor of seltzer water for injuries due to the explosion of a siphon of seltzer, it was held that it did not present a case for the application of the doctrine of "res ipsa loquitur," the court stating that it was necessary to go further, and prove affirmatively some misconduct on the part of the vendor.

However, in Payne v. Rome Coca-Cola Bottling Co. (1912) 10 Ga. App. 762, 73 S. E. 1087, an action against bottlers, for personal injuries due to the explosion of a bottle of coca-cola, it was held that, as there was direct or circumstantial evidence of freedom from fault on the part of all persons through whose hands the bottle passed after it left the bottler, it was a case for the application of the doctrine of "res ipsa loquitur." The court said that "since for every effect there is a cause, where negligence exists someone must have been the responsible author. If he can be found, it is right that he should pay the penalty. The bottle exploded. Inferentially, someone was negligent. It was not Cook, the last vendor of the bottle, nor the plaintiff's brother, nor the plaintiff, nor yet Barnett, because they all stand exonerated by direct or circumstantial evidence of their freedom from fault. But the inference of negligence remains, and someone is prima facie to blame. By a process of elimination we get back to the manufacturer who set the dangerous agency in motion, and upon whom the blame ought inferentially to be fastened. It is certainly no hardship to require at the manufacturer's hands an explanation of the occurrence, that the jury may say whether it, like the other persons who handled the bottle, has been exonerated. . . . It charged the bottle with carbonic acid gas, it put together the constituent elements of the beverage, it manufactured or procured the bottle to hold these elements, and it put the bottle in circulation with an invitation to the public to use the contents as a harmless and refreshing beverage." This case cannot be said to be in conflict with the other cases cited in this note, which have held that the mere explosion of a bottle does not present a case for the application of the doctrine of "res ipsa loquitur," as in the latter cases there has not been the added evidence of freedom of fault on the part of all through whose hands the bottle passed after it left the bottler. In fact, the court in the Payne Case stated specifically that, as to whether an inference of negligence would arise against the manufacturer upon mere proof of the explosion, without more, it expressed no opinion.

Negligence in the manufacture of lubricating oil will not be presumed from the mere fact of explosion, where the evidence shows that the explosion might as well have happened from other and existing causes. Standard Oil Co. v. Murray (1902) 57 C. C. A. 1, 119 Fed. 572.

So too, in Kusick v. Thorndike & Hix (1916) 224 Mass. 413, 112 N. E. 1025, an action to recover for personal injuries due to the explosion of a can of lime, brought against one who packed and sold the lime, but did not manufacture it, it was held that the doctrine of "res ipsa loquitur" did not apply. The court stated that, although the explosion might be evidence of a defect of some kind, its cause was wholly conjectural, and there was nothing to show that it resulted from the fault of the defendant.

And in Conley v. United Drug Co. (1914) 218 Mass. 288, L.R.A.1915D, 830, 105 N. E. 975, action to recover for injuries due to the explosion of a tank filled with carbonic acid gas, it was held that as there was no evidence to warrant a finding that the owner of the premises had any control over the tank, or was in any way responsible for its presence, the rule of "res ipsa loquitur" was inapplicable.

v.

RALPH H. SEELYE.

Massachusetts Supreme Judicial Court — December 30, 1918.

(231 Mass. 434, 121 N. E. 413.)

Master and servant — liability for mistake of surgeon.

1. A railroad company whose negligence causes hernia in an employee is not liable to him for injuries caused by a surgeon in operating on the wrong side to relieve the hernia because of mistake as to the identity of the patient.

[See note on this question beginning on page 506.]

Release — personal injury — scope.

2. A release by an employee of his employer whose negligence caused his injury, from all claims and demands arising or which may arise out of said injury, does not release the surgeon from liability for operating, by mistake as to the identity of the patient, on the wrong side of the injured person to relieve the injury.

[See 23 R. C. L. 406.]

EXCEPTIONS by plaintiff to rulings of the Superior Court for Hampden County made during the trial of an action brought to recover damages growing out of an unauthorized surgical operation performed by defendant on the body of plaintiff, which resulted in a verdict for defendant. Sustained.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Harvey & Muleare, for plaintiff:

The consideration received by the plaintiff from the railroad company in payment for the injuries sustained by the plaintiff while in its employ cannot now be set up by the defendant to be a satisfaction, as a matter of law, for the claim now made by the plaintiff against him.

Brewer v. Casey, 196 Mass. 384, 82 N. E. 45; Aldrich v. Parnell, 147 Mass. 409, 18 N. E. 170; Leddy v. Barney, 139 Mass. 394, 2 N. E. 107; Boston Supply Co. v. Rubin, 214 Mass. 217, 101 N. E. 133; Feneff v. Boston & M. R. Co. 196 Mass. 575, 82 N. E. 705; Gray v. Boston Elev. R. Co. 215 Mass. 143, 102 N. E. 71, 8 N. C. C. A. 602; Stone v. Boston & A. R. Co. 171 Mass. 536, 41 L.R.A. 794, 51 N. E. 1, 4 Am. Neg. Rep. 490.

If there had been no release, and an action had been brought against the railroad company, the act of the defendant in performing an unauthorized operation upon the plaintiff's body would not have been deemed a natural and probable consequence and an element of damage to be shouldered by the railroad company. The unauthorized operation was not due to the injury in the railroad shops, but to a new and independent cause.

Messrs. Green & Bennett, for defendant:

A release to one discharges all the world for the matters embraced in the claim against the one.

If a person is hurt, and if, in honest effort to lessen the injurious effects of the accident, he has (using due care) applied for treatment to a reputable physician, the person responsible for the original injury is responsible in damages for the injury that resulted from the mistake and negligence of the physician.

Crosby, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action to recover for an unauthorized surgical operation performed by the defendant, a surgeon, upon the body of the plaintiff.

On March 21, 1916, the plaintiff suffered a rupture in his right groin while in the employ of the Boston & Albany Railroad, of whose road the New York Central Railroad Company, was lessee; on the same day he consulted the defendant, and the next day was operated on by the latter. The following day the plaintiff discovered that the operation had been performed on his left side, and so stated to the defendant. The plaintiff testified that the defendant said: "I took you for another patient of mine that had a hernia on the left side. Well, the only thing we can do is to operate on the right side in about two or three days."

Afterwards an operation was performed by the defendant upon the plaintiff's right side.

On July 19, 1916, the plaintiff made a settlement of his claim against the railroad company and executed and delivered to it a release of all claims and demands "arising or which may arise out of said injury." This action having been brought since the settlement, an important question is whether it is barred by the release.

If the plaintiff's employer, in an action brought against it to recover for the original injury, would have been liable for the negligence of the defendant in improperly treating the plaintiff, then the release included such damages, and is a bar to the present action, for the reason that in such a case the plaintiff had a claim against both the railroad company and the defendant for the same cause of action, and a release of one of the alleged wrongdoers would operate as a release of both. Brewer v. Casey, 196 Mass. 384, 82 N. E. 45; Stimpson v. Poole, 141 Mass. 502, 6 N. E. 705; Leddy v. Barney, 139 Mass. 394, 2 N. E. 107; Brown v. Cambridge, 3 Allen, 474.

It is the contention of the plaintiff that the alleged negligence of the defendant had no causal relation to the original injury, but created a new, separate, and independent cause of action, the liability for which was not barred by the release.

It is well settled in this commonwealth and in many other jurisdictions, that in an action for personal injuries arising out of the alleged negligence of the defendant, the plaintiff is entitled to recover for the injuries resulting from the defendant's negligence, although such injuries are aggravated by the negligence of an attending physician, if, in his selection and employment, the plaintiff was in the exercise of reasonable care. McGarrahan v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. 171 Mass. 211, 218, 50 N. E. 610, 4 Am. Neg. Rep. 284; Gray v. Boston Elev. R. Co. 215 Mass. 143, 102 N. E. 71, and cases cited.

The question is whether the act of the defendant in operating by mistake upon the plaintiff's left side was a natural and probable result of the negligence of the railroad company. We are of opinion that the general rule, as above stated, is not applicable to the case at bar. There was sufficient evidence to show that the defendant made a mistake in the identity of the plaintiff at the time the operation was performed; and that he then believed he was operating upon another patient who had a hernia on his left side. The reason why a wrongdoer is held liable for the negligence of a physician whose unskilful treatment aggravates an injury is that such unskilful treatment is a result which reasonably ought to have been anticipated by him.

The railroad company could not be held liable because of the defendant's mistaken belief that he was operating upon some person other than the plaintiff; such a mistake was not an act of negligence which could

Master and servant—
liability for mistake of surgeon.

be found to flow legitimately as a natural and probable consequence of the original injury, and a ruling in effect to the contrary could not properly have been made. The fact that the mistake made by the defendant might possibly occur is not enough to charge the railroad company with liability; the unskilful or improper treatment must have been legally and constructively anticipated by the original wrongdoer as a rational and probable result of the first injury. This is the true test of responsibility, and it cannot be extended to cover the facts in the present case as shown by the record.

If a surgeon employed to operate upon a patient for hernia caused by the negligence of another, instead of performing that operation, removes one of the patient's kidneys (which is in sound condition) under the mistaken belief that he is treating another patient, can it reasonably be held that such a mistake is something that might sometimes follow, and as a matter of common knowledge and experience might be expected sometimes to follow, from an injury resulting in hernia? We think not. We are of opinion that the act of the defendant in operating on the wrong side, was a wholly wrongful, independent, and intervening cause for which the original wrongdoer was in no way responsible.

All the cases cited and relied on by the defendant are distinguishable from the case at bar because of the fact that the defendant did not intentionally operate upon the plaintiff for the injury received, as he did in those cases, but mistakenly understood and believed that he was operating upon another patient for a different injury.

It is unnecessary to decide whether the railroad company would have been liable for the aggravation of the plaintiff's injury, caused by the mistake of the defendant in operating upon the wrong side, had there been no mistake with reference to the identity of the patient.

In some jurisdictions it is held that, in an action against the original wrongdoer, if a surgeon by mistake operates at a place other than the seat of the injury, and without the consent of the patient, such an act is a natural and probable consequence of the original injury for which the defendant is responsible. Martin v. Cunningham, 93 Wash. 517, L.R.A.1918A, 225, 161 Pac. 355; Thompson v. Louisville & N. R. Co. 91 Ala. 496, 11 L.R.A. 146, 8 So. 406; Sauter v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 66 N. Y. 50, 23 Am. St. Rep. 18, 5 Am. Neg. Cas. 208; Variety Mfg. Co. v. Landaker, 227 Ill. 22, 81 N. E. 47; Reed v. Detroit, 108 Mich. 224, 65 N. W. 967; Seeton v. Dunbarton, 73 N. H. 134, 59 Atl. 944; Lyons v. Erie R. Co. 57 N. Y. 489; Goss v. Goss, 102 Minn. 346, 113 N. W. 690. See also Mohr v. Williams, 95 Minn. 261, 1 L.R.A. (N.S.) 439, 111 Am. St. Rep. 462, 104 N. W. 12, 5 Ann. Cas. 303; Sullivan v. McGraw, 118 Mich. 39, 76 N. W. 149; Pratt v. Davis, 224 Ill. 300, 7 L.R.A. (N.S.) 609, 79 N. E. 562, 8 Ann. Cas. 197. The facts in the case at bar distinguish it from the cases above referred to.

If we assume that the release is valid and a bar to any claim which the plaintiff had against the railroad company, still a majority of the court are of opinion, for the reasons stated, that it is not a defense to the present action, and was not admissible in evidence.

The exceptions to the admission in evidence of the release and the ruling that it was a bar to the action must be sustained.

Ordered accordingly.

ANNOTATION.

Liability of one causing personal injury for consequences of negligence, mistake, or lack of skill of physician or surgeon.

I. Scope of note, 507.

II. Civil liability:

- a. Physician or surgeon selected by injured person, 507.
- b. Physician or surgeon selected by person causing injury, 515.

III. Criminal liability:

- a. General rule, 516.
- b. Qualification of rule, 520.
- c. Rule in Texas, 521.

I. Scope of note.

The purpose of this note is to review the cases wherein the courts have passed on the responsibility of one causing a personal injury, for the consequence of the negligence, mistake, or lack of skill of an attending physician or surgeon. The expression, "one causing a personal injury," is used in its legal significance as meaning one responsible in law for the injury. The note excludes cases involving the right to damages for malpractice without regard to the original injury, and also cases wherein the right to recover for the negligence of the physician or surgeon is based on a contractual obligation of the person causing the injury to furnish medical or surgical aid through a relief department, a hospital, or otherwise.

II. Civil Liability.a. Physician or surgeon selected by injured person.

Where one who has suffered personal injuries by reason of the negligence of another exercises reasonable care in securing the services of a competent physician or surgeon, and his injuries are thereafter aggravated or increased by the negligence, mistake, or lack of skill of such physician or surgeon, the law regards the negligence of the wrongdoer in causing the original injury as the proximate cause of the damages flowing from the subsequent negligent or unskilful treatment thereof, and holds him liable therefor.

In Texas & P. R. Co. v. Hill (1915) 237 U. S. 208, 59 L. ed. 918, 35 Sup. Ct. Rep. 575, an action for damages for personal injuries, the court upheld an instruction to the effect that the defendant was absolved from liability for damages resulting from the intervening malpractice of the attending surgeons, only in the event that the plaintiff had failed to exercise reasonable care in their selection, or thereafter, in following their advice. In Atlas Portland Cement Co. v. Hagen (1916) 147 C. C. A. 94, 233 Fed. 24, writ of certiorari denied in (1916) 242 U. S. 631, 61 L. ed. 537, 37 Sup. Ct. Rep. 15, it appeared that an injured employee, whose leg had been improperly set by a surgeon furnished by the master, had thereafter refused to allow the same physician to rebreak the leg, but had secured the services of another surgeon whose operation was not successful. The court held that, since there was no negligence on the plaintiff's part in refusing to allow the master's surgeon to reset the leg and in engaging another surgeon to perform the operation, the plaintiff could recover for the entire resultant damage arising from the defendant's negligence. In Mella v. Northern S. S. Co. (1908) 162 Fed. 499, an action for the death of the plaintiff's intestate, Mella, by the wrongful act of the defendant, it appeared that Mella had sustained a dislocated shoulder by stepping into a hole in the deck of the defendant's steamship. In a subsequent operation to reduce the dislocation Mella died from paralysis of the heart, due to the unnecessary administration of chloroform. The evidence showed that Mella had previously been affected with a diseased heart, and it was held that, since death resulted directly from the unnecessary and dangerous administration of chloroform, the previous dislocation of Mella's shoulder was not the proximate cause of his death, and the defendant could not be charged therewith. The court said: "I am of the opinion that when one person is injured by the negligence of another, and such injury is in no event fatal, the negligent party cannot be held liable for the consequences of the unnecessary and dangerous acts of the surgeon employed by the injured party, even when done in the course of or in connection with a necessary surgical operation." But the court added: "The negligent party is responsible for all errors of judgment, mere mistakes, and errors, assuming there is no negligence in employing an incompetent surgeon." However, in Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. v. Heil (1907) 83 C. C. A. 400, 154 Fed. 626, an action by a railroad employee to recover damages for the negligence of the defendant, whereby he had lost one of his hands, it appeared that the amputation was made in such a manner that the stump was still suppurating when it should have been healed, and that another amputation farther up would probably be necessary to support an artificial appliance. The degree of care exercised in securing the services of the surgeon did not appear, nor did the court apparently consider it as in any way determinative of the rights of the parties, saying: "Evidence to show to what extent this condition was caused by the wrong of the defendant, and to what extent it was the result of some independent cause, such as the malpractice of the surgeon who treated it, was undoubtedly relevant, because the defendant was liable for the former and exempt from liability for the latter."

In Sandwich v. Dolan (1889) 34 Ill. App. 199, reversed on other grounds in (1890) 133 Ill. 177, 23 Am. St. Rep. 598, 24 N. E. 526, the plaintiff sought to recover damages for personal injuries caused by the alleged negligence of the defendant, which had been aggravated by the unskilful care of her physician, who treated her for pleurisy. It was held that since the plaintiff had exercised ordinary care in securing surgical attendance, the injuries resulting from the unskilfulness of her doctor were a direct result of the injury, the court saying: "It was her duty to employ such aid, surgical and otherwise, as ordinary prudence in the situation required, and to use ordinary judgment and
